City officials estimate that every five jobs at Boeing generated two others in the Puget Sound area's general economy. And after two years of general cutbacks, everyone is feeling the pinch—from cab drivers to restaurant owners, from fishermen to iron workers.

As many as 3,000 laid-off workers have exhausted their 52 weeks of unemployment insurance at one time, and this number is expected to level off at about 800 a week.

When unemployment benefits run out, the jobless workers have few alternatives. They can apply for state assistance programs or Aid to Dependent Children, or they can seek charity.

A coalition of church groups has established a food-for-the-needy program called "Neighbors in Need," which so far has served 100,000 Seattle area residents.

But the real tragedy of Seattle is the lack of any immediate prospects for recovery. Mayor Wes Uhlman says the area needs massive federal aid for public service jobs to get the economy going again. And federal help probably will be needed if the area is ever to diversify its economy and end its dependency on the aerospace industry.

The city doesn't look like a depressed area. The Seattle-Tacoma International Airport is undergoing an expansion program. A downtown stadium is in the planning stages. Seattle has a monorail, the world-famous Space Needle and other remnants of the 1962 World's Fair.

One of the fair's remaining buildings, the Food Circus, is being used partly these days to take 1,000 new applications weekly for unemployment compensation because the Unemployment Insurance office on Taylor St. doesn't have enough room.

There are no Hoovervilles, or shanty towns, reminiscent of the Great Depression. But as many as 68,000 persons have been on some form of public assistance at one time in Seattle and King County, and more than 80,000 are making use of the federal food stamp program.

The blame for the decline in the aerospace industry and the resulting disaster in Seattle's economy could be laid at many doorsteps. Many natives, including trade unionists, cite the general downturn in the American economy plus the Nixon Administration's "tight-money" policy which produced record high interest rates and held back aircraft orders.

As the slump affected the airlines themselves some carriers overestimated their needs and ordered too many planes, including the jumbo Boeing 747, causing a backlog in pickup of planes ordered. Nearly two dozen of the $20-million aircraft were parked on Boeing Field, looking like beached whales.

Finally, the feeling prevails here that other parts of the country are afflicted with an "anti-technology" attitude that opposes aerospace advancements such as the Supersonic Transport (SST).

But jobs at Boeing were on the decline before congressional opposition to the SST program hardened. The company employed 105,000 workers in 1968. It now employes only 40,000, and by the end of the year this will be cut to 30,000.

"It's like cutting off one finger at a time," said Tom Edwards, president of Machinists District Lodge 751.

Two years ago, the Machinists had a membership of 43,000 among Boeing's workers and represented a total of 56,000 in the bargaining unit. Today, the district's membership is down to 15,000.

"Now unemployment is our biggest industry," he said wryly.

Conditions aren't so good either for the hourly employes still on the Boeing payroll. Many have been reassigned to different shifts at different plants. Many have been required to work 10 hours a day, seven days a week.

Paying overtime to those remaining on the payroll is cheaper than calling back laid-off workers, the union says of Boeing.

It points to the company's $1-million increase in net earnings for the first quarter of 1971 over the first three months of 1970.

Most businessmen in Seattle are reluctant to talk about the unemployment situation, but rank-and-file workers are not.

A cab driver will tell you, for example, that while he once could get $45 to $60 in fares during 12 hours, now he's lucky to get $25: "I've been out for three hours and I've clocked $3 on the meter. Does that tell you anything?"

One man assured of continuing demand for his services is Walter G. Cogdill, manager of the unemployment insurance office. He has had to hire 100 additional staff members in the past two years to keep up with the work load.

He noted that only one of 10 new applicants for unemployment benefits is from Boeing, underscoring the effects on other sectors of the area's economy.

The Rev. Hal Perry, administrative coordinator of Neighbors in Need is running out of food to distribute at the program's 34 food centers in King County at a time when weekly applications are doubling. "It is really a severe food crisis," said the Methodist minister. "We knew it would get worse as unemployment benefits ran out."

And the debilitating effects of joblessness on the rank-and-file as well as the engineer are having a domino effect:

Housing starts in January were only half of what they were a year ago and a third of their January 1969 level of 1,691. . . . The value of authorized construction in Seattle dropped to $5.9 million in March, $12.7 million less than a year ago. . . . Retail business is 35 percent off. . . . Apartment house vacanices are running 40 to 50 percent in the fashionable suburbs.

Mayor Uhlman sees diversification of the economy as the only answer to Seattle's plight. He knows the area needs massive federal support and he doesn't care what form it takes.

He looks toward a Seattle of the future—the corporate headquarters of the Pacific Northwest, the supplier and supporter of Alaskan development, and the kingpin in trade with the Far East.

The problem is that all this will take a great deal of money and a great deal of time. Both are running out for Seattle's unemployed.

EMPTY BOEING PARKING LOT and long lines of workers waiting to collect unemployment insurance tell the story of Seattle, which leads the nation in unemployment rates. At one time, 27,000 production workers were employed at this Boeing installation in suburban Renton. Now, about 2,400 work there.

Youth No Buffer, Seniority No Shield

Seattle—Youth is no buffer and seniority no sure safeguard in Seattle's job market. Whether you're young or old, losing a job can be a bitter, disillusioning experience.

A year ago, Bill Jonas was 26, a Grade 7 flight-line mechanic at the Boeing Co. making $12,000 a year, with overtime. He and his wife, Lou, their son and two daughters lived in a $23,000, three-bedroom home in suburban Kirkland. They had two cars and some nice furniture. Boeing apparently liked his work and the future looked bright.

But that was a year ago. Bill has been out of a job since then. The home is gone, some of the furniture has been repossessed, the family lives in a modest apartment, Bill concentrates on keeping the family's economy car in one piece.

May 1970 was when the dream disappeared. Boeing management informed Bill Jonas then that he could take a humiliating "downgrade"—with a $160 cut in monthly pay—or face the possibility of a layoff. Bill refused the downgrade and was laid off almost immediately. Because Boeing claimed that he quit his job, he could not collect unemployment compensation for 10 weeks.

He invested his termination check in food stamps and the family lived on the $23 weekly unemployment compensation paid his wife, who earlier had been laid off as a Boeing key punch operator.

"When you get cut off, you're stuck with all the stuff and the bills," Jonas said. "You let your credit go to hell and people come and take what you've got. I never in my life had a creditor call me. Now, the one that calls first, gets first crack."

Jonas was forced to sell the home he had owned for only a year.

By August 1970, he was receiving $72 a week unemployment compensation, and decided to enter college simply to collect GI bill money: "That was the only other source of income I had—to go to school and let Uncle Sam pay me."

But what began as expediency changed to a genuine desire for a new career in forestry, leaving behind the uncertainty of the aircraft industry.

Whether the Jonas family gets a second chance at the great American dream depends on Bill getting a scholarship to the University of Oregon, and its tough to concentrate on grade-point ratios when you're haunted by money problems.

It was different with 52-year-old Claude Fanning, who decided he had too much at stake in pension rights to take a layoff and took the pay cut—only to be laid off at a later date. After 30 years of service, the Boeing Co. came to the conclusion that Fanning was "not qualified."

The Bill Jonas Family

"It was a great shock," Fanning said quietly. "I never thought they'd do such a thing to a guy with that amount of service. But I'm not giving up yet."

Neither is Machinists District Lodge 751 which already has filed a grievance on Fanning's behalf.

Fanning was a Grade 4 electrical assembler-installer, making $3.76 an hour when he was handed the alternative of unemployment or a downgrading to a Grade 1, entry-level position at $3.31 an hour.

"They gave me about two hours to think about it, so I took it. I would have been laid off the next day if I hadn't. At first I was mad enough to quit, but then I got to thinking about my seniority."

Instead of his usual job of installing wiring systems in aircraft, Fanning was switched to assembling wiring systems.

"I hadn't done that kind of work in 20 years," he said, but added, "I think I was as qualified as anybody there."

The Boeing Co. didn't think so. He was given his walking papers—as many older workers have been—with the terse explanation, "Unable to perform the job."

Unlike his younger counterpart, Bill Jonas, Claude Fanning doesn't have a family to worry about. For the most part, he lives alone. His immediate future? "I don't know anything but aircraft work," he said. "I'd probably have to be retrained, and my age might count against me."

Cites Threat to Economy:

Meany Scores Gaps In U.S. Trade Policy

Both Democratic and Republican members of the Senate panel echoed Meany's concern at the one-sided nature of America's trade policies—a virtual open door to imports from countries that impose rigid quotas on their own imports, and special tax privileges for multinational corporations with plants and subsidiaries scattered throughout the world.

"We in the AFL-CIO are not isolationists and have no intention of becoming isolationists," Meany emphasized.

"We support the orderly expansion of world trade. We oppose the promotion of private greed at public expense or the undercutting of United States wage and labor standards. We want expanded trade that expands employment at home and abroad and that improves living standards and working conditions, here and abroad. We want the U.S. government to protect the interests of American workers against the export of American jobs."

But, Meany stressed, "the worldwide operations of United States-owned multinational companies do not represent free competitive trade among the nations of the world."

Such firms can produce components in one country, assemble them in another, and sell the final product with a U.S. brand name. "The multinational firms can juggle their bookkeeping and their prices and their taxes. Their export and import transactions are within the corporation, determined by the executives of the corporation—all for the benefit and profit of the corporation."

This, Meany declared, is neither foreign trade nor foreign competition. Yet the United States is still trying to operate on "purist" economic theories of imports and exports that completely ignore the realities of present-day trade manipulations.

Meany summarized for the subcommittee the trade program adopted earlier this month by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

It called for repeal of a tariff loophole that encourages shipping U.S. parts to Mexico and other low-wage areas to be assembled and sent back to the United States.

It asked that profits of foreign subsidiaries of U.S. firms be taxed in the year they are earned, to close another big loophole.

It urged government regulations to curb the outflow of American capital and technology.

It urged international labor standards in world trade.

And it supported quotas on sharply-rising imports that are seriously displacing U.S. production and jobs in order to "slow down the disruptive impacts on American society and help to provide an orderly expansion of trade."

All this is needed, Meany said in reply to questions from committee members, because "we can't afford to lose many more jobs . . . we can't be a world leader if we're to become a low-wage, welfare economy."

American industry's "best customer" has been the American worker. "If we lose these jobs," Meany asked, "where is the purchasing power?"

Canada's 6.7% Unemployment Held 'Calamity'

Ottawa—Pres. David MacDonald of the Canadian Labor Congress warned that unemployment in Canada has reached the proportions of a national calamity.

The Canadian jobless rate in April rose to 6.7 percent of the nation's labor force from 6 percent in March, seasonally adjusted.

This represents a jump of 11.7 percent, the highest one-month increase on record, MacDonald said, and for the first time in history, the actual rate failed to drop between March and April.

He also pointed out that shortly before the government reported the rise in unemployment, the Canadian consumer price index rose seven-tenths of 1 percent.

"Because of the complete breakdown of the government's economic policies, the people of this country are getting the worst of both worlds—unemployment and inflation," MacDonald observed.

Biggest Label Show Welcomed by Atlanta

Atlanta—Unionization of the South was convincingly dramatized here as the 1971 AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show opened in the heart of Dixie.

John E. Wright, president of the Atlanta Labor Council, expressed this at a pre-show luncheon when he declared:

"Last year the show was in New Orleans. This year we are proud to have it in Atlanta. It demonstrates for the nation and those in the South that the labor movement is now solidly in the southern states.

"Despite the hopes of our opponents, the labor movement is not going to go away from the South and leave the fate of southern workers to those who would exploit them."

This year's show was the biggest in its 33-year history with a record 300 exhibitors. But the show has another unique aspect in that it defies the economic downturn.

"With the rest of the economy in a sharp decline," said show Director Edward P. Murphy, "we thought the show would suffer. We rented just the exhibit hall in the big Atlanta Civic Center. However, the demand of the exhibitors forced us to move to additional rooms and hallways, and there are even a few exhibits outside."

Principal speaker at the opening ceremonies was AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany who called the show "an outstanding example of labor-management cooperation."

"The original purpose of the show and the union label itself was to encourage expending of consumer purchasing power for articles produced under union conditions," Meany noted. "It is symbolic of the philosophy of the American labor movement to achieve gains under the American system."

Meany said that "while there are differences between labor and management, there should be no differences on the fact that labor is entitled to a fair share of the wealth this nation produces."

He pointed out that the Union-Industries Show is a unique product of all the thousands of labor-management contracts peacefully negotiated each year that never hit the headlines.

Assistant Sec. of Labor W. J. Usery, representing the U.S. government, called the show a "living testimony to the American collective bargaining system" which, he said, "is more democratic than ever before".

Usery brought a message from Pres. Nixon, who observed that the show "embraces the finest examples of craftsmanship and progressive management joined together to produce quality goods for the American consumer. The workers and employers who paticipate can take justifiable pride in their accomplishments."

The colorful show opened as thousands of visitors poured into the modernistic Civic Center collecting gifts and souvenirs that impressively stamped the union label on the Southland.

form with the requirements of the Social Security Act.

These articles stated that it was Richardson's opinion "that the changes are justified because they are consistent with certain actions tentatively decided by the House Ways and Means Committee."

Meany charged that "such a justification is completely unacceptable since there is no way of determining at this stage which, if any, of the changes authorized by California will be retained in the legislation ultimately enacted by the Congress."

The letter also criticized statements by John Twiname, administrator of the Social & Rehabilitation Service, that 38 proposed changes appear "to be federally approvable without a detailed study and analysis."

Many of these changes, Meany said, "appear to be very far-reaching and totally contrary to the legislation now in force."

Two of the proposed changes were specifically cited in the letter as "backward steps . . . contrary to the present law" which cannot "be authorized administratively." One is the waiver the state had sought to require Medicaid patients to partially pay for medical services. The other would establish a ceiling on total funds for assistance to families with dependent children and to the permanently and totally disabled.

Authorization for the Secretary to grant waivers, Meany stated, "was clearly intended to be used for localized demonstration projects which would benefit the poor. . . ."

Meany told Richardson "that law cannot be administratively amended by state action or by federal waiver. It can be amended only by the Congress of the United States."

Federal Grants to Colleges Sought To Hold Down Student Tuition Costs

A new program of federal aid to higher education was urged by the AFL-CIO in a statement to a House Education subcommittee.

The federation endorsed legislation aimed at holding down tuition costs by providing federal grants to colleges on the basis of student enrollment.

Under the bill, introduced by Subcommittee Chairman Edith Green and a number of co-sponsors, colleges would receive $100 for every enrolled freshman and sophomore. The grant would rise to $150 for third and fourth year students and to $200 for graduate students.

Two-year colleges, four-year-colleges, universities, public and private institutions would all be eligible for the assistance.

The statement submitted by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller termed the direct grant proposal far superior to the Administration approach, which would merely continue to subsidize student loans but limit them to students from low-income families.

While fully supporting assistance to needy students, the AFL-CIO warned that the Administration approach would do nothing to overcome the crisis in higher education.

Tuition covers only a part of the cost of a student's education at nearly all colleges, the AFL-CIO noted. Loan programs might help more students attend college, but college deficits would continue to mount.

"The most likely result," the federation warned, "would be a new round of sharp tuition increases making it more difficult than ever for students from moderate-income families to manage the financial burden of higher education."

The AFL-CIO also strongly endorsed provisions in the bill to continue federal construction grants the Arministration is trying to phase out and to expand student loan and work-study programs.

Direct grants and work-study programs should be the primary method of helping students from poor families attend college, the federation stressed. It questioned the Administration's assumption that loan programs that impose "a mountainous debt" on low-income students at the start of their careers "are the most effective form of student aid for young people who are trying to break out of the poverty cycle."

Profits Show Sharp Gain As Auto Makers Rebound

Corporate profits soared 13 percent during the first three months of 1971, paced by the auto industry's rebound from the General Motors strike.

The Commerce Dept. said before-tax profits in the first quarter were at a seasonally-adjusted annual rate of $86.4 billion. A year ago, the comparable first-quarter profits were running at a rate of $82.6 billion.

After discounting inflation's impact, the gross national product climbed 7.1 percent in the first quarter. But this followed a 3.9 percent decline in the last quarter of 1970, attributed largely to the effects of the General Motors shutdown.

Despite the rebound, the nation's output of goods and services was trailing the estimates on which the Nixon Administration based its budget figures.

Congress Showdown Set On Bills to Spur Economy

INFORMAL DISCUSSION GROUP at the 3rd annual Collective Bargaining Forum explores issues raised by a conference speaker. The three-day session at Automation House in New York brought together experts from labor, management and the public.

Job-Creating Measures Up for Vote

Congress prepared to move full speed ahead with a labor-supported package of legislation to aid the ailing economy—despite the continued opposition of the Nixon Administration.

A House-Senate conference committee approved intact a $2 billion accelerated public works program that the House had passed in April.

The program would provide federal funding to enable communities with high unemployment to put some 170,000 persons to work the first year building and repairing needed public facilities.

A similar program helped dig the nation out of recession in 1962.

Meanwhile, House Democratic leaders scheduled a showdown resumption of a battle over a public service jobs bill—the other half of labor's program to generate employment while helping out financially-pressed cities and states.

A coalition of Republicans and conservative Democrats gained a tactical victory when the public service bill was brought up in the House in mid-May. They won the procedural right to offer the Administration's manpower revenue-sharing bill as a substitute.

House leaders concede that the showdown vote will be close. But they think they can turn out the votes to pass the public service jobs measure. The Senate has already approved a public service employment bill.

The Senate has not yet voted on the accelerated public works measure and will face the issue for the

Price Hikes Erase Family Income Gains

For the first time in nine years, the purchasing power of the typical American family failed to rise as price increases during 1970 totally wiped out all gains in income, the Census Bureau reported.

The report followed close on the heels of another Census Bureau finding that inflation and high unemployment rates swelled the ranks of the poor by 1.2 million in 1970. It was the first time in 10 years that the number of Americans classified as poor showed an increase.

Both the reports on income and poverty were viewed as reflecting the general economic sluggishness of the American economy.

Median family income increased 4.6 percent in 1970, or $440, putting the total at $9,870, but price increases of 5.9 percent left buying power about the same or slightly less than it had been in 1969.

For Negroes and other minorities, the median family income was $6,520, or about 65 percent that of whites. Blacks did, however have a bigger percentage gain in income than the overall average with median income for black families up 5.3 percent, or $330.

Of the 51.9 million families in the United States, 8.9 percent received income under $3,000. Families with incomes in the $3,000-$6,000 range accounted for 10.4 percent of the total while another 11.8 percent received incomes of between $5,000 and $7,000.

At the top end of the income brackets, 4.6 percent had incomes of $25,000 or more, while 17.7 percent received between $15,000 and $25,000 and 26.8 percent of the total were in the $10,000-$15,000 bracket.

For individual workers, median incomes of men and women were $6,670 and $2,240 respectively. The total for men was up 3.7 percent over 1969 and for women, 4.9 percent.

Full-time, year-round workers also stood still. Their increases in income, like those of the typical family, were completely eaten up by inflation.

Wage earners in the South, with an average income of $8,500, continued to lag about $2,000 behind their counterparts in the Northwest and North-Central regions.

College graduates, with a median income of $16,000, continued to earn about three times as much as those with considerably less education.

Hits Government Intervention:

Meany Warns Against Threat To Undermine Right to Strike

New York—The right to strike is "too basic to a free society" to tamper with, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the third annual Collective Bargaining Forum here.

Meany acknowledged the "strains and stresses" of collective bargaining that set the theme for a three-day conference attended by union and management negotiators, arbitrators, university experts and government officials. (Additional story, Page 3.)

But there are worse things than strikes, he emphasized, including government intervention to help one side in a dispute and compulsory arbitration, "the favorite solution of some academic theorists."

There will inevitably be strikes "when the bargainers don't find an immediate settlement," but that possibility is an integral part of the collective bargaining process, Meany declared.

Despite the views of "ill-informed editorialists," a strike "doesn't signal the collapse of collective bargaining" and the agreement that ultimately brings an end to the strike "is itself hammered out at the bargaining table," he pointed out.

Earlier in the conference, Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson had deplored what he termed the "failures" of collective bargaining in the transportation and construction industries.

"Organized labor must realize that limitations on strike rights in disputes that can cause a massive disruption of the public welfare is a burning necessity," Hodgson said.

To "improve" collective bargaining, he said, and to avoid all-out government controls, the Administration's proposed emergency strike legislation for the transportation industry must be passed by Congress.

Meany's response was that "a free society cannot afford government efforts to undermine and short-circuit the collective bargaining process no matter how momentarily appetizing it may appear to the favored party."

Workable agreements, he insisted, must "be drawn by the people who know what the problems are, and what resources can be found and what compromises can be reached to resolve them."

Arbitration of disputes has a "respected and, I think, growing role in labor-management relations," he

Soaring Food Costs Pace Increase in CPI

The Consumer Price Index jumped another three-tenths of 1 percent in April with food prices leading the rise for the second consecutive month, the Labor Dept. reported.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics said food prices increased nine-tenths of 1 percent—an annual rate of nearly 12 percent—due mostly to poor weather in Florida and California which adversely affected fruit and vegetable crops, thus driving up prices.

The sharp April increase in food costs followed a heavy 1.1-percent increase in March—the worst since 1969.

The April increase in the CPI—which also was three-tenths of 1 percent on a seasonally adjusted basis—brought the government index to 120.2.

This meant that the same cross section of consumer goods and services that cost $10 in 1967, now costs $12.02.

And, the BLS reported, the same goods and services for which a typical city family paid $10 in the 1957-59 period are now priced at $13.98.

Although the April increase was the largest on an adjusted basis since January, the Administration viewed it as good news.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson commented that "the limited increase in the CPI for April is encouraging in our fight to resist infla-

Labor Presses Changes To End NLRB Delays

By Tom Castor

The AFL-CIO and several of its unions told a House subcommittee that bitter experience proves the need for amendments to the National Labor Relations Act to strengthen protection of workers' rights and cut down notorious procedural delays.

A package of amendments with those objectives has been introduced by Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N.J.), chairman of the House Special Labor subcommittee, which is holding hearings on the measure.

Union attorneys charged that delays in the labor board machinery have encouraged anti-union employers to violate the law in hopes of delaying recognition and possibly breaking a union's majority—and spirit.

There were denunciations of the NLRB itself for failure to make full use of its powers against employers guilty of unfair labor practices. It was characterized once as "cowardly," and once as "perilously close to being a fraud on unorganized workers in our area."

The Thompson amendments call specifically for three basic changes:

- Giving Labor Board trial examiners final authority in routine unfair labor practice cases—subject to discretionary review by the full board.
- Making NLRB orders self-

Human Tragedies Document Need For National Health Security Plan

Statistics and charts tell only part of the story of the medical care crisis in America. In human terms, the crisis is reflected in bankruptcies, lost family savings, canceled insurance policies and resultant huge debts.

In case after case, compiled and documented by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services, the medical care crisis becomes a human tragedy and reinforces organized labor's case in support of the National Health Security Program now before Congress.

A millwright from Jacksonville, Fla., contracted $6,263.90 in medical bills for his wife. His insurance covered only $1,124.25 of the total.

For two years this worker and his family reduced the balance due to approximately $2,000, but were constantly subjected to harassment by collection agencies and were finally sued by a doctor.

Close to a nervous breakdown and unable to meet the financial obligations, the worker filed for bankruptcy. The family's current medical expenses run $1,000 a year, with the distinct possibility of the need for further surgery for the wife.

The owner of a Fort Atkinson, Wis., laundermat felt the group health insurance he purchased for himself and his employes would pay most of his wife's medical bills when she contracted cancer in 1965.

After paying an initial batch of bills, the insurance company dissolved the group policy, leaving the owner and his workers without any coverage. Several insurance companies have refused to write insurance policies for his wife.

The woman is once again receiving treatment for cancer, including costly radium therapy. Her husband is now a janitor.

Another Wisconsin man also had his group health insurance policy canceled while he was in the hospital.

The company says it never received a quarterly payment the policyholder claims he sent. But the company never notified him the policy was canceled until it received a claim for x-rays.

The State Insurance Commission says the company is not required to send a cancellation notice. This man is left with medical bills totalling more than $1,500 and can't get individual insurance because of a slight heart murmur.

He sums up his plight: "I literally cannot afford to get sick in any way, shape or form."

An Austin, Tex., man used up his life savings to pay his father's medical bills. His father is 62 and not eligible for Medicare. The state says he's not eligible for Medicaid, because he receives $81 a month from social security.

This man asks why people have to lose their insurance when they retire at age 62, even though they are eligible for social security.

Alternate Health Plans Seen Distorting Issues

New York—The public should not be fooled by the "rhetoric" and the lofty claims of health care proposals put forth by groups opposed to National Health Security, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman warned.

"It's very important," Seidman declared, "to see whether the programs being offered by others really measure up to what has to be done to bring decent health care to all Americans."

He cited the alternative programs put forward by the Nixon Administration, the American Medical Association and private insurance companies.

Speaking at a labor relations lecture sponsored by the League for Industrial Democracy and the New School for Social Research, Seidman accused the AMA of distorting the real costs of quality health care.

"When you see figures for these programs, which are nothing but federal subsidies to private insurance companies, bear in mind that they make absolutely phoney comparisons," he stressed.

Seidman pointed out that the National Health Security program would cover 70 percent of the total personal health expenditures of all U.S. citizens.

"The labor-backed Kennedy-Griffiths bill is going to have real cost controls," he said, "whereas these other programs will be wide open."

He cited other advantages of the legislation sponsored by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy and Rep. Martha W. Griffiths and many other senators and House members.

"The Kennedy-Griffiths program will have incentives for quality, incentives for efficiency, incentives for restructuring the organization and delivery of medical care—all of which the Nixon and AMA proposals lack.

"And it's not going to rely on private insurance companies that have been largely responsible for the escalation of medical costs, taking the money of workers and employers and paying it for good care and bad care.

"There is no reason why we should continue that kind of health care system."

Seidman noted that hearings on National Health Security will begin in the House Ways & Means Committee next month, and he predicted a stiff battle.

The AMA is raising $1.5 million for advertising in an effort to "create confusion and hide the need for Health Security," he warned.

But he reaffirmed organized labor's determination to achieve the enactment of the Health Security program "before this Congress adjourns in 1972."

"If Congress enacts the wrong kind of legislation now, it could set us back for a generation," he warned. "This is our opportunity—an opportunity we will not have soon again—to bring quality health care to the American people."

Pamphlets Present Health Care Facts

Organized labor's case for the National Health Security program is explored in detail in a pamphlet and a legislative fact sheet issued by the AFL-CIO.

The 24-page pamphlet, Q & A on Health Security, discusses the program in question-and-answer format. It, along with the fact sheet, explain the basic aims and provisions of the National Health Security legislation that has wide bipartisan support in Congress.

Both the pamphlet and fact sheet are available at no cost from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Dennis Presses for Unity:

Rail Union Mergers Held Key to Growth

Miami Beach—Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks gave top priority at the union's 24th convention to two items of unfinished business—unifying the unions in the transportation industry and conducting a "massive" organizing campaign among airline employes.

The key to future union growth "is of course the merger of unions," Dennis told 1,300 delegates from railroad, airline, steamship and express lodges all over the United States and Canada.

"There are still far too many unions" in transportation, he emphasized. "The rivalries and disagreements which have risen from time to time have played into the hand of management. This must stop."

The convention gave a rising ovation to delegates from two unions now part of BRAC by merger—the former Transportation Communications Employes, consisting largely of telegraphers, and the former Railway Patrolmen. Each group is now a division of BRAC with its own elected officers.

It is apparent, Dennis said in his first report since the 1967 convention, "that we can best serve our members by finding equitable ways to amalgamate, affiliate or merge."

Stressing the need for intensified organizing, particularly on the air lines, Dennis observed that "half-hearted efforts in the past have been met with half-hearted responses. But now, airline employes have come to realize they are not part of one big happy family. They are not all going to become company vice presidents. They realize they must have a union . . . to protect their working conditions, seniority, pay rates and maintain their self-respect and dignity."

The BRAC president reported on bargaining developments since the last convention, focusing on the brief strike on all U.S. railroads which led to negotiation of "the greatest contract package of wage increases and adjusted benefits" in the brotherhood's history.

On the legislative front, Dennis pledged renewed efforts to win retirement for railroad workers at age 55 after 30 years of service, a fight "with all our strength" against compulsory arbitration, and a drive against airline mutual aid insurance agreements which "insure only that airline strikes are bound to last a long time."

The convention approved a committee recommendation to put a 65-year age limit on candidates for grand lodge office at future conventions, and to require that beginning July 1, 1975, all local, district and grand lodge officers resign at the close of the month in which they become 65.

Scheduled speakers at later sessions of the convention include AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Pres. Donald MacDonald of the Canadian Labor Congress, General Sec. Charles Blythe of the International Transport Workers Federation, Senators Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.) and John V. Tunney (D-Calif.), Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) and Assistant Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., who has been active as a mediator in railroad bargaining.

The delegates heard Dennis attack the economic programs of the Nixon Administration which he declared give the nation "a mix of reactionary economics peddled to the public like a box of soap."

"What we have in America today," he noted, is "rising unemployment, rising prices and rising anger at an Administration which, like Herbert Hoover's, keeps promising that prosperity is just around the corner."

The BRAC president also said that, while he has been a "loyal supporter for many years of our effort to stop the forces of Communist aggression" in Southeast Asia, "the time has come to end our role in Viet Nam. The nation's obligation now must be directed to the hard-pressed citizens of America."

Meany Warns on Threat Against Right to Strike

said. But the "essential ingredient" is "the free decision of both parties to arbitrate."

Meany had caustic words for government efforts to intervene in the bargaining process.

He described the Council of Economic Advisers as "those busybodies who helped create today's economic mess and who now seek to inject themselves into the basic steel negotiations before the parties have even begun to talk."

It's not just "because the Administration is seeking to stack the cards in management's favor, but because it is wrong for the Administration to interfere on behalf of either side."

And, Meany warned, "if the government dictates what wages workers will receive, it is simultaneously dictating what wages management must pay. And from there it isn't much of a step to dictating how many workers management shall employ, and how much it shall produce and what prices it shall charge and what profit it may make."

He referred to Federal Reserve Board Chairman Arthur Burns as "the economic tinkerer whose 'game plan' brought about the Nixon recession."

There may be some "short-sighted men in management" who agree with Burns that "workers should have a smaller share of the nation's economic pie" and who support his call for compulsory arbitration and wage restraints.

But, Meany warned, while the Burns policy "would undoubtedly hold down wages, it would also undermine the nation's consumer purchasing power, the lifeblood of our economy."

Meany suggested that some of the "misguided advice" of critics of present-day collective bargaining comes from a "complete misunderstanding" of its purpose.

Those who understand negotiations "know that problems are not created at the bargaining table. That's where they're solved."

At the bargaining table this year, Meany served notice, the labor movement will be seeking its "fair share of the economic pie, and we will not be intimidated, frightened or stopped. And we won't relinquish the right to bargain collectively any more than we will surrender the right to strike."

Unions, Management Participate:

3-Day Conference Probes Challenges to Bargaining

By David L. Perlman

New York—Men who normally sit on opposite sides of the bargaining table joined with a prominent group of mediators and university experts in a three-day exploration of new challenges to collective bargaining.

They were not expected to reach a consensus, and they didn't. They were urged to shun cliches and generalities, and for the most part they did. They were asked to explore "new thoughts, new plans, new paths." And this, too, they did.

The occasion was the third annual Collective Bargaining Forum sponsored by the Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations—a unique organization supported by both labor and management.

Binding together the wide divergence of views was a common commitment to the institute's statement of principles—"a belief that there is no viable alternative to collective bargaining for the settlement of disputes between workers and their employers, and that the most effective means of preventing strikes is by improving the techniques of bargaining and the skills of the practitioners."

The institute's president is AFL-CIO Sec-Treas. Lane Kirkland. Its board chairman is E. T. Klassen, top-level management executive who helps run the U.S. Postal Service. Union presidents and company presidents serve on its board of directors.

The administrative director of the institute is Theodore W. Kheel, New York's best-known mediator. Usually he uses his skills to nudge both sides towards a settlement. But at this conference, the goal was to bring about a lively interchange of views.

A session on arbitration provided a good example. Eugene Glover, secretary-treasurer of the Machinists, served as chairman. Prof. Benjamin Aaron of UCLA, a noted arbitrator, started things off by delivering a paper on "Contemporary Issues in the Grievance & Arbitration Process." Opening the discussion as commentators were Irving Abramson, general counsel of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and Malcolm Denise, Ford Motor Co. vice president.

Abramson had a grievance—with arbitrators.

The high cost of arbitration, compounded by the lengthy time it takes for arbitrators to hear cases and render a decision, is pricing a number of small locals out of this final step in the grievance procedure. Sometimes, he suggested, employers take advantage of this by letting grievances pile up.

But whether deliberate or not, Abramson warned, the inability to get grievances settled expeditiously is building up worker frustrations at a number of plants and there is increased talk of ditching the arbitration process and using the basic strike weapon to correct inequities on the job.

Before the session was over, proposals advanced and debated included:

- Elimination of transcripts as a money-saver. Several participants agreed this could be done most of the time.
- On-the-spot decisions by arbitrators, given orally at the end of the hearing, instead of lengthy—and costly—written decisions weeks later. Abramson said this certainly could be done in most cases. Prof. Aaron wasn't so sure. He personally would rather mull over a case than hand down an instant opinion.
- Free or government-subsidized arbitration services for small locals that couldn't afford $200-a-day arbitrators. But, a participant wondered, would unions screen out unjustified grievances or would the channels get clogged with cases that never should have gotten to arbitration?
- Training more young arbitrators to supplement an aging corps of old-timers. That, said the UCLA professor, was just what he had tried to do in California at the urging of both union and management people. The trouble was that no one wanted to use his trained but unknown young arbitrators. The case was always "too important" to take a chance on a novice.

At that session, union and management representatives grappled for practical answers to mutual problems. At some other sessions, the two sides crossed rhetorical swords. One such session matched the former chief negotiator for the nation's railroads with Machinists Vice Pres. William P. Winpinsinger.

Would a railroad strike be such a catastrophe that it must never be permitted to take place, Winpinsinger challenged. Aren't there alternative ways of shipping goods? Are we confusing public inconvenience with public necessity? And once you lock a segment of the economy into compulsory arbitration, don't expect to see any major innovations or breakthroughs in contract settlement. "Someone in the free sector will have to do it first."

Dr. George W. Taylor, one of the nation's most prominent mediators and labor relations theorists, explored the issues involved in government attempts to bring about "wage stabilization" and cautioned that the "tools" available for "fine tuning" of the nation's complex economy are "quite blunt."

Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne was chairman of that session and AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger was the commentator from the labor side.

The "restraints" the Administration is trying to impose, Goldfinger noted, are all one-sided and it is "hardly rational" to expect workers and their unions to accept controls that leave all other forms of income intact.

Inflation would have been much less of a problem today, Goldfinger suggested, if the Administration hadn't deliberately slowed down the economy and brought about production cutbacks in the name of combatting inflation.

The result was to push up unit labor costs and suppress the rise in productivity that would have permitted substantial wage increases without corresponding price increases.

Taylor was honored during the conference with a reception and a presentation citing his "leadership in promoting industrial democracy through effective collective bargaining." A number of his colleagues from the War Labor Board of the 1940s were on hand to join in the tribute.

The institute also honored the veteran labor editor of Business Week magazine, Edward T. Townsend, and his publication as well. Townsend was presented the Louis Stark Memorial Award, named after the late labor reporter of the New York Times, for his "contributions to public understanding of the collective bargaining process."

The bargaining process and related issues were explored also in other sessions, dealing with such topics as strikes, impasse procedures and pensions. Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock delivered a major paper on the impact of early retirement provisions in UAW contracts.

Prof. Charles C. Killingsworth of Michigan State University took a cool look at the Administration's proposal for emergency strike legislation governing transportation industries.

Present procedures certainly need improvement, he said, but is the solution "to erect a rather elaborate superstructure on the Taft-Hartley foundation?"

Departing somewhat from the direct bargaining arena, Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute chaired a panel on Social Issues & Divisions in the Labor Force. The principal speaker was Richard M. Scammon, the former U.S. Census Bureau director whose analysis of the factors influencing how people vote has a prominent place on the bookshelves of both the Democratic and Republican national committees. A panel of five commentators with widely ranging views followed Scammon to the microphone.

In addition to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Labor Sec. J. D. Hodgson, prominent guest speakers included George P. Shultz, the former labor secretary who now heads the key office of Management & the Budget from the White House. Britain's Secretary of State for Employment Robert L. Carr came to discuss that country's new labor disputes law, and so did Prof. Benjamin C. Roberts of the London School of Economics.

Philharmonic Series Slated For Unionists

New York—The New York Philharmonic will present a series of concerts to union members and their families June 17-27 through arrangements with the Performing Arts & Cultural Project of the New York City Central Labor Council.

Several of the nation's leading conductors and soloists will perform in a three-program series of 9 concerts that will be presented at community union halls and at Philharmonic Hall in Lincoln Center.

The cost of the three programs will be $6, of which $1 will benefit the labor council's Performing Arts & Cultural Project.

Conductors featured with the 106-member orchestra will be Aaron Copeland, Robert Shaw and Michael Tilson Thomas. Soloists will be Michael Rabin, violinist; William Warfield, baritone; Lorin Hollander, pianist, and Misha Dichter, pianist.

Plans for the concerts grew out of the Demonstration Arts Project undertaken by the New York central body in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Council for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes.

Trades Name Georgine As Secretary-Treasurer

Pres. Robert A. Georgine of the Wood, Wire & Metal Lathers has been named secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. by the department's executive council.

Announcement of the appointment was made by BCTD Pres. Frank Bonadio who recently succeeded C. J. Haggerty as head of the department representing 3.5 million workers in the building trades.

Georgine, 38, will relinquish the presidency of his union to join Bonadio in the administration of the department, which is composed of 17 unions in the construction trades.

A Chicago native, Georgine was the first member of his union to serve on the National Joint Board for the Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes in the construction industry.

He has served as financial secretary of the Illinois State Council of Lathers, as a member of the board of governors of the National Bureau of Lathing & Plastering, as the chairman of the Lathers' pension fund and as co-chairman of the National Lathing Industries Joint Apprenticeship Program.

Georgine attended the University of Illinois and DePaul University. He became a journeyman in 1953 with Local 74 of his union in Chicago. After military service, he returned in 1956 to work his way up through all of the elective offices of the local.

He also was assistant business manager of the Lathing Foundation in Chicago which promotes activities of the lathing industry.

He became an international representative of the union in 1964 and later served as assistant to the president before being elected to the presidency during the union's convention last summer in Vancouver, B.C.

Georgine and his wife, Mary, and their four children will move to Washington, D.C., from Park Ridge, Ill.

Grain Millers Approve Increase in Per Capita

Minneapolis—Delegates to the Grain Millers' 1971 convention unanimously approved a 50-cent increase in the per capita tax, bringing the monthly payment to $2.50 for the 35,000-member union.

The 400 delegates also re-elected Pres. Roy O. Wellborn and Sec.-Treas. H. A. Schneider as well as all nine members of the union's executive board.

Resolutions adopted included support for the AFL-CIO's drive for National Health Security and an immediate increase in the federal minimum wage to $2 an hour.

Al Barkan, director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education outlined for delegates the job that must be done in voter registration prior to the 1972 election.

And James Gildea, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, showed the necessity for union political action by detailing the economic failures of the Nixon Administration—particularly the "game plan" formulated by Dr. Arthur Burns, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board.

"The Administration said two years ago that its economic policies were not meant to hurt workers, but every move they have made has been at the expense of workers.

"Now they have picked union workers as the scapegoat to pay for their economic failures."

Gildea pointed to the wage guidelines issued by the Administration for construction workers and a recent "inflation alert" aimed at driving down prices in steel negotiations.

He charged that the Administration is trying to close the public's eyes to the real villain of inflation—soaring prices and profits—and to "blame inflation on inflation's victims: the workers of this land."

"Only workers are being asked to tighten their belts," he said. "Dr. Burns and his friends are not asking businessmen to lower their demands. Indeed, they are recommending tax cuts for businessmen."

Workers in every trade union are under fire, Gildea noted. He said Pres. Nixon can no longer conceal the fact that he is attacking a basic institution.

"And he can expect from labor a very basic response," Gildea said, pointing to the 1972 presidential election.

Issues in Public Employe Strikes Explored on Nationwide Television

The right of public employes to strike is a necessary adjunct of the collective bargaining process, a nationwide television audience was advised.

When that right is denied by law, serious bargaining is jeopardized, proponents contended.

The question, "should public employes have the right to strike?" was argued on the Public Broadcast Service program, the Advocates, and telecast over most of the 200 PBS affiliated stations.

Presented in a moot trial format, the program deals with a number of social and political issues. The decision comes from a mail poll of the viewing audience.

Prof. Howard B. Miller of the University of Southern California was the advocate for the proponents. William A. Rusher, publisher of the National Review, represented the opposition.

Rusher argued that the "right to strike is the right to destroy the government piecemeal."

Miller countered that public employes have shown the responsibility to avoid chaos even during unauthorized strikes. "No firemen have ever stood by and watched a building burn," he stressed.

Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes, one of the chief witnesses called by Miller, said that all workers should have the right to strike. He noted that only in fascist and Communist societies is the right denied.

"Workers can't take seriously the bargaining when the right to strike has been eliminated, when the mechanism is entirely employer dominated," Wurf declared.

Public employes are not obsessed with strikes, he said. They "are very conservative people. . . . But the reason they are going out on strike is because the mechanism has ceased to work. . . . They are frustrated because employers won't treat them with dignity, decency and reasonableness."

Wurf said public employes do not strike because they want to withhold their services from the people, but because they must deal with the politician-employer who tries to impose his unilateral settlement.

"The boss in private industry is likely to be much more responsible in terms of concern for his workers than a politician," the SCME president observed. He said the politician's career needs seem to be more important than good services or the well-being of the community.

Wurf singled out New York State's Taylor Law as being weighted in favor of the public employer. Although the statute prohibits legal strikes, Wurf said that it actually causes strikes.

Labor mediator Theodore Kheel described the Taylor Law as "Schizophrenic.

"It prohibits strikes," Kheel noted, "but says that public workers have the right to bargain collectively. That's a contradiction in terms."

Opponents of the right to strike for public employes contended that such workers should have the right to join unions and bargain collectively, but that the right to strike should be withheld.

Gov. Thomas J. Meskill of Connecticut argued that public employes would have en excessive amount of leverage at the bargaining table if they had legal sanction to strike.

Meskill conceded that public workers, including policemen and firemen, have conducted strikes "because these people are frustrated" by the system.

Robert Helsby, chairman of New York State's Public Employment Relations Board, defended the Taylor Law and its compulsory settlement process. He argued that "the right to strike is not essential in the bargaining process."

Folk Festival to Display Union Workers' Skills

Union skills as diverse as bottle blowing and sheep shearing will be featured in the Smithsonian's fifth annual Festival of American Folklife. The festival will focus on the folk skills of the American working man as a member of organized labor.

Ralph Rinzler, director of the festival, observed that the "development of the art of the American working man and the furthering of these arts in his organization into trade unions" is perhaps the "greatest example of the culture of the American people."

Union members from all parts of the country will gather at the National Mall in Washington, D.C., July 1-5. They will not only exhibit the products of their skills, but will perform their work and explain it to the public.

Labor historians, folklorists and union craftsmen will participate in workshops designed to emphasize the tradition of the labor movement in terms of craft, heritage and contribution to the American culture.

In addition, writers and singers of the music of the labor movement will give performances in an attempt to illuminate the historical basis and uses of labor songs.

The participating unions are all affiliated with the AFL-CIO. The Bakery & Confectionery Workers will demonstrate bread making and cake decorating. The Meat Cutters will present sheep shearing, meat cutting, and sausage making. The Iron Workers will erect a two-story building frame and hold a climbing contest involving union apprentices on one of the vertical beams. The Glass Bottle Blowers will demonstrate the traditional art of glass blowing. The Musicians will perform music on the daytime concert stage and at evening concerts as well.

This year's festival featuring the American working man will be the first of a six-year series of festival programs leading up to the Bicentennial year, 1976.

CLC Legislative Leader Andy Andras Dies at 58

Ottawa—Andy Andras, director of the legislation and government employes departments of the Canadian Labor Congress, died after a heart attack at St. John's, Newfoundland. He was 58.

Andras had held his final post since 1957. Before that he had been a staff member of the Railway, Transport & General Workers and assistant editor of Canadian Transport. CLC Pres. Donald MacDonald said workers in Canada have "lost an extremely gentle and knowledgeable friend."

Bell Offer Rejected:

CWA Membership Polled on Walkout

Members of the Communications Workers employed by the Bell Telephone System across the country were asked to give the union strike authority after the CWA executive board rejected the latest contract proposals from management.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne made the appeal in a televised "Membership Meeting of the Air" that was carried by 65 television stations May 23.

Beirne reported in the half-hour telecast that the 14-member CWA board turned down the offers of the Bell companies because of a "significant number" of unacceptable provisions.

Results of the secret mail balloting will be announced June 14, the opening day of the CWA's 33rd annual convention in Kansas City.

Twenty-four major contracts the CWA has with Bell System companies have expired. Eleven more will run out by Aug. 3.

Beirne stressed the inadequacies in the wage proposals of management, which come to about 11 percent in the first year of a three-year contract.

Noting that CWA members lost approximately 18 percent in "relative wage power" in the last three-year pact, Beirne said union economists have issued "a documented paper which proved the justification of a 25 percent increase right now."

The CWA leader was also critical of the 3 percent raises offered by the Bell System for the second and third years of the contract.

"The inequities in our industry are enormous," he said. "Our skilled craftsmen work side by side with people doing similar work and get in some cases about $50 a week less."

Although the Bell companies have offered a cost-of-living clause, Beirne said it was far less than needed by the workers to protect them against inflation.

He also charged that the companies had not taken into full account the productivity factor in their offers. For the past decade, "we averaged an increase of productivity of approximately 5.5 percent a year," he pointed out.

Other management proposals that the CWA board found unsatisfactory were in health, welfare, pensions, regional pay and the need for improved compensation for workers "who must go into the streets of a tough area at all hours."

Beirne said the union leadership recognizes the impact of the decision in favor of strike action. But he stressed that it is necessary to continue the "struggle to eliminate the inequities that exist in the communications industry."

The CWA is bargaining for a "pattern agreement" in negotiations with two major Bell companies—Western Electric and the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co.

Jack Kroll Dies at 86, Political Action Leader

Cincinnati—Jack Kroll, veteran political strategist for the CIO and later for the AFL-CIO, died at Jewish Hospital here May 24. He was 86.

Kroll had been a vice president of the Clothing Workers for 38 years and manager of the ACWA's Cincinnati joint board for 40 years until his retirement in 1966.

His diversified activities in the American labor movement also brought him to the leadership of the Ohio State AFL-CIO for eight years.

In a message to his widow and family, Federation Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said, "trade unionists everywhere honor Jack Kroll as one who helped inspire and lead the struggle for justice for all Americans."

"We mourn his loss as a friend and colleague," Meany and Kirkland said. "But his long and fruitful lifetime of effort in behalf of his fellow men remains a permanent value."

Kroll was born in London, England, in 1885, the son of a tailor. After emigrating to the United States, he became a cutter in a Rochester, N.Y., clothing factory. He joined the United Garment Workers in 1903. Following a strike in 1905, Kroll was blacklisted and moved to Chicago where he worked under an assumed name. He took part in a 1910 clothing workers strike that led to the formation of the ACWA.

Kroll served the union as an organizer in the Midwest and West from 1919 to 1926 when ACWA Pres. Sidney Hillman appointed him manager of the Cincinnati joint board. He was elected and reelected to the post in subsequent years. He became a vice president of the ACWA in 1928 and retained that office also until his retirement.

Kroll was elected president of the Ohio CIO in 1939. From 1943 to 1946 he headed the CIO Political Action Committee for the Ohio, Kentucky and West Virginia region.

He was named national chairman of the CIO's PAC in 1946 and served in that capacity until the merger of the AFL and the CIO in 1955. For the next two years he was co-director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

Kroll resumed his active role as manager of the ACWA's Cincinnati joint board in 1958. During this period, he also was president of the Ohio AFL-CIO.

ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky and Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum noted that, "over the years, Jack Kroll's principal contribution was in the area of political education and it is in this field that his name will be well-remembered."

Boston's Golden Circle Loses Its Glitter

Showcase of Electronics Industry Feels Job Crunch Caused by Slump, Imports

By Eugene A. Kelly

Boston—The sheen of the glittering Golden Circle—35 miles of supplier plants for the electronics industry—has been tarnished by crippling job layoffs and Boston fears the worst is yet to come.

Production workers by the thousands have been hurt by the job crunch caused by the general economic slump, cutbacks in federal funds, and the exportation of employment opportunities overseas by "runaway" manufacturers.

Industrial unemployment in Massachusetts is at the highest point since the end of the depression in 1940. Other New England states have been hurt even worse by the recession. But the Golden Circle—

This page represents another in a series of features by the AFL-CIO News as a prelude to the conference on the nation's unemployment problem scheduled by the federation next July 12-13 in Washington.

State Route 128—was the showcase of the region's booming electronics industry, and its decline reflects what's happening in many areas. The industry lost 107,000 electronics jobs in 1970 alone.

Until two years ago, things were pretty flush for the high-technology firms that dot the Golden Circle—more like a semicircle—from Gloucester in the North to Quincy in southern suburbia.

Government funds seemed to "flow from a spigot with no off handle," as a newsman put it. Then things started closing in—things like cuts in defense contracts, a clampdown on federal money for research and the rising tide of imports. The layoffs soon followed.

More than 3,000 technicians applied for jobless pay during a typical week last October. By December, the job carnage along the electronics highway was so noticeable that the Labor Dept. opened a special employment center near Route 128 to make things easier for 10,000 job-hunting scientists.

The Massachusetts Dept. of Employment Security said the state lost 61,000 manufacturing jobs in 1970. Nearly two thirds of the lost jobs are in the space and defense-related industries along the Golden Circle.

But nobody really knows how the unemployment is being felt, says Executive Sec.-Treas. Laurence C. Sullivan of the Greater Boston AFL-CIO. Pres. Nixon is "sitting on $11 billion that Congress gave him to spend" but "he won't use it to help us here," Sullivan commented. On the subject of the overseas runaways, he observed wryly: "Money has no loyalty. It salutes no flag."

If the empty plants on Route 128 are not evidence enough, AFL-CIO unions have a chart showing where production—and jobs—have gone: General Electric Co. jobs to 54 countries, starting with Argentina and ending with Venezuela, Philco-Ford to 30 countries, the Singer Co. to 29, International Telephone & Telegraph Co. to 29, Sperry Rand to 17, and on down the list of 41 major firms.

On the subject of lost jobs, Malcolm R. Lovell, Jr., assistant secretary of labor for manpower, expressed this philosophy in a Boston speech last November: the unemployed, he said, are "the inevitable casualties of transition from a wartime to a peacetime economy."

Indicating that the federal government had made little provision in advance to cushion the impact of job losses, he said: "Our policy is, let's do these things first"—reconverting the system—"then let's address ourselves to the human problems resulting from this transition."

The "human problems" include a sharp jump in unemployment in every New England state.

And the human problems of recession are most troublesome right now.

Peter DiCicco took office last November as president of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers District 2. He saw congressmen and senators, sponsored a half-hour TV program jointly with the Technical Engineers to alert the public that nothing was being done to attack the unemployment problem. He met with Gov. Francis Sargent and Commissioner Carroll T. Sheehan of the State Dept. of Commerce & Development.

"We asked the governor to call a meeting of New England governors to get a program started. He agreed to do so but not a wheel has turned since," said Arthur Gordon of DiCicco's staff.

"We produced a report showing how and why New England jobs could be increased by joint state, business and labor action. No action was taken.

"We had about 50,000 members before Nixon in this IUE district. Since then we have lost about 10,000 jobs—and more layoffs are coming."

Frank Every of Machinists District 38 reports that even for those who have escaped layoffs "things aren't good. Not many are working overtime. There's been some cutbacks to 32 hours, and we're in tough shape statewide."

At IBEW Local 1505 headquarters in Waltham, Mass., Business Rep. James F. Mulloney, a member of the IBEW international executive council, says "we have lost 3,000-odd jobs here due to cutbacks in the space and defense programs. Raytheon employment is down. The Sickles plant in Chicopee—General Instrument Co.—has dropped from 3,000 jobs to 600—all due to foreign imports."

The local, with diversified membership in 12 Boston area localities, is down to 12,000 members. Most of them work under contracts with extensive "bumping" rights to jobs.

"We have a unique type of hardship," Mulloney reports. "A lot of members are bumped out of a job, not laid off. They still have a job but at lower pay.

"A lot of people are unhappy, having to drive 50 or 60 miles from home to retain their seniority."

Most of the unions in the area have conducted vigorous campaigns to stimulate jobs and more hiring. Several joined in testifying before Congress committees on recovery programs. Among them were the IUE, IAM, IBEW and AFTE.

They agreed that when jobs are lost, the most immediate and direct victims are the most recently employed—and in many plants the majority are blacks, Puerto Ricans, Mexican-Americans, both men and women.

LAID OFF for the second time because of the impact of electronic imports, Mrs. Pauline Holmes discusses the problem with Bill Davis, IBEW steward at Raytheon plant in Quincy, Mass.

George Collins, assistant to IUE Pres. Paul Jennings, pictured the state of the industry this way to a congressional subcommittee:

"The Emerson TV plant in Jersey City is a startling example of what's wrong in industry. Nothing has been left there except an idle plant and a flashing electric sign to assure drivers leaving the Holland Tunnel that all is well with Emerson.

"But everything is not well. The fact is that 1,000 jobs were lost when radio production ceased in 1966, and another 1,000 when the company arranged to have all its TV sets made in Taiwan."

The most recent job fatality, Collins said, is in Memphis. RCA built a $20 million plant there five years ago and last December, just before Christmas, announced it was shutting down because sales were slumping.

The real reason, Collins says, was the transfer of TV set production to Taiwan. When profits are rated ahead of people, "there is no way management can be induced to change its mind."

Foreign Label for U.S. Arms? Hong Kong Move Protested

Burbank, Calif.—At least part of the nation's Safeguard anti-ballistic missile defense system will be produced in Hong Kong—just a few miles from Communist China—unless the Machinists can persuade Congress to block the move.

Pres. Jim Quillin of IAM District 727 reports that the Defense Dept. recently approved a request by Lockheed Electronics Corp., Commerce, Calif., to produce hardware for the ABM system at its Hong Kong plant.

Lockheed is a subcontractor for Western Electric Co., the manufacturing arm of the Bell Telephone System, on the building of memory core racks for the ABM. Machinists at Lockheed plants in the United States build all the components but assembly, specifically wiring the cores into frames, is being sent to Hong Kong.

The company claims it has to ship the work overseas "to keep its costs competitive." Quillin says that wage rates at Lockheed-Hong Kong are slightly more than $2 a day. He calls the Lockheed request and the subsequent Defense Dept. approval "a slap in the face for every jobless American."

When Lockheed made a similar move in 1969, the IAM protested to the Defense Dept. that this was a violation of the Armed Forces Procurement Regulations. But the Pentagon brass had read the fine print in the act. They responded with a blanket reply that the law requires only that at least half the components in a final product be manufactured in the United States and does not apply to assembly.

As a result, Lockheed has slashed its workforce at Commerce in half over the last two years, while the workforce at its Hong Kong plant has grown to 700—about 100 more than are now employed at Commerce.

This time, Quillin says he'll take the fight directly to Congress.

With thousands of aerospace and electronics workers jobless, he said, it is "unthinking and disgraceful for any agency of our government to approve the manufacture of defense items by any workers other than their own."

Quiet Campuses Reflect Squeeze In Job Market

Boston—College campuses in New England were "quieter" this spring, and student demonstrations or demands on placement directors and company recruiters almost totally absent because of the tight job market.

Edward T. O'Donnell, assistant director of the Boston regional office, reported to the Labor Dept. that "Spring 1971 was a season of frustration and unfilled employment hopes for many graduates of colleges and universities."

Not since 1958, in the opinion of placement directors, was the job outlook more clouded.

O'Donnell said the graduates found few firms, "and even fewer academic institutions," bidding for their services. He said teaching vacancies "were less plentiful than in any recent year."

Manufacturers made the deepest cut in hiring schedules, he reported. A heavy goods firm reduced its visiting schedule for recruiting purposes from 25 campuses in 1970 to 7 in 1971. It planned to make job offers to 7 seniors compared to its usual 28-30.

Another important manufacturer, O'Donnell said, will make offers to about one third as many engineers as last year.

He said two groups of candidates suffered most from the job slump—qualified black candidates and holders of certain advanced degrees, principally in physics and other sciences.

The Role of Bargaining

BOTH LABOR and management negotiators have their work cut out for them to reach just, fair and workable settlements in an economic climate that can only be described as difficult.

These problems are being compounded by the unusual amount of doctrinaire advice unions and managements are receiving about what decisions they should reach at the bargaining table. Not much of this advice is useful or constructive. Some of it adds up to dangerous interference with the machinery of collective bargaining.

A great deal of this misguided advice stems from a complete misunderstanding of what collective bargaining is.

Those critics who keep telling us, in the face of all the evidence, that collective bargaining won't work, look on the bargaining table as an arena of conflict from which victory emerges for one side and defeat for the other.

But those closest to collective bargaining, who understand how it works, know that problems are not created at the bargaining table. That's where they're solved.

And when the bargainers don't find an immediate settlement—when there is a strike—that too is part of the collective bargaining process. A strike isn't a tragedy; it doesn't signal the collapse of collective bargaining, no matter how often ill-informed editorialists profoundly declare the process dead.

I don't like strikes. As a matter of fact, I've never met a union leader who preferred a strike to a settlement. But I do like the right to strike. That right is essential to freedom; in fact, it is the hallmark of a free society. And, as Pres. Eisenhower said, "There are some things worse, much worse, than strikes. One of them is loss of freedom."

SOMETHING LIKE 97 percent or 98 percent of collective bargaining negotiations are settled without a strike. This is a good record. We should do better. I hope we will do better. But we must not tamper with the right to strike—that's too basic to a free society.

So we think quite highly of the collective bargaining process and quite scornfully of those who routinely write its obituary.

And we view with real hostility those who would try to destroy collective bargaining between employer and employe no matter what weapon they use—government intervention in favor of one side; naked union-busting or the favorite solution of some academic theorists, compulsory arbitration.

We know collective bargaining is not a perfect instrument. It couldn't be for it is the creation of imperfect men. But it does work. And, in my book, that's the test of democratic devices.

Obviously, successful collective bargaining agreements can't be concluded except by the free consent of the people who have to live with them. Such agreements have to produce specific solutions to specific problems. They have to be drawn by the people who know what the problems are.

Of course, the parties can agree to let an impartial umpire decide disputed issues. That method, voluntary arbitration, has a respected and, I think, growing role in labor-management relations. But once again it is the element of free choice—the free decision of both parties to arbitrate—that is the essential ingredient.

Russian Nationalistic Conflicts Make Test Case of Soviet Jews

By John P. Roche

WELL, THE SOVIETS are back at it again with a new Leningrad trial and the conviction of more Jews alleged to have plotted to escape to Israel. At the same time, it is also true that a couple of thousand Soviet Jews have been quitely permitted to emigrate over the past year or so.

Obviously the bureaucracy is in a dilemma and the reason is not hard to find: in demographic terms, Russia is running short of Russians. Within 10 or 20 years it seems as though the Russians (who currently constitute 53.4 percent of the Soviet total) will be a minority and projections indicate that by the year 2000 the Slavs (Russians, Ukrainians, and smaller ethnic groups) will be outnumbered.

From the time of the Bolshevik Revolution, Soviet policy on nationalities has been based on the proposition that individual ethnic groups (Tartars, Uzbeks, Ukrainians, and as many as 200 others) were encouraged to develop a cultural pattern "national in form, socialist in content." That is, an Armenian could continue to learn his language, sing his folk songs, and so forth, but the whole environment of this Armenian culture was to be pervaded by the principles of Marx, Lenin, and Stalin.

In fact, while durable traditions like the Armenian, the Georgian or the Moslem tribes of Central Asia survived, there was tremendous pressure for Russification, for what critics attacked as "Great Russian chauvinism." Russian (like Mandarin in Red China) became the language of success, the language of higher education and admission to the bureaucratic elite.

This Russian pressure-cooker created tremendous resentment and generated appalling purges in Stalin's era. No one will ever know how many Tartars were killed in their brutal displacement from the Crimea during World War II. Accused of "petty bourgeois nationalism," they were considered "objective" allies of the Nazis.

Which brings us back to the estimated 3 million Soviet Jews and the problem they create for the regime. If ever a domino theory was applicable, this is the place. If the Soviet Jews successfully assert their rights against the nationality policy, down goes the first domino. It then hits the second domino.

A Newsweek story relates the frank desire of a number of Soviet Armenians, born in the United States but hauled back to Soviet Armenia as children by their optimistic parents, to "go home," that is, to the United States.

The Jews and the Armenians in this special category differ from the other Soviet national minorities in that they have an alternative homeland: Israel and the United States. And they have friends outside who are prepared to make noise on their behalf.

But the wise policy—to simply hand them passports and dump them over the Soviet border—would not keep the dominoes from falling. Why? Because it would indicate that if you make enough trouble, Moscow will make concessions. It would undermine the ideological validity of the whole nationalistic policy. Every militant nationality would start planning its campaign to escape Russification.

AND WHAT ABOUT the future, when the Russians are in a minority in "their" country? It is inconceivable that they will let go of the levers of power, and the greatest potential threat to their hegemony arises from the nationalist ambitions of the still stubborn and unintimidated component cultures of that vast land. So the dominoes must not fall.

Which means that the Jews—the test case—must be dealt with vigorously and successfully. One technique is to apply the penal apparatus; another is to allow other potential leaders of Jewish resistance to go quietly to Israel.

By a combination of these devices, the regime obviously hopes to behead Soviet Jewry, to leave it an inchoate mass of leaderless individuals who will passively succumb to Russification.

Bayard Rustin Says:

'Black English' Would Sacrifice Negro Economic Advancement

CONSIDERING THE HISTORY of the separation of the races in America, and considering also the mutual misunderstanding and fear that has accompanied such separation, it is not surprising that the gross distortions of the past are carried into the present even by some of those who claim to be committed to racial justice and reconciliation.

In keeping with the mood of the times, the updating of old racial myths has taken the form of cults of one sort or another. There is always some "new" angle to the race problem, or some new gimmick that people latch onto in the hope of finding a short-cut solution.

But easy answers always indulge in racial mythology because they must—if they are to be easy answers—obscure the depth of the race problem. Today's cultists are the natural descendants of the procreators of all our racial stereotypes.

One of the new cults is "black English." Recently, some 250 linguistics experts, teachers and students (most of them white) met to discuss "Black English: Myth or Reality?" According to a New York Times report, the "experts" seemed convinced that "black English" is very much a reality. ("black English," according to these "experts" is saying "where Charlie?" instead of "where is Charlie?")

"Experts," the report noted, "now say that black English has an identity independent of white dialects of English." They also feel that it might be best to teach black children in their native tongue rather than force them into the difficult situation of using English.

There is already a course in "black English" being taught at Brooklyn College by a woman who heads a "language curriculum research project" that is financed by a $65,000 Ford Foundation grant.

No doubt the motives of some of these new "black linguistics experts" are sincere. They want to see black children learn, but do they want to prepare them for life outside the ghetto? Do they want to see them become first-class citizens? "Black English," after all, has nothing to do with blackness but derives from the conditions of lower-class life in the South (poor southern whites also speak "black English").

Reinforcing this consequence of poverty will only perpetuate poverty since it will prevent black children from mastering the means of communication in an advanced technological society with a highly educated population.

I am sure there are some black proponents of "black English" who feel that we must retain our racial distinctiveness and avoid the self-negating process of assimilation. But this is really a false issue.

Immigrants who were much more foreign to American culture than Negroes realized when they arrived in America that in order to succeed they had to master certain skills, and they did so while retaining their ethnic distinctiveness. The lesson of the last decade is that the "melting pot" is a myth, not because some ethnic groups have made it while others have not, but because even those at the same economic level retain distinctive characteristics.

THE PROBLEM with many "black cultists" is that they are willing to sacrifice economic advancement in the name of separate peoplehood without realizing that the unique history and character of black Americans will survive economic assimilation and the achievement of first-class citizenship.

Our long experience with Jim Crow should have told us by now that there are many people in America who are not sympathetic to our struggle for racial equality.

The new coalition of "liberals" who romanticize the characteristics of black poverty and foundation executives who are looking for a cheap solution to racial injustice is just one more obstacle that we will have to fight.

A recent editorial in The Crisis, the publication of the NAACP, spoke forcefully and to the point about the cult of "black English."

"Black parents throughout this nation should rise up in unanimous condemnation of this insidious conspiracy to cripple their children permanently. . . .

"Let the black voice of protest resound thunderously throughout the land!"

Cost Control, Coverage Lags:

Nixon Health Care Plan Scored For Its 'Shocking' Deficiencies

THE ADMINISTRATION'S health care proposals are "shockingly inadequate" because they fail to spell out effective cost controls and exclude large groups of workers from coverage, AFL-CIO social insurance expert Bert Seidman charged.

Stressing that medical and health costs are rising twice as fast as the general cost of living, the social security director pointed out that the Nixon bill would reimburse providers of care "by the same method that has proven so inflationary." Seidman said there is little reason to believe that private insurance companies would try to hold down health care costs any more in the future than they have in the past.

"The private insurance companies have been in this business for a long time," he asserted, but have done little to control costs or provide incentives for quality care. "They have simply taken the money provided by employers and employes and passed it on to the providers of care—the hospitals, the doctors and others," he added.

Seidman appeared on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

The entire cost of medical care in this country amounted to $70 billion last year, Seidman said, noting that "the Kennedy-Griffiths bill would cover 70 percent of what is called 'personal health expenditures,' which is the bulk of that $70 billion."

Seidman said that many of those most in need of medical and health services would get no protection at all under the Nixon proposals, citing the exclusion of part-time workers, the unemployed and migratory workers from coverage. He said it would also be very difficult for low-income workers to participate in the program, since they would have to pay "very heavy out-of-pocket costs" in order to qualify.

SEIDMAN RENEWED the call for passage of the Kennedy-Griffiths National Health Security bill now pending in both houses of Congress. He said that although the American Medical Association and others strongly oppose the measure, it is doubtful that they will be able to delay the program as long as they delayed Medicare.

The AMA has engaged one of the top advertising agencies in the country with a budget of $1.5 million to promote its alternative health program while fighting National Health Security, Seidman declared.

He said that more than 100 senators and representatives from both political parties have already joined as sponsors of the Kennedy-Griffiths bill, and that public support for the measure is growing. He cited the results of a recent Harris poll showing a 55 percent to 30 percent national preference for the Kennedy-Griffiths approach over the Nixon approach.

National Health Security remains the number-one legislative goal of the AFL-CIO, Seidman stressed.

"We're all very much committed to making sure that we do everything possible to achieve enactment" of the bill in the 92nd Congress, he added, "before it goes home in 1972."

Reporters questioning Seidman were Judith Randal of the Washington Evening Star and Tom Foley of the Los Angeles Times.

WHENEVER the United States has suffered from an unfavorable trade balance or its balance of payments got out of whack, the finger of blame has been pointed at organized labor. American workers were pricing the United States out of the market, was the line.

Now, when the dollar is in trouble abroad, American economists and the press have begun to point out that a major factor has been the huge and uncontrolled investment of American capital abroad to take advantage of cheap labor and profitable speculation in foreign currencies.

"The expansion (via Eurodollars) of U.S. corporate investment in Common Market subsidiaries" was listed by Life as one of the major reasons for today's dollar crisis. "More bad news for the dollar," said the Wall Street Journal, "a host of bankers, multinational corporations, speculators and other money jugglers" are betting against the dollar.

What has happened in the world's money markets and international trade should come as no surprise. The United States has been pouring dollars into foreign countries ever since the end of World War II without bringing them home again as rapidly as it should.

Much of this was inevitable: the Marshall Plan to help the war-stricken world get back on its feet again, the maintenance of a large American military force both in Europe and Asia, the Viet Nam war, American tourism with its huge expenditures abroad, and imports of steel, textiles, shoes, what-have-you, produced by runaway American capital that has cost thousands of American jobs.

All these factors have been emphasized in the press and in government circles for many years. The one sacred cow has been the startling and vast growth of American private investment abroad. How much is it now? The statistics vary from $60 billion to $100 billion.

The figures for just the past decade are huge in themselves. In 1960, U.S. firms invested $3.8 billion in their foreign subsidiaries. In 1970, they invested $13.2 billion. This year, the amount is expected to rise to $15 billion with $8 billion projected to be spent in manufacturing alone.

PROFITS EARNED by the foreign operations of U.S. corporations are not taxed until they are repatriated, which, say labor economists, "may never happen." This fact alone goes a long way to point up the privileged position of American corporations whose multinational activities, to the detriment of the dollar and American jobs, are not only approved but aided by the government.

American labor is demanding a complete reassessment of American trade policy, not as an enemy of "free trade" but as a critic of an outmoded approach to outmoded conditions which no longer exist as they did half a century ago.

Labor economists want new tax measures to discourage, instead of encouraging, the huge flow of American investment abroad at the expense of jobs and, now, the very stability of the dollar.

They demand, above all, that profits earned abroad be taxed when they are earned—as everyone else's income is—rather than deferred. These profits, in the hundreds of millions, in effect represent free loans to American corporations to build up further competition for American industry and to be used by U.S. corporate speculators to make more money at the expense of the dollar and the American taxpayer.

Labor wants clear legislative mandates for the President to regulate and supervise the outflow of U.S. capital, not in terms of the private interests concerned, but in terms of the public interest here at home. In addition, it wants curbs on the export of American technology, establishment of fair labor standards and other conditions that will help create a truly competitive world market that is not based on pitifully low wages in many parts of the world and speculation in foreign currencies.

FAILURE TO SPELL OUT effective cost controls and exclusion of many workers render Pres. Nixon's health proposals "shockingly inadequate," AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, center, charged on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Judith Randal, left, of the Washington Evening Star and Tom Foley of the Los Angeles Times. The AFL-CIO produced interview is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual Radio.

How to Buy:

Mail Order Health Plan Policies Often Riddled with Loopholes

By Sidney Margolius

MODERATE-INCOME families frightened by the sharp rise in medical and hospital costs have become the target of an increasing barrage of newspaper and radio advertising for mail order health insurance policies.

In fact, letters asking for evaluations of such policies have become the leading reader inquiry that we get. Such pleas for assistance come from both retired people whose group insurance has run out, and younger families worried about rising costs in comparison to present coverage.

Medical costs in general, but excluding medicines, have gone up 85 percent in a little over 10 years. The runaway costs of hospital care are especially terrifying. Hospital charges have gone up 200 percent in that period and 44 percent in the past four years. More increases are coming. Various regional Blue Cross plans have filed for rate hikes this year of 14 to 46 percent.

So you can see why an increasing number of mail order sellers have jumped into the health insurance business with what seem like low-priced policies. Unfortunately, there are not many places where you can get an evaluation of a policy.

You may be able to get some information about the company's reputation from your local Better Business Bureau but not an evaluation of the policy itself. Your state insurance department can tell you if the company is licensed in your state, which can be of some help later if there is actually a subsequent breach of the contract. But this is not much help in choosing a policy because the actual contracts may be more specific than the ads.

Actually, the meager information provided is not the fault of the readers as much as of the insurance companies and the newspapers and radio stations which carry this advertising. The ads give little information about the limitations, and the contracts themselves are hard to understand.

The real problem is rejection of claims on the basis of "pre-existing conditions." Some mail order sellers will enroll you with no medical exam. But one of the largest such sellers then does its underwriting on the claims; cancelling after the claims come in, to make up for the initial non-selectivity.

The loophole in many of the mail order health insurance contracts is this provision: "No claim or loss incurred after two years from the date of this policy shall be reduced or denied on the ground that a disease or physical condition not excluded from coverage by name or specific description effective on the date of loss had existed prior to the effective date of coverage of this policy."

NOW THAT SOUNDS like a helpful, beneficial provision. But not that phrase "after two years." The St. Louis Better Business Bureau points out that translated into simple English, this paragraph means that there is a two-year waiting period for coverage on any disease or physical condition that existed prior to the effective date of the policy. Since almost anything can be considered a previous illness except an accident, there are few diseases or conditions which do not exist before hospitalization may be required, even though they had not been previously treated or diagnosed.

There is no doubt that state insurance departments and the Federal Trade Commission should require more information in ads about the potential cancellations, or even forbid such blanket two-year provisions for pre-existing conditions.

The only ultimate solution to the problems of booming health-care costs is national health insurance combined with programs to restrain rising costs. Meanwhile, it is best for retirees to see if they can get into Blue Cross "65" plans.

Younger families who already have Blue Cross or other group hospital insurance may not need additional insurance. If you feel your coverage is too limited, many Blue Cross plans will provide supplementary coverage at a moderate extra cost. That "$100 a week" or "$400 a month" is not as useful as it sounds in an era when costs of hospital care are approaching $100 a day in many large cities.

Carelessness Costly:

Dangers Abound On Power Mowers

THE POWER MOWER is one of the greatest inventions since grass but too often it becomes a dangerous weapon when it is used by amateurs and children. The cutting blades of a rotary mower spin up to 4,000 revolutions per minute and the blade tips achieve velocities of 200 miles per hour generating a force of more than 10,000 pounds per square inch.

If the power mower were a machine in a factory, the operator would probably be required to wear safety goggles and steel tipped shoes. But all too many home do-it-yourselfers fail to take the business of mowing the lawn seriously. Relaxing at home, they mow in bare feet or sandals, and in long sleeved or loose clothes that can easily catch in the machine.

And the latest trend in power mowers—the riding type—makes the work even easier. However, this type of mower has its own special hazards. The National Safety Council recommends that you give it the same respect that you would the family car.

Read and be sure that you understand the instructor's manual. Riding mowers have some rules that differ from the push type.

For example, when using push type mowers on a slope, you would walk behind the mower along the side of the hill as in contour farming. But with a riding mower you go directly up and down a slope since the mower is more stable in this direction. If the slope is too steep, however, it is best not to mow it with a power mower at all.

Before you start mowing, clear the area of any debris. It is surprising what a pre-cutting inspection of a play area will reveal—small toys, blocks, rocks. Any of these can become missiles which will injure bystanders if picked up and thrown by the mower.

It is a good idea to keep everyone, especially children away from the area while you are mowing. Children are likely to run in front of you, or try to chase the machine. A tiny foot can slip in the blink of an eye—too quickly for you to take the action necessary to prevent an accident. Always check behind a mower before you back up to be sure that a child hasn't come into the area while you were working.

NEVER ALLOW CHILDREN, or any adults who have not had the proper instruction, to operate the machine. Children and young teenagers cannot appreciate the hazards of this machinery and they do not know how to handle it properly in an emergency.

In many cases it is too heavy for them to control, even if they know what they are doing. The safest thing to do is keep children and power mowers of any type separated.

Never leave the mower running when you are not operating it. Stop the engine and take the keys with you if you must stop before you have completed the job. Don't take a chance on letting someone else's curiosity get away with your power mower.

But some of the most devastating accidents have occurred when the person who was driving the mower took on passengers. Many children have fallen from the laps of their parents while they were mowing the lawn. Thinking to give their child some fun, they are actually endangering their life and limb. Several parents have run over their own children when they have fallen directly in the path of the mower.

Soup to Nonsense:

Those Sincere-Sounding Fibs Can Really Backfire on You

By Jane Goodsell

I HAVE THIS uncanny ability to tell lies more convincingly than I tell the truth. I sound so direct, so sincere, so—well, honest. And my fibs keep coming back to haunt me.

Roughly a decade ago, a friend sent me as a birthday gift a scarf in different shades of lavender. Now lavender happens to be a color I just plain don't like. But naturally I couldn't tell my friend that. I mean it would have been downright churlish. So I wrote her a note thanking her greatly for my gift. I said that it was just what I needed and that it was a lovely and very becoming shade, one that I particularly liked. After all, it was nice of her to send it to me, and I was only trying to be polite.

From that day to this, my friend has never sent me anything that isn't lavender. She has showered me with lavender writing paper, lavender slips and lavender handkerchiefs.

Then there was the lady who invited me to her home to participate in a seance. Instead of hurting her feelings by telling her truthfully that I would sooner spend an evening having my teeth drilled, I said that I was terribly sorry but we had a previous engagement.

Ten minutes later she called me back. She could tell from my voice, she said, how disappointed I was at having to refuse her invitation. And so, purely for my benefit, she was arranging another evening with the spirits. What date would be most convenient for me?

On another occasion I attended a dinner party at which caviar was served. It was served with a good deal of fuss and flourish, which I guess it deserves if you happen to like it, which I happen not to. But, to my credit, I ate it. I even smacked my lips and burbled that it was delicious.

I was gulping down a whole glass of water when my host reached over and put another large dollop on my plate. Beaming on me fondly, he said that a mere taste was not enough for a true lover of caviar like me.

WHEN I SPEAK from the bottom of my heart, I appear shifty-eyed and insincere. I tell a friend honestly that I like her dress, and she answers that she knows as well as I do that it makes her look fat. When I say, "How interesting!" and mean it, the other person gives me an odd look and drops the subject.

Obviously, I sound most sincere when I don't mean a word I'm saying. And when I tell the truth, I sound like a child who's been prodded by her mother into parroting a wooden pleasantry.

Union Label Stamped on Solid South

The biggest-ever Union-Industries Show ran for six days in the Atlanta Civic Center. A record 300 exhibitors displayed the products of AFL-CIO craftsmen and the services of skilled union workers.

Attendance exceeded expectations in the biggest city of the South, an area in which organized labor has had a long and continuing struggle for recognition of its contribution to the nation's economic development.

Show director Edward P. Murphy, secretary-treasurer of the federation's Union Label & Service Trades Dept., declared that labor now has stamped its label on Atlanta with an outstanding performance.

ILO Maps Expansion Of Education Program

Geneva—The International Labor Organization plans to expand its workers' education program in recognition of the "fundamental human right" that entitles everyone to "opportunities of education, training and retraining throughout his life."

AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis warmly welcomed the guidelines set at the two-week session for the ILO program because of the emphasis placed on the needs in industrialized as well as developing countries.

In the industrialized nations, the conference said in its final report, "new educational needs arise from workers' aspirations towards economic democracy and greater participation" in decision-making.

Increased collaboration between the ILO and worker educators in the United States and Europe can be of benefit to all because "there are many things we can learn from each other's experiences," Davis commented.

He attended the session as one of the 32 consultants called upon by the ILO to help shape its program to aid trade unions in their educational work.

Discussing the conference's work, Davis noted the emphasis that had been placed on the need to inform workers of the facts behind the moves of big companies operating in a number of countries.

"This means," Davis said, "that workers' education will be getting into the question of the runaway corporation, a matter of prime importance to us because of the American unemployment situation.

"We feel that it is important that workers everywhere be able to fully comprehend that foreign companies investing in their country may well mean loss of jobs for workers in other countries."

Because of the growing acceptance of education as a continuing process, the conference stressed the "urgent" need for workers to be granted paid educational leaves.

Such leaves are needed, it was stated, "not only for vocational training but also for the social, economic, civil and cultural education required by the worker to fulfill his personality and his place in society."

Workers' education under the responsibility of trade unions is an "indispensable and integral part of an educational system geared to social and economic developments," the consultants said.

"The ILO should not only promote and assist trade unions and workers' education bodies in this work but also solicit and secure the understanding and support of governments, employers and other sectors of society," they recommended.

A "bold and imaginative initiative" was urged on the ILO in the use of new educational tools. In particular, attention was drawn to newly developed audio-visual equipment and special teaching "kits" of material designed to enable workers at a given level of education to grasp a subject.

"The design, construction and distribution of such appropriately graded kits by the ILO Workers' Education Branch could make possible a spectacular extension of workers education activities," the consultants found.

Factory Jobs Still Dropping, Report Shows

Factory employment in the United States continued to show serious weakness as the Labor Dept. said statistics for March and for the past year reflect "reduced demand for workers in the manufacturing industries."

New hires during March edged up slightly for the second straight month, but this was countered by an increase in layoffs and no change in the low quit rate which reflects the chances of workers to get new jobs.

On an annual basis, new factory hires dropped from 26 to 22 per thousand workers, or 15 percent. Job vacancies fell from eight per thousand to four, or 50 percent. Total employment in manufacturing also dropped over the year primarily as a result of job cutbacks in the durable goods industries.

In March a year ago there were 14,385,000 production workers on manufacturing payrolls. In March of this year jobs had dropped to 13,357,000. Most of the drop came in the durable goods industries where employment over the year fell from 8,379,000 to 7,538,000. Although production jobs fell in nondurable, too, the loss—from 6,006,000 to 5,819,000—was proportionately somewhat less.

Labor Law Changes Sought To Strengthen Protections

enforcing unless appealed within 45 days.

- Authorizing workers discharged unfairly for union activity or membership to sue for treble damages.

AFL-CIO Associate General Counsel Thomas E. Harris testified on behalf of the first two measures, but opposed the third.

"It puts the burden of enforcement on the individual worker," he said, noting at the same time that present remedies for this type of discrimination are inadequate and that it represents the most common unfair labor practice.

"It would rely for enforcement on private litigation rather than on the board's process. We think that would be a mistake. The overall objective of the NLRB is to promote industrial peace by safeguarding the right of employes to join unions and bargain collectively if a majority of them so choose.

"These objectives are not promoted by encouraging litigation. Indeed, litigation is anathema to successful labor relations."

He said, too, that "relying on the cupidity of lawyers in private practice is a poor way of enforcing federal policies," and undercuts the principle of unified enforcement and interpretation of the act by the NLRB.

Instead, Harris called for tougher enforcement powers for the board, rewriting of the law to give the board authority to order compensation for workers who suffer discrimination, and repeal of a section making injunctions mandatory—with no prior board hearing—in the case of unfair labor practices by unions.

The mandatory injunction, he said, is "the most flagrant inequity in the act's scheme" because "no such mandatory remedy is available to unions or employes for such common employer violations as discriminatory discharges and refusals to bargain."

Endorsing the proposal to give trial examiners final authority on routine unfair labor practice cases, Harris pointed to the Civil Service Commission's stringent requirements for appointment as a trial examiner.

"The ever-mounting caseload of the board has increased the need for the proposed alleviation," he said. He reminded the subcommittee that the federation had supported a similar proposal 10 years ago.

"To be blunt, the opposition comes simply from people who don't want the Labor Act to work any better as respects effective protection of the rights it purportedly guarantees to employes."

He also outlined the AFL-CIO's support of the proposal to make NLRB orders self-enforcing unless appealed within 45 days. Nearly every subcommittee witness from organized labor had a multitude of examples of employers taking advantage of procedural delays under the act.

Stephen I. Schlossberg, general counsel for the Auto Workers, told the subcommittee that the changes proposed by Thompson would "go a long way, but not far enough in providing faster, more effective administration . . . and adequate relief to victims."

"It is an open secret," he declared, "that the delays are so great that it has become profitable for employers to resist unionization by every means possible, irrespective of the legality of its actions.

"The employer has learned that even if it loses the legal battle before the Labor Board, the fight has more often than not taken so long that the employes and their union have lost the war . . . and at very small expense (to the employer).

"Normal turnover, employer pressure, frustration and the passage of time have combined to do that which the employer was unable to legally accomplish—unionization has been thwarted."

Patricia Eames, general counsel for the Textile Workers Union of America, cited the notorious labor law violations of the J. P. Stevens Co. which apparently is unabashed by the TWUA winning 116 discriminatory dismissal cases against it and by back pay orders totaling $1,073,000.

She charged that many employers, particularly in the South "pursue a pre-planned course of action, the same in case after case, to violate the law."

"They first endeavor unlawfully to prevent working people from organizing unions, and if that is not successful, they unlawfully proceed to ignore the employes' choice and . . . fail to bargain in good faith.

"They are able to do so," her statement said, "because the law was written to state these guarantees, but not to enforce them, and because the agency which is supposed to enforce the law, the NLRB, lacks certain powers necessary to enforce the law, and refuses effectively to exercise important powers of law enforcement which it does have."

It was she who called the board "cowardly."

Bernard Kleiman, general counsel of the Steelworkers, took the board to task for refusing to make greater use of special remedies it does have, such as injunctions.

Kleiman said that in Fiscal 1969, the NLRB sought injunctive relief on behalf of unions in only 11 cases—even though 1,600 complaints by unions were filed.

"Plain common sense and the laws of probability suggest that in 1,600 cases more than 11 warrant injunctive relief" he said.

One of the NLRB's glaring weaknesses, Kleiman said, is its proven ineffectiveness against determined violators." The other is the "intolerable" length of time it takes to process both election and unfair practice cases.

"Employers make free choice to violate the law in order to perpetuate substandard wages and conditions. The act should be administered in a way which would deter such violations. Yet it is precisely in these areas where the board should have the most impact, that it has proven least effective."

Steelworkers Organizing Director Elmer Chatak cited the case of Insilco Corp., Meriden, Conn., as an illustration of the delays in a representation case.

It took 40 procedural steps from April 7, 1970, to May 17, 1971, before an election date was set. The union won, but since there is a question about the appropriate bargaining unit, an unfair practice charge may result, causing further delays.

"We are talking about a possible four- to five-year delay in the NLRB machinery and five- to six-year delay from the workers' original bid for collective bargaining rights," he said.

James E. Youngdahl, a Little Rock, Ark. lawyer representing the Woodworkers, detailed the case of the Herman Wilson Lumber Co. which built a plant 10 years ago in Monticello, Ark.

Eight years ago, a majority of the employes signed union cards. Five years ago, they voted to be represented by the Woodworkers, but they still have no contract and work under "minimal wages and conditions." The union is looking forward to a bargaining order sometime later this year.

While the case may not be typical, Youngdahl said, "its components are typical of the frustration of hundreds of organizing situations, particularly in small Southern communities.

"Somehow the democratic process of labor-management negotiations has broken down, and the law has been insufficient to restore it."

Massive Program Backed:

U.S. Aid Held Key To Day-Care Needs

Providing comprehensive day-care for the children of working mothers is too big a job for private organizations and requires federal action, a panel of labor representatives told a Senate subcommittee conducting hearings on the proposed Child Development Act.

The bill would provide for establishment of a federal day-care system for children from birth to the age of 14 through a series of Child Development Councils on which a cross-section of the community would be represented.

The proposed legislation calls for funding of up to $13 billion over three years.

Testifying on support of the bill were Assistant AFL-CIO Legislative Director Kenneth Young, and Legislative Representatives Evelyn Dubrow of the Ladies' Garment Workers and Jane O'Grady of the Clothing Workers.

Young told members of the subcommittee on children and youth of the Senate Labor & Public Welfare Committee that "far too many people in both the executive and legislative branches of our government are demanding that the mother get off the welfare rolls—even when it means the minimum of custodial care, or no care at all for her children.

"The present welfare crisis has led to an increased emphasis in finding jobs for mothers and a decreased interest in providing decent care for their children."

Young cited a survey conducted by the Women's Bureau of the Labor Dept. in 1965 showing that of the 12.3 million children under 14 whose mothers worked, 46 percent were cared for at home, 16 percent by relatives outside the home and 15 percent by mothers on the job.

Eight percent were left to care for themselves and only 2 percent were enrolled in any kind of day-care center.

Moreover, the number of women workers is expected to grow rapidly in the years to come, and in fact, is expected to increase faster than the number of men working, Young pointed out.

It is estimated that by 1980, the labor force will include more than 5 million mothers between the ages of 20 and 44 who have children under 5.

"This would represent an increase of more than 40 percent in the number of such mothers just over the next decade," Young observed.

Commenting on specific sections of the bill, Young stressed the need for full funding to assure the effectiveness of the legislation. He said labor strongly endorses provisions for a partnership of parents, community and local government in local policy councils which "serve as the sole guarantee that programs will not be handed down from somewhere 'above' over the objections of participating parents."

"And finally, the AFL-CIO supports the creation of federal child care standards, a uniform code for facilities, and the inclusion of construction funds. All three of these provisions are needed in any comprehensive child development legislation."

Miss Dubrow told subcommittee members that the ILGWU is particularly interested in urban community child-care centers "because of the racial, ethnic and religious mixture of our union. We encourage community child-care centers so the socio-economic mix will be apparent."

In rural areas, where the need is just as great, she urged creation of in-plant day-care centers and noted that after-school facilities also are needed in both rural and urban areas.

She said that while labor unions and other private organizations should be included in making plans for centers, private groups cannot by themselves provide the comprehensive day care that is needed.

Miss O'Grady described day-care centers now operated by the Clothing Workers in New York, Chicago and its Baltimore region, which include infant and after-school services.

"We are, I must pointedly add, spending quite a bit of money. Without money, the subject of child care is merely conversation.

"We know that the efforts of the Clothing Workers and other unions will not meet the national need in the area of child care. The efforts and goodwill of the private sector must be augmented by a federal program," she said.

"The financial resources of the regional areas of our union will not be available to many labor and community groups that could sponsor day-care centers. They will need federal help."

AIFLD Center Greets 1,000th Latin Unionist

Luis E. Fonseca Salazar holds the distinction of being the 1,000th Latin American trade unionist to attend the Front Royal Institute, which is operated by the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

Fonseca is education and organization secretary of the Social Security Workers of Costa Rica. He was honored at the annual meeting of the AIFLD trustees and presented a letter from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who also is president of the AIFLD board.

In the salute to Fonseca, Meany noted that "you and 999 of your trade union brothers came to Front Royal because you demonstrated a commitment to the trade union movement in your own country and a capacity for leadership in behalf of improving the lives of workers."

Fonseca, as the 1,000th student at the institute, symbolizes the success of the Front Royal program and also the beginning of its second decade, Meany said.

Pres. Henry W. Balgooyen of the Americas Foundation presented the institute a scholarship award to be used by a Latin American trade unionist.

The trustees at the annual meeting approved the 1972 AIFLD budget and re-elected the institute's officers. Besides Meany, they are J. Peter Grace, president of W. R. Grace & Co., chairman; Kenneth W. Holland, president of the Institute for International Education, vice president; Berent Friele of the American International Association of Economic & Social Development, vice chairman; Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, secretary-treasurer, and William C. Doherty, Jr., executive director.

IUD Sets Meeting On Job Safety Act

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. will hold an occupational safety and health conference in Washington, D.C., June 17-18 for several hundred trade unionists, local officials and safety specialists.

The conference will explore the provisions, standards, enforcement and administration of the new job safety law that went into effect Mar. 28.

IUD Pres. I. W. Abel said in announcing the conference that effective implementation of the law hinges on the labor movement's thorough understanding of its provisions.

IUD Spells Out Case For No-Fault Insurance

The existing auto insurance system is costly, wasteful and completely unjust, Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. told the Senate Commerce Committee in testimony supporting a national "no-fault" auto insurance program.

"Too many seriously injured accident victims go uncompensated and too many dependents of fatality cases receive little, if any benefits" from the present system, Clayman noted.

"The system is terribly inequitable because it confers the greatest injustices on the more disadvantaged members of our society," the administrative director of the IUD testified.

Clayman cited a study by the Dept. of Transportation that found accident victims who earn less than $10,000 annually had recovered only 46 percent of their personal and family economic losses. He pointed out that three-fifths of the nation's families fall into that income bracket.

"People with incomes less than $10,000 are likely to be paying the highest premiums for this lack of protection," Clayman observed. He pointed out that for a standard bureau policy, a 23-year-old married man living in a city would pay $587 in Los Angeles, $619 in Chicago, $706 in Philadelphia and $486 in Detroit.

"Our members complain bitterly about the arbitrary treatment they receive from the companies," Clayman said. "When they attempt to use the insurance and collect, many times they are cancelled or the policy is not renewed. If they are not dropped by the company, their rates are increased."

If the no-fault concept were made compulsory, Clayman said, the companies would not be able to deal with the public as they please.

He also called for strengthening sections of the proposed Senate bill that would establish the no-fault program. He noted that the bill would still leave the regulation of insurance rates up to the states.

State labor organizations have learned over the years, Clayman said, that it is futile to fight auto insurance rate increases in most states, particularly where the insurance commissioner has little or no power to review rates before they are put into effect.

He said such conditions prevail in Ohio, California, New York, Illinois and Missouri.

Clayman called for enactment of the labor-supported bill that would institute compulsory insurance for all vehicles and would require that insurance companies pay claims to policyholders no matter who is at fault in an accident. The bill would also forbid insurers to refuse, cancel or fail to renew a policy, except for the loss of an operator's license or failure to pay premiums.

He also urged passage of bills that would facilitate group auto insurance and require auto makers to produce sturdier cars to reduce repair costs.

3 Unions Seek Tariff Curbs On TV Imports

The Electrical Radio & Machine Workers, the Machinists and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers have jointly filed a petition with the U.S. Tariff Commission asking either for a quantitative limit on imports of television sets or an increase in the tariff on them from the current 6 percent to 35 percent.

The petition was filed under the escape clause in existing law that permits restrictions to be placed on imports of an article when a domestic industry is suffering serious injury from such imports.

The unions contend that tariff reductions have resulted in a flood of imports and have caused American companies to shift operations to Taiwan and Mexico. The resultant loss of employment was termed "shameful."

The petition cited Commerce and Labor Dept. employment statistics showing a production job loss of nearly 25 percent in consumer electronics since 1966.

The tariff on foreign-made television sets, under the Kennedy Round tariff cuts, would be reduced to 5 percent in 1972. It had been 10 percent prior to the Kennedy Round.

The unions argued that seven tariff cuts since 1956 have all resulted in increased imports and loss of jobs for American workers.

Atlas Chemical Unit Shifts to Oil Workers

Tamaqua, Pa.—The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers replaced District 50, unaffiliated, in a representation election among 800 employes of Atlas Chemical Industries Inc. The vote reported by the National Labor Relations Board was 545 for OCAW, 203 for District 50. There were 5 votes for no union and 6 ballots were challenged.

Showdown Nears On Key Job Bills

first time when the conference report is put to a vote.

The House had attached the public works legislation to a Senate-passed bill extending the Appalachian Regional Development Act for an additional four years. The final economic recovery package tied up by the conferees also includes a two-year extension of the Economic Development Act, which helps distressed areas.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany described the accelerated public works program during House hearings as "revenue-sharing from a very practical viewpoint."

It authorizes $2 billion in federal funds to be spent primarily on projects that have already been blueprinted but have been shelved because local and state governments have run out of money

Sewage treatment plants, water systems and health care facilities would be among the projects to be financed by federal grants of 80 percent of the cost—and 100 percent in the case of bankrupt communities unable to put up their share of the money.

Eligible communities would be those where unemployment is at least 6 percent, those that have been designated as redevelopment areas, and those where unemployment among returned Viet Nam veterans is 25 percent above the national unemployment rate.

Somewhat different criteria would govern federal grants under the public service jobs bill, which would enable public agencies to hire unemployed persons for needed work in such fields as health, education, recreation and environmental services.

The program would operate nationwide as long as the national unemployment rate—now above 6 percent—stood at 4.5 percent or higher. If the national rate dropped below that figure, the program would function only in communities with unemployment rates above 6 percent.

The Administration is hoping to substitute a lump sum grant to the states and cities to replace existing federally-financed manpower training programs. Communities would be permitted to use part of the funds for limited, short-term public service employment. But to do so, they would have to divert funds from other programs.

In other congressional developments, the Administration won House approval of a reorganization plan that would consolidate a number of volunteer and service programs into a single agency that would be called Action. The VISTA program—Volunteers in Service to America—would be taken away from the Office of Economic Opportunity; the Peace Corps would be moved into the new agency, and various senior citizen programs would also be shifted.

In Senate action on an amendment to the draft extension bill, attempts to increase a proposed pay raise for the armed services were beaten by decisive votes.

The Administration had opposed the $2.7 billion raise voted by the House and supported a $1 billion raise primarily for the lowest grades.

Opponents of draft extension had pushed for bigger raises to attract sufficient volunteers to man all-volunteer military services.

A House-Senate conference committee will have the job of seeking to reconcile the two versions. But the Senate still had not agreed on a date to vote on final passage of the draft extension bill, which some opponents have threatened to filibuster.

SECRETARY-TREASURERS of AFL-CIO affiliated unions hear an address by Federation Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland at a two-day conference in Atlanta. Treas. Henry Segal, right, of the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers was elected chairman of the conference, succeeding Sec. Richard E. Livingston of the Carpenters. Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke, center, of the Steelworkers moved up to vice chairman. Sec.-Treas. Newell J. Carman of the Operating Engineers was elected treasurer, to succeed Burke. The terms are for three years.

Plate Printers Elect Donegan To No. 2 Post

Philadelphia—Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Smith of the Plate Printers, Die Stampers & Engravers resigned during the union's biennial convention here after 26 years of service to the union.

Smith, 68, was succeeded by James Donegan, secretary of the union's Local 1 here. He ran unopposed.

The 21 delegates to the convention returned Pres. Constantine Trochanis to office and elected Ernest Nash of Ottawa as first vice president, and Harold Ryan of Comack, N.Y. as second vice president.

The delegates approved a 75-cent increase in quarterly per capita dues to the international, nearly doubling the per capita payment.

tion. In the first third of the year, the index rose nine-tenths of 1 percent, which is quite an improvement over the comparable period of 1970, when the rise (2 percent) was more than twice as great."

Workers' earnings were up in April due entirely to increases in average hourly wages of nonsupervisory and production employes. Take-home pay for the average worker with three dependents was $109.54.

Real spendable earnings—take-home pay expressed in 1967 dollars amounted to $93.13. This was 2 percent above a year ago, but still 1.9 percent below the 1968 peak.

Over-the-month increases in wages occurred among workers in all major industries except manufacturing, and finance, insurance and real estate.

Gross weekly earnings were up 73 cents from March to $124.75, an increase of $7.41, or 6.3 percent from April 1970.

Supermarket price increases during April were accompanied by an increase in the price of restaurant meals—four-tenths of 1 percent.

The prices of nonfood commodities rose two-tenths of 1 percent on a seasonally adjusted basis, and three-tenths of 1 percent on an unadjusted basis.

Clothing cost increases were led by a rise of eight-tenths of 1 percent in men's and boys' clothing. Women's and girls' apparel increased by three-tenths of 1 percent.

The price index of all consumer services was up two-tenths of 1 percent, and the Labor Dept. said the overall low rate for services was due to reduced mortgage interest rates.

But the cost of individual services rose, especialy medical care which posted a six-tenths of 1 percent advance following jumps of eight-tenths of 1 percent in March and seven-tenths of 1 percent in February.

The price of new cars and gasoline both declined in April, which is normal for the month, but used car prices showed a 2.8-percent increase.

Approximately 72,700 workers will receive cost-of-living wage increases based on the April CPI for average American cities or individual city indexes.

About 55,000 will receive hourly wage increases based on the national index. including 28,000 Wisconsin state employes whose pay will be boosted $11 a month.

About 17,000 transit workers, including 13,200 in Chicago and Pittsburgh will receive quarterly pay increases based on the indexes for those cities.

Workers in Pittsburgh will receive 4 cents per hour and those in Chicago, 5.5 cents an hour.

About 11,500 other workers who have cost-of-living clauses in their contracts have already received the maximum stipulated, even though their contracts have not expired.

Nixon Gets Blunt Facts from Elderly On Health, Housing, Income Needs

The National Council of Senior Citizens and three other organizations of older people condemned the social security policies of the Nixon Administration and called for massive government aid to the elderly, especially in the fields of income, health and housing.

Nelson H. Cruikshank, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, presented Pres. Nixon with a hard-hitting, nine-page statement on the problems and needs of the elderly.

He and representatives of the other groups met with the President and members of the Cabinet at the White House to report on the desperate needs of millions of older and retired Americans.

Cruikshank's group, with 3 million members, is the largest of the four organizations.

The statement presented to Nixon urged:

- An adequate income to permit all older Americans to live in dignity.
- Medicare and Medicaid improvements looking toward the establishment of comprehensive health care.
- Adequate housing at rents the elderly can afford and property tax relief for elderly home owners with limited income.
- Employment programs in local community service — designed for the elderly who are physically capable and want to work.
- Development of adequate, nationwide transportation services for the elderly, including reduced transportation fares for those 65 or older and guaranteed uniform car insurance.
- Consumer protection and, for the elderly poor, adequate legal service.

The statement said that unless the Administration changes its policy toward social security, it will condemn millions of elderly to permanent poverty.

It pointed out that 4.8 million persons aged 65 and over were living in poverty in 1969 and that older Americans are twice as likely to be poor as younger persons.

The NCSC urged a further increase in social security retirement benefits of 20 percent effective Jan. 1—on top of the 10-percent increase that starts with the June benefit checks—and a much higher increase in the minimum benefit, to $150 a month. The present minimum is $64 a month.

In the area of health care, the council reaffirmed its support for national comprehensive health care for all Americans and voiced "dismay at the Administration's proposal to rely upon the private insurance industry to provide health coverage under federal auspices."

"We feel this would be a bonanza for the insurance industry but costly, both financially and in the quality of care for the American people," the statement said.

Pending enactment of a National Health Security program, the council urged elimination of the out-of-pocket payments required under Medicare Part B insurance and greater support of prepaid group practice plans and other health maintenance organizations.

Present federal housing measures for the elderly were termed "pathetic" by the council when measured against the need of at least 3 million units.

The council statement urged an immediate building program of at least 100,000 units a year. It said the lack of progress toward the goal of adequate housing for senior citizens is "shameful, and, for the low-income elderly, grim and cruel."

The message to the President concluded by noting that some of the language in it had been rather blunt and that this was in no way intended to show disrespect.

"We have stated our views as we have," the statement said, "because we believe that when you invited us to the White House you wanted us to present our needs fully and frankly."

Clothing Union Charges Fraud In Suit Labels

New York—The Clothing Workers have filed a complaint with the Consumer Fraud Bureau of the Federal Trade Commission charging that Macy's department store here is using a "bogus union label" in imported Japanese suits.

The labels, in the inside right coat pocket, at first glance appear to be a standard American union label, the union said. They are the same size and say "union made," but upon closer scrutiny, one can make out the letters NFTWU.

ACWA Pres. Jacob Potofsky said that the letters do not represent a Japanese union and that the label misleads the American consumer.

"By failing to state the country of origin on the label, the manufacturer is misleading the consumer into believing the garments are made by American union workers," he said.

House Passes Public Service Jobs Bill

Votes Down Nixon Plan On Sharing

By David L. Perlman

The House said "Yes" to a labor-supported public service jobs program—by a strong 244-142 majority.

It said "No" to an Administration-backed, revenue-sharing bill that would merely take the federal money now going into manpower training programs and turn it over to states and cities to spend as they wish.

The Administration's substitute bill, supported by nearly all Republicans and opposed by nearly all Democrats, was beaten on a key 204-182 vote.

The Senate earlier this year approved a similar public service jobs bill—and also decisively defeated an effort to substitute a revenue-sharing plan.

With both congressional bodies in substantial agreement, a House-Senate conference committee is expected to have little difficulty working out the differences between the two bills.

Despite warnings of a presidential veto, a sizable bloc of Republicans backed the public service employment bill after the substitute was defeated.

The House bill would authorize $200 million in federal funds for the remainder of this fiscal year, $750 million for the year starting July 1, and $1 billion for each of the three succeeding years.

The money would be available as long as the national unemployment rate remained above 4.5 percent and thereafter in communities with a 6 percent jobless rate.

Jobless workers—with preference to returning veterans—would be hired for needed work in such fields as health, education, recreation and environmental services.

No more than one-third of the jobs would be in professional categories, with a salary limit of $12,000 a year. Otherwise, persons hired would be paid prevailing rates for public employment, but not less than the federal minimum wage.

The bill's sponsor, Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.), estimated that 150,000 jobless persons could be put on public payrolls the first full year of the program. And none of the jobs, he stressed, would be "leaf-raking" make-work occupations.

50,000 Win Major Gains In New Aluminum Pacts

High Jobless Area Listing Rises to 55

Three more of the nation's 150 major labor markets were added to the "substantial" unemployment category in May, bringing the total to 55, the highest number so classified since April 1962, the Labor Dept. said.

"Substantial" unemployment areas, as classified by the department's Manpower Administration, include those labor centers showing at least 6 percent unemployment with the rate expected to continue at least two more months.

Seasonal or temporary factors are discounted.

The Labor Dept. said that 18 of the major labor areas have been added to the "substantial" listing since the beginning of the year and that there are 39 more areas in the category than in May 1970.

A year ago, only 16 of the major areas showed such severe joblessness. And only six areas were so listed in January 1969 at the start of the Nixon Administration.

Seventeen smaller areas also were added to the substantial list during May, bringing that total to 704.

The three major areas added last month were Saginaw, Mich.; Duluth-Superior, Minn.-Wis., and Hamilton-Middletown, O.

The rise in unemployment in all three areas was attributed in large part to job cutbacks in metal-working and construction.

Unions Hail Living Cost Protection

More than 50,000 union members in the aluminum industry have won substantial pay raises, record pension gains, cost-of-living protection and important additional benefits in new three-year contracts.

The agreements, reached in the final hours before a strike deadline, were unanimously ratified by the Steelworkers Aluminum Industry Conference Board.

Negotiators for the Aluminum Workers, who reached similar agreements in separate bargaining with two big companies, predicted overwhelming approval at local ratification meetings set for June 7.

Both unions negotiated with Alcoa—the Aluminum Co. of America—and with Reynolds Metals. The Steelworkers also bargained with Kaiser Aluminum and two smaller firms. Contracts with a number of other companies have not yet expired.

The aluminum pacts follow the pay pattern set by the Steelworkers in the can industry after a 28-day strike earlier this year.

Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel termed the aluminum settlement "excellent" and said the wage and benefit hikes will do much to offset the impact of inflation on workers' earnings in recent years.

A spokesman for the Aluminum Workers also hailed the agreement and voiced special satisfaction at some of the job realignment provisions that will mean upgrading for a number of workers.

Need Termed Urgent:

Quick Action Sought On $2 Wage Floor

America's low-paid workers need a $2 minimum wage now—not three years from now. And the answer to high unemployment among teenagers is more jobs, not lower wages, the AFL-CIO testified at Senate hearings.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller termed the Nixon Administration's proposal to put off a $2 wage floor until 1974 and hold young workers at the present $1.60 level "a mockery of common sense."

Instead, he urged, Congress should give "top priority" to the wage-hour bill introduced by Senate Labor Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.).

The Williams bill would establish an immediate $2 wage floor for most workers, rising to $2.25 a year later. It would bring farm workers—now frozen at a $1.30 an hour minimum—up to $2.25 in three steps. And it would extend coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act to an additional 13 million workers.

"Inflation has hit low-wage workers the hardest," Biemiller said, and an increasing number of workers receiving the legal minimum are being forced on welfare to meet family needs.

Underscoring the need for an immediate jump to at least $2 an hour, Biemiller and AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger stressed that living costs have risen so that $2 today will buy less than the $1.60 minimum did when it was enacted in 1966.

As for the Administration's effort to impose a lower youth rate, "the AFL-CIO is unalterably opposed to a sub-minimum wage for youth or

Health Security Held Key to Vital Reforms

The difference between the National Health Security program labor is pressing in Congress and the Nixon Administration's proposal is "commitment versus rhetoric," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland declared.

Kirkland, addressing the Group Health Association of America at a two-day institute in Washington, noted as an example that "Pres. Nixon borrows your ideas about group practice and then backs that up with such an insignificant amount of development money that new plans will fall on their face."

In contrast, "Health Security would establish a large Health Resources Development Fund to create new methods of delivering health care to more people," he stressed.

"The Administration is only delaying—as long as it can—the day of reckoning America has with reform of its health care delivery system."

The nation's medical care crisis has reached the point, Kirkland said, "that denial of the fact no longer has any credibility whatever. Pres. Nixon, himself, employs the phrase."

"Everyone today piously states that medical care is a right," he

Clothing Workers Post Pay Boosts for 115,000

New York—The Clothing Workers won wage increases totaling 60 cents an hour over three years in an agreement the union hailed as the "largest money settlement" in the history of the men's and boys' clothing industry.

The agreement covers 115,000 employes—virtually the entire industry. It has been ratified by ACWA Joint Boards and locals across the country.

"This is the best contract we have ever won," said Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky and Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum.

"It tops all previous gains in agreements with clothing manufacturers. We are pleased that this contract enables our members to continue improving their standard of living."

The agreement, negotiated with the Clothing Manufacturers Association of the U.S.A., provides an immediate increase of 20 cents an hour across-the-board, and identical increases in June of 1972 and 1973.

Wages in the industry had ranged

ACTIVE INVOLVEMENT of the labor movement in politics, social issues and opinion making is stressed by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) at an executive committee meeting of the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical & Technical Employes (FIET). The session was held at the headquarters of the Retail Clerks in Washington. From left are James A. Suffridge, RCIA president-emeritus; FIET Pres. Alfred W. Allen, who is general secretary of the Union of Shop, Distributive & Allied Workers of Great Britain; Humphrey, and FIET Gen. Sec. Erich Kissel. Railway Clerks Vote Dues Hike, Uniform Ratification of Contracts

Miami Beach—The Railway & Airline Clerks wrapped up their 24th convention by approving actions that nearly double minimum monthly dues and establish a uniform contract ratification procedure.

The 1,300 delegates voted to increase the minimum monthly dues from $6.50 to $11. Per capita payments to the Grand Lodge will be increased from $2.10 to $4.20, and systems boards and local lodges also will receive a substantial increase in dues income.

The convention amended the constitution to provide for ratification of all future agreements by weighted vote of the general chairmen of the union. Previously, there had been no such standard procedure.

Earlier, delegates approved a constitutional change barring members age 65 or over from running for grand lodge or subordinate unit offices. Present office holders over 65 are allowed to complete their terms. But effective July 1, 1975, all grand lodge or subordinate officers and BRAC staff members will be required to retire at age 65.

In citing the need for a dues increase, the union pointed to $2 million in expenditures during BRAC's strike against Northwest Airlines, and the high cost of moving its headquarters from Cincinnati to Chicago, plus generally increased operating expenses.

In the elections, both Pres. C. L. Dennis and Sec.-Treas. D. J. Sullivan were elected to four-year terms without opposition.

The convention re-elected six incumbent vice presidents and filled five vacancies created by retirement and death. New terms begin July 1.

The six re-elected vice presidents are W. C. Y. McGregor of Montreal, Robert C. Devlin of New York City, A. R. Lowry of Park Ridge, Ill., L. H. Freeman of Arlington Heights, Ill., J. C. Fletcher, Prospect Heights, Ill., and E. J. Neal of Roanoke, Va.

The five new vice presidents are Gerald Toppen of Chicago, Charles Coleman of San Francisco, Jack Otero of Washington, D.C., R. Bruce Pike of Downers Grove, Ill., and Robert A. Parrish of Kansas City, Mo. Six other candidates for the office of vice president were unsuccessful.

The delegates, who came from railroad, airline, steamship and express lodges across the United States and Canada, gave roaring applause to an address by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.).

Humphrey charged the Nixon Administration with deliberately designing a recession to slow the economy by promoting unemployment as a way to lower the fever of inflation.

"Well I want to tell Dr. Nixon that his cure does not work," said Humphrey. "It is an old quack remedy. And before they start working it on the patients, I think the doctor ought to sip it a little bit."

He said he had heard a lot of talk about wage-price controls "but I do not hear very many people talking profit controls or interest controls."

Humphrey said that the end result of the Nixon Administration's economic policies was to increase the ranks of the poor.

"The number of people living in what we call poverty went down 5 percent every year from 1961 to 1969, but in 1969, 1970 and the first four months of 1971, there was an increase in poverty of 5 percent annually."

Sen. Harold A. Hughes (D-Iowa) made a plea for a more balanced transportation system in the United States, calling for a national railroad-bed building program over the next 10-15 years.

Hughes likened the proposed program to the plan that resulted in the nation's interstate highway system.

He said trackage for high-speed, modern trains should be built according to the principles of public need and public service.

"My main concern is not to find scapegoats on whom to place the blame for what has passed. I think today in America, instead of talking, we had better begin to develop a plan of action that will restore and revitalize this transit system."

He said America vitally needs its rails and that without them the "national security of this country could well be challenged in the future."

Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) told the convention that the state of the American economy "is the number one problem facing us here in the United States."

Over the past 18 months, he said, "there have been 17 pronouncements" by the Nixon Administration that "the economy has turned the corner."

"It has turned the corner so well," Bayh observed wryly, "that we now have over 6.1 percent of our people out of work; over 5.2 million Americans cannot find a job."

Bayh cited a recent poll showing that one-third of American workers are either jobless, have lost overtime, or are working less than 40 hours a week.

He declared that a nation which has the technological capacity to put a man on the moon "ought to see that every American has a job, and I am not willing to sit still for anything less than that."

Sen. John V. Tunney (D-Calif.) received a rousing ovation from delegates when he suggested that they "put Pres. Nixon at the head of the unemployment line next year."

"The present Administration is one of the worst in 100 years," Tunney said. "Seldom in our history has an Administration been more anti-labor."

Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), called for the creation of an economic climate that would make jobs available to every American willing to work.

If private industry cannot supply the jobs, then they should be created by "building public works and facilities that are needed by the people," he said.

Papermakers Win Key Vote At Mead Unit

Stanley, Va.—Employes of the Stanley Furniture plant here chose to be represented by the Papermakers & Paperworkers in a National Labor Relations Board election despite bitter opposition by the company. The company, a non-union stronghold for years, was recently taken over by the Mead Paper Corp., with which the UPP has contracts at other plants.

UPP Vice Pres. Arnold Brown said contract proposals are being formulated for the more than 1,000 workers in the bargaining unit, and that negotiations for a first contract will begin upon NLRB certification of the union as bargaining agent.

Brown said 11 employes were fired for union activity during the organizing campaign. The UPP has filed unfair practice charges seeking their reinstatement with back pay. The cases already are before an NLRB trial examiner.

The UPP received 591 votes in the election against 428 for no union. There were 21 challenged ballots and nine declared void.

Stresses COPE Role:

Meany Looks to '72 For Crucial Turning

Miami Beach—The nation is going to have a new "game plan" after November 1972—a game plan that will be directed to the real needs of the American people—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the Railway & Airline Clerks at their 24th convention.

"And I am convinced that COPE is going to play a part in bringing that about," Meany added.

Meany, speaking on the same day to the Insurance Workers in convention at another Beach hotel, predicted that 1972 is "going to be a crucial year for all who believe in prosperity for the great mass of the people."

Such prosperity "is our measuring rod" for a successful economic system, Meany said, emphasizing "we must see to it in 1972 that we elect those who are responsive to the needs of people."

Addressing, the BRAC convention, Meany blamed presidential advisers like Dr. Arthur Burns and Dr. Paul McCracken for "the mess we're in" economically.

Pres. Nixon has kept his promise to reduce the number of troops in Viet Nam and "in a reasonably short time this problem will be down to size," Meany said. But the President's promise to slow down inflation and reduce prices without putting people out of work has not been kept, he reminded the delegates.

Negotiations are taking place "in an economic atmosphere that is anything but conducive to sound and easy bargaining. We have a recession with inflation at the same time. We have high unemployment and low production, with prices continuing to climb."

This is "not supposed to happen, according to the classic theory of the economists," Meany remarked. "When you slow down an economy and cause unemployment, prices are supposed to come down.

"But the Nixon Administration is very resourceful. They have managed to bring employment down, to slow down the economy and still to keep the prices going up."

Meany congratulated BRAC Pres. C. L. Dennis and his negotiating team for "coming through with the best contract" ever negotiated in the history of the union "despite the deliberate procrastination that has come to be almost routine in railway labor negotiations," and despite unfair judicial rulings and last-minute congressional and presidential interference "with a perfectly legal strike."

The AFL-CIO president hit hard at government interference in collective bargaining in his speech to the Insurance Workers.

Even before the steel industry contract negotiations are under way, he noted, the Administration is warning, "Don't give them too much of a wage increase."

By its action, Meany charged, the Nixon Administration is placing the government "on the side of the employer at the bargaining table."

It is "not a good picture," Meany said soberly, this deliberate effort "to make labor the scapegoat . . . in an attempt to bring wages down."

He predicted that the effort would not succeed, but warned that if it did the nation would be the loser because "the American worker is the best customer of American business, and if you are going to destroy the purchasing power of your best customer, then you are going to bring the economy down."

IBEW Man Takes Labor Dept. Post

The Labor Dept. announced the appointment of Ronald T. Weakley as assistant director for technical assistance in the Office of Labor-Management & Welfare-Pension reports. His duties are to help labor organizations and private pension plan administrators comply with the Labor-Management Reporting & Disclosure Act, and also with federal labor-management relations under Executive Order 11491.

Weakley moves to Washington after a 20-year career with Local 1245 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers at Walnut Creek, Calif. He was business manager and financial secretary for 19 years, served as editor of the local's Utility Reporter, and was president-elect of the San Francisco chapter, Industrial Relations Research Association.

Formal Protest Planned:

Labor Dept. Delay Scored On Job Safety Standards

The AFL-CIO has announced it will file a formal protest with the Secretary of Labor over the delayed implementation of standards established under the Occupational Safety & Health Law.

A 90-day "familiarization period" is being allowed by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration before employers will be required to comply with many of the standards. This deferral would push the effective date back to Aug. 27.

Certain other standards published in the Federal Register May 29 will not become effective until Feb. 15, 1972 because of additional delays that are being allowed by the Labor Dept.

Even then, some employers could be allowed further relief from full compliance with the law, AFL-CIO job safety specialist George T. R. Taylor pointed out

Employers could apply for extension of the deferral on the grounds that safety devices needed for machinery or equipment were not available or had not arrived, Taylor said.

Up to three extensions of 60 days each can be permitted by OSHA, Taylor noted, delaying enforcement of certain standards another 180 days beyond Feb. 15, 1972.

Taylor, secretary of the federation's Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, said that organized labor views the delaying actions "with great misgivings."

The AFL-CIO safety committee will also look closely at the comprehensiveness of the standards adopted by Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson, since initial analysis shows an over-dependence on weak existing standards that had been established by private organizations.

"We regard this as a very timid and hesitant implementation of the law," Taylor stressed, "and not at all in the spirit" in which Congress enacted it.

The law became effective April 28 to provide on-the-job safety and health protection for 57 million workers in about 4.1 million workplaces.

But because of the deferrals, the only areas now being enforced are cases where serious hazards exist and standards from pre-existing job safety legislation are in effect.

These laws included the Maritime Safety Act, the Walsh-Healey Act and the Construction Safety Act covering federal contracts.

The "national consensus standards," which do not become effective until Aug. 27, were adopted on data provided by the American National Standards Institute, Inc., and the National Fire Protection Association.

The Labor Dept. said the purpose of the "familiarization period is to insure that affected employers and employes will be informed regarding the standards and can take action to come into compliance."

States will also have an opportunity to evaluate and upgrade their safety programs so their standards will conform with the federal code, the department said.

Labor Under Sec. Laurence H. Silberman said that prompt action will be taken by OSHA in cases of "imminent danger." He said that the agency has already received about 50 complaints about serious working conditions.

Assistant Labor Sec. George C. Guenther said that OSHA was taking action in three of the cases, one in the chemical industry.

Guenther also announced that OSHA has designated five target industries where the agency would concentrate on improving safety and health conditions.

The five are longshoring, roofing and sheet metal, meat and meat products, mobile home manufacturing, lumber and wood products.

Guenther said that the five were selected because job injury rates in these industries were substantially higher than in others.

The action reflects the "worst-first" concept for implementing the provisions of the job safety law designed to reduce job-related injuries and illness, Guenther said.

But Taylor pointed out that a number of the newly promulgated standards that have been deferred until 1972 apply directly to some of the five "target industries."

Although the new standards take up almost 250 pages of the Federal Register, Guenther conceded that several areas of employment will receive only limited protection. He said these included agriculture, office and clerical jobs and research laboratories.

The Textile Workers Union of America, in a letter to Guenther, warned that the new law will not work "if the Dept. of Labor opens up loopholes for unscrupulous employers . . . nor if the rights of employes and their representatives are hemmed in with restrictions."

TWUA Research Director George Perkel urged the Labor Dept. to amend the regulations on the enforcement of the safety act to make them more effective.

ELEVEN-YEAR-OLD PIANIST Herman Zuker performs with the Senior Concert Orchestra of Musicians' Local 802 in New York City's Carnegie Hall. Conductor David Mendoza, 75, directs the 80 instrumentalists in their sixth free public performance as a salute to senior citizens. Soprano Bess Arlene also performed at the concert. The orchestra is made up mostly of former members of major symphony groups from throughout the country.

Western Union Struck In Bargaining Deadlock

The nation's telegraph message service was halted as 20,000 employes, represented by two AFL-CIO unions, struck Western Union June 1 after contract negotiations deadlocked and contracts expired.

No new negotiations were scheduled, but the unions indicated their willingness to return to the bargaining table at a moment's notice if there is any chance of progress in the wage dispute.

The United Telegraph Workers represents 17,000 of the strikers, who are maintenance workers, repairmen and operators. About 3,000 of the strikers, in the New York City-Northern New Jersey area, are represented by Communications Workers Local 1177.

UTW Pres. E. L. Hageman said his union is seeking a 16-percent increase in both years of a two-year contract. The CWA is seeking wage boosts of 18 percent in the first year and 13 percent in the second.

Hageman said Western Union's final offer was a wage-fringe benefit package amounting to 6 percent the first year, 10 percent the second year and another 4 percent if and when the Federal Comunications Commission approves a pending rate increase for the company.

Current wages average $3.47 an hour.

"They said they had made their final offer on money," Hageman reported. "It appeared no progress would be made if we resumed negotiations.

"We've informed the mediator and the company that the members of our bargaining committee will be reconvened on short notice whenever there appears a chance of making progress in the negotiations."

Hageman said that the proposal to tie part of the wage increase to FCC approval of a rate hike was unacceptable to the union.

"We do not intend to let the FCC become involved in our bargaining process, because before long it would be controlling our wages," he said.

The UTW is seeking contract language limiting the hiring of private contractors to do work normally performed by UTW members. Also on the table are vacations, pensions, hospitalization and insurance.

As picket lines went up across the nation, supervisory personnel were keeping leased wires and other services operating for business and government.

Western Union Vice Pres. G.P. Kent said the company has suspended handling of telegrams, money and gift orders and most other message services to the general public.

He said mailgram service was continuing in 30 cities. The mailgram service is an overnight message handled in conjunction with the U.S. Postal Service in which messages are first telegraphed to the receiving cities and then delivered as first class mail.

Western Union said highly-automated operations permitted it to continue operating Telex and TWX leased wires.

But the company conceded that a prolonged strike could pile up a large backlog of repair work.

"As the troubles begin to pile up, we think they'll be out of business in Telex and leased wires, too," said Hageman.

New Safety Law Invoked to Combat Mercury Hazard at Chemical Plant

The first citation for violation of the new Occupational Safety & Health Law was slapped on a Moundsville, W. Va., chemical plant because workers were being exposed to seriously high levels of mercury vapor.

A number of workers at the Allied Chemical Corp.'s South Plant in Moundsville, which employs 170 persons, have shown symptoms of various stages of mercury poisoning in tests conducted by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

Thirty workers are employed in the mercury cell area of the plant where the poisonous element is used to produce chlorine gas.

One worker has been hospitalized, with what doctors have diagnosed as possible chronic mercury poisoning, the OCAW said. Several others have filed for workmen's compensation because of the effects of exposure to mercury, the union reported.

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration issued the citation May 28, two weeks after the OCAW requested an inspection of the plant.

Anthony Mazzocchi, director of the OCAW citizenship-legislative department, requested the OSHA inspection of Allied Chemical plant under the job safety act's "imminent danger" clause on May 14. He said that the conditions could cause "permanent physical harm" to the workers.

Mazzocchi pointed out in his letter to OSHA Administrator George C. Guenther that a 24-hour advance notice was given to the plant officials prior to a Walsh-Healey inspection in February.

"Operations in the plant were temporarily halted," Mazzocchi said, and "all workers were placed on clean-up duty. As the inspector arrived, the plant was operating at less than 10 percent of capacity."

No violation of the pre-existing job safety law was found.

However, when the OSHA inspector arrived without prior notice on May 19, chlorine gas was so prevalent that he had to wear a respirator to enter the mercury cell area, the OCAW reported.

He cited the company on violations under the general duty clause of the new job safety act, noting that pools of mercury were allowed to accumulate on the floor and other working areas of the cell room. This contributed to extremely high levels of mercury vapor in the air, the inspector found.

The OSHA citation said that "instances of excessive airborne concentrations of mercury had been made known to the employer" earlier.

"This condition constitutes a recognized hazard that is causing or is likely to cause death or serious physical harm to employes."

Allied Chemical had a June 2 deadline to correct the hazardous conditions and was fined $1,000. But the company also may appeal within 15 working days after the citation was issued.

Dr. Sidney M. Wolfe, who made a study of the Moundsville plant conditions for the OCAW, has protested the delay in issuing the citation since the plant had been inspected.

Wolfe also cited the findings of a medical survey taken at the plant by the U.S. Public Health Service. Mercury levels in the workers' urine were found to be six times above the safety limit.

On May 26, two days before the OSHA citation was issued, Allied Chemical said in a prepared statement:

"We in Allied Chemical are proud of the health record achieved in our mercury cell chlorine plants and are determined to see it continued indefinitely."

Clothing Union Wins Increase For 115,000

from $2.41 to $3.51 an hour, with an average of $2.91.

Besides the wage boost, the union won increases in employer contributions to welfare and pension funds—one-half of 1 percent in both 1972 and 1973.

This provision will bring the employer contribution to 9.7 percent of the payroll by 1973.

Potofosky and Rosenblum said the gains were particularly notable in the face of difficult economic conditions caused by the Nixon Administration and the flood of clothing imports. They said both have had a harmful effect on the clothing industry.

The union won extended disability and life insurance coverage for those who lose their jobs due to imports, which have caused numerous plant closings throughout the industry.

Protections are included in the agreement for workers who may be affected by the use of new machinery and techniques. Restrictions in previous contracts against the introduction of new machinery were eliminated.

Labor and Social Change

"A MAJORITY FOR social change cannot be built in this country without the enthusiastic support of the organized workers. Despite the widespread, and ignorant, opinion that the working class in this country is politically conservative, it is the largest and most important single force for social reform.

"The issue of national health insurance, to take only one obvious example, is before the country today not because of the students or the churches or the doves, but because George Meany and the late Walter Reuther fought more than 20 years for it."

The words are those of Michael Harrington, chairman of the Socialist Party in the United States, in an article in a recent New York Sunday Times Magazine.

Earlier, in a syndicated newspaper column, Harrington had written that a future historian "is going to look back on these times and discover an extraordinary truth: that George Meany and his associates are much more effective agents of social change than the intransigeant, middle class ultra-radicals."

The same point is underscored in a recent article in Commentary Magazine by Penn Kemble, which has been reprinted by the League for Industrial Democracy. Kemble's article, "Rediscovering American Labor," examines the reason why "the labor movement went out of fashion among liberal and radical intellectuals" in the 1950s and the 1960s and the renewed interest today.

Taking note also of the intellectual charge that labor has turned conservative, he writes: "A fairer assessment is that many intellectuals became more conservative and abandoned labor."

KEMBLE TRACES the "unprecedented status and affluence" of the intellectual community in the past few decades "based on relationships with institutions which depended for their support on large corporations, the upper classes and the more conservative branches of a now more conservative government.

His article takes up in turn the various charges leveled at labor, documents the actuality and exposes the simple lack of understanding and information. He sums up:

"The mainstream of the labor movement is more involved with social issues of broad public concern, with political action, with race relations, with experimental forms of collective bargaining, with organizing new sectors of the work force and with labor education than it has ever been before."

As to the fate of the new stirrings in the intellectual and academic community and a rising interest in the trade union movement, Kemble wisely comments that a working relationship will entail "more than adding a few 'bread and butter planks' to the New Politics program, inviting some labor leaders in for drinks, or securing a few signatures on an ad or manifesto. . . ."

It will entail an understanding of the dynamics and leadership and traditions of the labor movement for social change, for progress, for the durability and vigor of unions.

Or again in Harrington's words, "it is the largest and most important single force for social reform."

Ideological 'Ego Trips' Fall Somewhat Short of Revolution

By John P. Roche

AS YOU MAY have noticed, nothing has been said here about the indictment of Father Philip Berrigan and others for conspiring to kidnap Henry Kissinger and blow up the steam pipes in Washington. As commentators scoffed and Mary McGrory initiated beatification proceedings for "Father Phil," I nursed a deep uneasiness. There was a strange ring of familiarity about some of the alleged plotting, odd rhetorical twists that gave me a weird sense of deja vu. The recently released correspondence between Berrigan and Sister McAlister confirmed my hunch.

You see, 30 years ago I was on the margins of a proto-conspiracy which had as its goal first to prevent American involvement in World War II, and second—after Pearl Harbor—to convince the populace that FDR had tricked them into an imperialist war. It was composed of anti-war socialists and some of the most militant pacifists I have ever met—they were prepared to kill anybody who supported the war.

I was, for reasons deeply buried in my psyche, bitterly anti-war, but not a pacifist. I was considered highly suspect by a number of the characters involved, mainly because of my mordant Irish jokes, which they viewed as "counter-revolutionary defeatism." (I suppose the highest standing I could obtain in today's FBI terminology would be that of a "material witness.") The group (which is not a good word, since there was no real organization—anybody who came to a caucus was automatically on the executive committee) used to assemble in a co-op (a commune in today's terminology) on Bleeker St. in New York.

There was no booze or drugs—leftwingers in those days tended to be extremely puritanical—but some of the ideological trips were real fantasies. And the wildest men of all were the militant pacifists, several divinity students among them. Most were obsessed with the notion that the place was bugged and the grouplet infiltrated by police agents. Several individuals had me as number one candidate, largely because—after an intensive search for bugs—I remarked offhandedly that the FBI wouldn't waste time on a bunch of kooks like us.

The problem was that, even if I was under suspicion, I was essential to the publication of our "internal organ," i.e., our mimeographed monthly. As a student in college I earned money for textbooks from the National Youth Administration by cutting stencils and running the mimeograph for the admissions office.

So I attended interminable meetings on "How to Revolutionize the Working Class," "The Need for Revolutionary Defeatism," and similar esoteric topics. They were quite dull and the environment began to get on my nerves—it was so damn filthy. (My father was unemployed for most of the Depression, but the kitchen was always clean and the sight of one cockroach would send my mother on an incredible search and destroy mission. On Bleeker St., the cockroaches seemed to have the status of cows among Hindus.)

THE REAL BREAKING point came, however, when out of the blue one of our fighting pacifists, a divinity student who hailed from a small town out west, suddenly suggested the time had come to "mount a revolutionary witness." Assuming he meant making a speech in Union Square, I came to just in time to hear him urge that we tie up the New York subway system. That did it. I have never been much of an authority on divinity, but I knew a good deal about subways.

Here ended my role as a "material witness" in a "conspiracy" that never came off. I told him that (1) with a nickel, a map, and a Seeing-Eye dog, he couldn't get from Union Square to Borough Hall, Brooklyn, by subway; (2) he was nuts; and (3) the whole crowd there assembled couldn't organize a paper route, let alone a revolution. And I slammed the door on those cockroaches. The group subsequently continued its ruminations, but the mimeographed monthly ceased publication.

So I don't know what kinds of fantasies Father Berrigan and his friends may have toyed with. I would simply state flatly that the only applicable law is that of criminal attempts, not the vague sort of conspiracy dragnet so beloved by the Dept. of Justice. The concern of the jury is with overt acts, not ego trips, and any judgment on the merits must be withheld until the evidence is in.

In the Politics of the '70s:

Labor's Role As Liberal Force Held Vital to Nation's Future

The following is excerpted from an article by Richard M. Scammon, "Today's Trade Unionist," in the May 1971 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

TODAY'S TRADE UNION movement is possibly more intertwined with the total future of the public than it ever was in the past and I think the basic issues and challenges the trade unions face are two—the same two as the whole country faces.

The first is the challenge to ensure peace and security overseas—not just peace; not just security; but peace and security. This is not the particular problem of the trade union movement, it's a problem of all Americans.

The second is to secure peace and security at home—which is as important as it is overseas, if not more so. This means that the trade union movement must have law and order in our social system at home.

Now, I know some people prostitute the phrase "law and order" just as some, like Hitler, took words like "national" and "workers" and turned them into a fascist political organization. Some people can take "law and order" and turn it that same way.

But it is essential for a trade union movement that is going to live and be viable and make a contribution in America that the streets and the universities and all of the life around us be free of the pollution of social violence. A society which does not take a strong stand for law and order is a society in which a trade union movement cannot long exist. It will end up eventually in such a malaise of dislaw and unorder that your trade union movement becomes something such as was dreamed up by Hitler, Mussolini or Stalin.

In the long run, a free trade union movement must have a democratic base which must in turn exist through a system of social discipline and law and order. It's also a fact that most of those who enforce law and order are basically working class people. You know the story told about Chicago: The youngster is demonstrating and shouting, "I strike for unity of the proletarian," and the policeman looks at him and says, "I am the proletarian." Without law and order, aims of social and economic justice have no meaning.

Among other issues which confront the trade union movement and Americans generally is the struggle for a cleaner environment. But in the struggle against pollution one must give due regard to the dangers from those who would move us back to the 1880s on the theory that any kind of progress or industrialization is bad.

In some cases in the last two years, the worker has been tossed aside cavalierly—perhaps because the summer home of the upper middle class might be potentially damaged by a degree of pollution. Some who want to move backward, like Prof. John Kenneth Galbraith, say we must have less "social consumption." I suppose less social consumption means some worker gives up his six-pack and Galbraith gives up his airplane.

For the trade union movement and for everyone, issues like job security and unemployment have come very much to our attention in the past year. But they're always with us. They are never totally absent. Sometimes they are a little more with us than others, but these issues will confront the trade union movement in the 1970s as they did in the 1960s.

And the social programs of the American labor movement involving commitments to such things as Medicare and decent housing will continue—unless anyone believes we will solve all of these problems in the next few years. The struggles for decent houses and decent schools are still going to be with us.

ON NATIONAL HEALTH CARE, I don't think anyone has any problem selling Americans on the need. National health insurance is something that has been known in most parts of the world outside the United States for some time—and with luck I think we might get as far as Bismarck did in 1900.

Now, of course, the trade union movement has some special issues, such as foreign trade competition which is costing U.S. workers their jobs. But it seems to me more and more that the trade union movement also has the larger scope of issues which face all of us Americans.

So the major areas of interest and political conflict are not just for the trade union movement, they're for all of America. And looking at the 1970s, one of the reasons labor plays such an important role is that it has the capability of being a moderating and liberal force while both the far left and the far right are seeking to move us to extremes.

From both extremes comes a tendency to bumrap the labor movement, a tendency to say, "they're just a bunch of finks," a tendency to bring out the old dirty ethnic jokes; a tendency for the mean and bigoted mind of the extremist to find the "only answer" and if you don't believe them, then bang, out you go.

These people need to destroy the moderating influence of a free trade union movement. They cannot really build their particular world in a free atmosphere and one of the most important aspects of the free atmosphere they must destroy is the free trade union movement. They try to drive a wedge between the leaders and members. They try to allege great misdeeds on the part of the trade union movement. But most of all they seek to demean the trade unionist by saying he isn't needed, that his job is finished.

I think that in the politics of the 1970s, the greatest and most vital contribution the labor movement can make is simply to continue as a liberal, progressive, moderating force, speaking out for its own members—and by so doing, speaking out for the whole country.

Risks Increasing:

Lag in Fire Protection Service Looms as Threat to Big Cities

FURTHER CUTBACK of the nation's already "undermanned fire service" could prove "disastrous" to any major American city, Pres. W. H. McClennan of the Fire Fighters warned in a network radio interview.

Research and development of new fire-fighting technology and modern equipment are critical first steps toward efficient and effective protection, McClennan declared, but little "real advancement" has been made in recent years, largely because of the worsening "financial plight of the cities." He said the lag has also increased the personal risks of fire-fighting, pointing out that the Dept. of Labor has labeled it "the most hazardous job in the United States today."

Questioned by reporters on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program, Labor News Conference, McClennan said the union and its 1,700 locals throughout the country are gearing up to help local governments get the kind of federal aid they need to improve fire protection. But, he stressed, it's doubtful that the kind of no-strings-attached revenue sharing Pres. Nixon has proposed is the solution.

Without strict guidelines, he asserted, federal funds "given to a city to improve fire and police services" could be diverted to other programs, rather than used to "beef-up fire and police" protection.

McClennan said nearly every major city now has a paid, professional fire service, and that the Fire Fighters are either the bargaining agent or have substantial membership in most of the departments. He said the union, with a current membership of 155,000, is "shooting for membership of all the potential Fire Fighters by 1972. He also renewed the call for a "national collective bargaining law" that would give all Fire Fighters full union and collective bargaining rights.

WHEN LABOR SEC. James D. Hodgson appeared before the House General Labor subcommittee to testify on minimum wage legislation he crystalized two very key issues:

- He called for postponement of an increase in the minimum to $2 an hour until 1974.
- He proposed a double standard that would result in a lower wage floor for teenagers.

Organized labor is seeking at least a $2 minimum immediately and says that a $2.50 floor is justified. Senate Labor Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), has introduced a bill calling for a $2.25 floor.

The Nixon Administration, in urging postponement of the $2 minimum, contends that it would have a serious effect on both inflation and employment if instituted now.

Williams takes an entirely different approach: a deep concern for the plight of the worker currently earning only $1.60 an hour. He points out that working for a full-employment year at this pay level would mean only $3,200 which "is far below the federal government's defined poverty level of $3,900 for a family of four."

In addition, Williams notes, inflation has eroded the $1.60 floor set in 1966 so that "as measured in 1966 dollars, the current $1.60 buys less than the $1.25 minimum bought in 1966."

Another prime reason for raising the minimum now, Williams continues, is that it would "considerably reduce the cost to the taxpayers." He adds: "Inasmuch as most welfare reform measures now being considered by the Congress would provide supplemental payments for the working poor, an increase in the minimum wage will reduce supplemental payments to be made by the government."

Williams voiced the view that the $2 minimum is essential now, notwithstanding the inflation argument. And there should be extension of coverage to the 13 million workers not now covered by the legislation.

THE SECOND recommendation of Hodgson—that the $1.60 minimum should continue for teenagers—has been kicking around the Administration for the last two years. However, Hodgson's advocacy in his testimony was the first official endorsement.

As far back as November 1969, Sec. of Commerce Maurice Stans was quoted as saying that the then Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz was studying a subminimum wage of "about $1.20 or $1.25 an hour."

When told that under such a subminimum some companies might try to replace adults with young workers or to hire no one but youths, Stans was quoted as saying: "There's nothing wrong with that."

Hodgson, in his 1971 report to Congress, declared "it was difficult to prove any direct relationship between minimum wages and employment effects on young workers." Yet, the Secretary is now recommending a subminimum wage.

"A lower minimum wage for teenagers," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller told the House Labor subcommittee, "would have four distinct disadvantages: displacement of working heads of families, blatant discrimination against young workers, loss of dignity in the work they perform, and an unfair increase in profits for those unscrupulous employers who would discriminate against teenagers by paying them a lower minimum wage than adults for the same work."

Biemiller acknowledged that the teenage jobless problem—particularly among black teenagers—was serious, but he pointed out that "teenage unemployment has always been higher than the national average of workers. This is because teenagers are new job seekers; seek only part-time employment near home; look for temporary summer jobs and then return to school."

A massive public service job program for both youth and adults was the answer, not a subminimum wage, he stressed.

MORE CUTBACKS of already undermanned fire departments could spell disaster for major cities, Fire Fighters Pres. W. H. McClennan, center, warned on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Frank Swoboda, center, of Business Week magazine, and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO produced interview is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

NATIONAL HEALTH SECURITY is the one program that will fulfill medical care needs of all Americans, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland tells the Group Health Association at a two-day institute in Washington.

Health Security Seen Spurring Vital Reforms

continued. "We say it is time to deliver that right.

"It is not enough that just about every national health insurance proposal says nice words about prepaid group practice.

"We gain no satisfaction that people are using the words 'national health insurance' and 'group practice' without gritting their teeth."

The concept of prepaid group practice must be the cornerstone of any national health insurance effort, he said, noting that Health Security fully employs the idea.

Kirkland said that to do the job, any national health insurance program must:

- Have a fair method of financing and strong cost controls.
- Be workable.
- Be comprehensive enough to cover both small and large medical bills.
- Have quality standards and assure that care is accessible.
- Have sufficient options to allow for differences in our society.

He stressed also that the national program must "eliminate the degrading, wasteful and ineffective system of two classes of health care: one for the poor and another for the rich."

"We have a commitment to high quality medical care for all Americans," he said. "Even if every civil rights law is enforced to the fullest, America would still have discrimination—discrimination in terms of health."

He cited inequities in the nation's existing health delivery system that offer the poor and the minorities no better care than those of undeveloped nations.

Union members and their families are tired of insurance policy loopholes, Kirkland declared, adding that deductibles, co-insurance, waiting periods, exclusions and other faults keep people from getting the health care they need.

Health Security will fill that need, he advised.

"We will accept every suggestion for improving the legislation," Kirkland noted, "but the trade union movement will fight . . . any effort to dilute or undermine it."

500 Certified for Aid Based on Shoe Imports

Nearly 500 members of the Shoe Workers in New England who lost their jobs because of rising imports have been certified eligible for trade adjustment assistance.

The affected workers certified by the Labor Dept. include 280 employes of the Maine Shoe Co. at Brunswick, Me., and 218 employes of the Kramer Shoe Co. at Haverhill, Mass.

Rail Strike Injunctions Tied to Duty to Bargain

The Supreme Court by a 5-4 majority has ruled that a railroad union can be enjoined from striking, despite the Norris-LaGuardia anti-injunction law, if a judge decides that the union hasn't fulfilled its obligation to bargain in good faith.

At issue was whether a federal court could issue an injunction prohibiting a railroad union from striking after all of the procedures of the Railway Labor Act have been exhausted and the issue at dispute is still unresolved.

The high court did not say that the United Transportation Union hadn't bargained in good faith before it decided to strike the Chicago & North Western Railway after more than four years of futile negotiations.

But it sent the case back to a federal district judge to hold hearings on the merits of the railroad's claim before ruling on the request for an injunction.

Four dissenting justices sharply protested the majority decision, which overruled two lower courts.

The dissent, written by Justice William Brennan, charged that the majority decision deals a "mortal wound" to the use of economic pressure as a key ingredient of collective bargaining.

The possibility of a strike is an important factor in achieving an agreement, the dissenting justices pointed out. But if the possibility of a strike "can now effectively be thwarted by injunction and by drawn-out court proceedings . . . the threat of its use becomes impotent, indeed."

Joining Brennan in the dissent were Justices Hugo Black, William Douglas and Byron White.

The majority decision, written by Justice John M. Harlan, acknowledged that opening the door wider to strike injunctions "creates a not insignificant danger that parties will structure their negotiating positions and tactics with an eye on the courts" and that the party opposing any change "may be less willing to compromise."

Nevertheless, the Supreme Court said, there is a legal requirement in the Railway Labor Act that both sides "exert every reasonable effort" to reach agreement without a strike and it is the duty of the courts to determine if such an effort has in fact been made.

The AFL-CIO, in a friend of the court brief to the Supreme Court, had argued that "fundamental labor law principles, established by the Railway Labor Act and the Norris-LaGuardia Act, preclude the issuance of the strike injunction" sought by the employer.

If employers find they can block a strike by seeking an injunction, the AFL-CIO warned, "every unsettled major dispute will be brought to the federal court on allegations of bad faith bargaining."

The issue in dispute in the case before the court was the union's effort to negotiate minimum standards for composition of train crews—an issue the Supreme Court itself had held to be negotiable.

Railroad management claimed that the union hadn't made a maximum effort to reach an agreement because it insisted on negotiating the issue separately with each railroad while being "adamant" that it wouldn't settle with the Chicago & North Western on terms inferior to those it had negotiated with other railroads.

Handbag Pact Sets Guideline For Imports

New York—Local 1 of the Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers has approved a three-year contract providing wage increases of 50 cents an hour and a measure of protection for workers against the rising flood of imports.

The contract stipulates that employes must be working a 37½-hour week with 2½ hours overtime before an employer can buy, import or contract items.

The agreement affects 12,000 workers in the New York area. Local Manager Ben Feldman said the pact was negotiated in an atmosphere of tension created by increased living costs, the impact of escalated imports from abroad, and recession at home.

But the National Handbag Association, the management group, came to terms a few days before the May 31 contract expiration date.

The pact also provides:

- New minimums of $3.50 an hour for piece workers, up 50 cents an hour; $200 a week for patternmakers, up from $150 weekly, and a base rate reaching $125 a week in two years for experienced shipping clerks—an increase of $40.
- One additional paid holiday—Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday—making a total of nine.

The contract will expire Apr. 19, 1974, a date which coincides with the expiration of the agreement of the Four Joint Boards of New England, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

Aluminum Accord Wins Major Gains

terns set, attention shifted to the other big industry negotiations on the Steelworkers 1971 bargaining schedule—copper contracts expiring June 30 and the big basic steel contracts that expire July 31.

The White House once again sought to stiffen steel companies to resist comparable wage settlements by complaining about the "inflationary" effect of the contract patterns.

The can settlement had been attacked by the President's Council of Economic Advisers in an "inflation alert" that AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany denounced as interference in the collective bargaining process.

And White House Press Sec. Ronald L. Ziegler told newsmen that Pres. Nixon was "disappointed" at the aluminum industry wage-price developments and believes the pattern must be broken to achieve "stability" in the economy.

Alcoa used the contract settlement as an occasion to announce that it will raise prices about 6 percent next September—a timing that was viewed as an attempt to induce buying by customers that had stocked up as a hedge against a possible strike. Other firms indicated they would "match" the price hike.

As taken from a summary of the Alcoa pact, the principal features of the aluminum contracts include:

- A first-year general pay raise of 50 cents an hour, plus a larger differential between job grades averaging an additional 5 cents an hour.
- Increases averaging 15.7 cents an hour in both the second and third years, plus a guarantee of at least 12.5 cents a year in the cost-of-living allowance. Thus the pay raise over the three-year period would be at least $1.11 an hour—a 31 percent increase over the previous average wage of $3.60 an hour.
- Monthly pensions would be based on $9 multiplied by years of service, which the Steelworkers said will make it the nation's highest industrial pension benefit. The previous rate was $6.50 and the can settlements provided an $8.50 rate. Workers who retired before June 1, the effective date of the new contract, will receive a $15-a-month pension boost. Other pension improvements are also provided.
- A unique new feature in an industry which operated seven days a week is a 25-cents-an-hour bonus for all hours worked during any week in which a worker's regular workweek includes Saturday or Sunday.
- To encourage spreading out of vacations, the amount of vacation bonus was raised during off-season periods. Thus a worker taking his vacation in the summer months and around the Christmas season will receive a $30 bonus, rising to $40 for vacations taken in April, May, September and October, and reaching $50 for February, March, November and parts of December and January.

There were numerous other improvements, including job classification revisions, higher life insurance for both active workers and retirees, substantially improved medical benefits, a $30 a week increase in the maximum supplemental unemployment benefit and other gains.

While bargaining separately, negotiators for the Steelworkers and the Aluminum Workers cooperated closely during the talks and emerged with closely parallel agreements.

'Inflation Alerts' Scored As Madison Ave. Tactic

Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) scored the Nixon Administration's so-called Inflation Alerts, stating that they "simply do not work."

Jackson's comments were recorded in a special interview for COPE Report, the new cassette tape program of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education. The June issue of the program includes a special report on America's economic problems.

"I reject the approach of this Administration in singling out particular price schedules or wage settlements on an arbitrary basis," Jackson said. "This is a little more of that Madison Avenue approach."

He called for an "equitable" and "systematic wage-price policy based on publicly stated rules."

Jackson told COPE Report: "I think we should at least insist that we define sin before we stone the sinners about being out of line on wages, as an example."

The Nixon Administration doesn't understand "the drastic dimensions of today's unemployment," Jackson said. He rejected official statistics on unemployment as misleading.

"There are thousands of Americans out of work, looking for work, hoping for work, who never show up in the statistics," he declared.

"The cold computations of national unemployement rates can never reflect the real tragedy of lost hope, self-respect, lost opportunity to participate in the American dream."

The Washington Democrat called for enactment of programs to create jobs and for a cut in the personal income tax to increase the buying power of wage earners.

Rep. James Corman (D-Calif.), one of the principal sponsors of the AFL-CIO-supported National Health Security program, sharply criticized the Nixon health insurance proposal in another interview on the June COPE Report.

Corman said the only group that stands to benefit from the Nixon proposal are the insurance companies. The Nixon plan, he continued, "doesn't meet the needs of the health care of American citizens."

Jackson, Corman and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany appear on the portion of COPE Report designed to be played at local union meetings. Also on the June COPE Report is background material for union officials on the minimum wage, the Public Service Jobs bill, and 18-year-old voters.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland also provides facts for union leaders about the role of construction labor in the American economy.

Textile, Apparel Jobs Lost to Imports

Domestic Industries Shrink As Foreign Goods Expand

By John R. Oravec

Today, is undoubtedly, the saddest day in the industrial history of Martinsburg. The death of Interwoven, known as Martinsburg Mills, brings to an end an 80-year record, during most of which the plant was Martinburg's greatest industrial pride. Several generations were raised to identify Martinsburg, through Interwoven, as the largest manufacturer of men's hosiery in the entire world. . . .

Of immediate concern is the fact that some 375 residents of this community will soon be without jobs. This size employment loss has to have a depressing effect upon a locality of our population.—The Martinsburg (W.Va.) Journal, Mar. 20, 1970.

Although the loss of 375 jobs is just a ripple in the nation's worsening unemployment situation, there are hundreds of "Martinsburgs" around the country where workers in the textile and apparel industries have been thrown out of work by production cutbacks and plant shutdowns.

The causes vary from place to place—the general economic recession, the impact of foreign imports, the take-over of smaller firms by conglomerates.

Even workers who have retained their jobs are feeling the sting of cutbacks. Man-hours have dropped substantially since 1968, and in some areas the workweek has been shortened to three days.

Nationwide, the unemployment rate for experienced apparel workers averaged 8.2 percent in 1970, up from 5.9 percent in the two preceding years.

And the situation has since grown worse:

- The Clothing Workers reported nearly 15,000 members have lost their jobs because of production cutbacks and plant closings during the past year.
- The Textile Workers Union of America recorded 32 mill liquidations in 1969, eliminating 8,800 jobs. In 1970, another 78 mills were shut down, putting 14,000 workers—both organized and non-union—on the street.
- For the Ladies' Garment Workers, the nation's economic slowdown and rising imports have cut the union's membership by nearly 9,000 since 1968.

Similar problems are being felt by the United Textile Workers of America and the United Garment Workers.

Most union leaders in the textile and garment industries link the spreading job losses to the combination of the sagging national economy and unchecked competition of imported products.

Economists of the ACWA and the ILGWU noted that when consumers are cautious as they are now, clothing purchases are restrained.

When the economy was buoyant and per capita income and purchasing power were expanding, the ILGWU executive board noted in a recent report, sales boomed to reward workers with full employment. Only the impact of imports tempered the conditions.

When the economy turned down and imports continued to rise, production cutbacks resulted. This triggered layoffs and plant closings, thousands of job losses.

Harry Frumerman, associate research director for the Clothing Workers, noted that the average workweek for members who have kept their jobs has declined from 35.9 hours in 1970 to 33.3 hours in February 1971. This is even below the 34.1 hours recorded in the recession of 1958.

The average workweek for ACWA production workers has been slipping almost steadily since 1966 when it was 38.3 hours.

In textiles, the Eastern Seaboard states have been hit particularly hard by the closing of mills in recent years. And many of these mills have been in one-industry towns that have depended almost solely on textiles for employment.

Of the 78 mill liquidations in 1970 cited by the TWUA, all but a few were in the South and the East. The impact was most severe on the South, which accounted for 57 percent of the shutdowns, and hit non-union as well as organized plants.

In North Carolina alone, there are 13,000 unemployed textile workers, the state Employment Security Commission reported. The number of workers receiving unemployment compensation doubled in the state during 1970.

Thousands of TWUA members also lost their jobs in the Northeast because of mill liquidations.

The bleak picture of shrinking textile employment comes in a Bureau of Labor Statistics report showing a decline of 46,000 jobs in the industry between December 1969 and December 1970.

An ILGWU report suggests that BLS statistics showing unemployment for apparel workers averaging 8.2 percent for 1970 may not fully reflect the scope of joblessness in the industry. Many workers, particularly in the small one-industry towns, stopped seeking other jobs after their plants closed because no other work is available. And those not actively seeking employment are not counted on the jobless rolls.

The textile and apparel unions stress that the depressed state of the industries cannot be attributed to domestic wage rates.

TWUA researchers point out that productivity increases have averaged 5 percent a year during the 1960s, but real wages only rose 1.5 percent annually on the average as rising prices eroded much of the gains of union-negotiated increases.

And while total wage increases amounted to $1.03 an hour for ACWA members in the 10 years to 1970, the real wage increase was only 53 cents, the union reported.

ILGWU statistics show that the wage portion of the garment dollar actually was less in 1969 than in 1961. For example, wages accounted for 17 cents of each dollar spent on a dress in 1961. By 1969, wages took only 14 cents of the dress dollar. Over the same period, however, retail markups and manufacturers' profits took an increasingly larger share of the dollar.

Meanwhile, imported apparel and textile goods, which a few years ago were merely trickling into domestic markets, developed into a flood.

International agreements have helped keep imports of cotton products under control. But shipments into the United States of garments and textiles produced overseas from man-made fibers have increased about 400 percent in a four-year period.

Four unions—the ACWA, ILGWU, TWUA and the UTWA—have joined together in a continuing campaign for import limitations by the government and testified jointly at congressional hearings last year.

ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky told the House Ways & Means Committee that the survival of the U.S. textile and apparel industries is at stake. "We cannot compete with wages of 8 cents an hour in South Korea or even 37 cents an hour in Japan," he said.

Pres. Louis Stulberg of the ILGWU noted in the testimony that imported apparels have increased from 4 percent to 22 percent of U.S. production since 1956.

The victims of these imports, said UTWA Pres. George Baldanzi, "are plain, ordinary citizens, workers and consumers, the poor and the very poor."

Pres. William Pollock of the TWUA summed it up for the committee, "what we are talking about here are 2.5 million Americans whose livelihood is directly linked" to continuation of the textile and garment industries.

Raleigh Label Disappearing —With 1,500 Baltimore Jobs

Baltimore—The Raleigh label, a respected name in men's clothes for 33 years, is disappearing. So are hundreds of jobs for Clothing Workers in Baltimore.

Raleigh Manufacturing, Inc., was the largest men's clothing employer in the area. Just three years ago, it employed 1,500.

But recessionary and import factors triggered production cutbacks. By late last year, the workforce had been cut to 600.

The end came two weeks before Christmas when the remaining 600 were let go.

Today, much of the massive eight-story clothing plant in southwest Baltimore is bare. Most of the machines and equipment have been sold and shipped out—some to plants overseas that will produce clothes for export back to the United States.

Clothing Workers Vice Pres. Sam Nocella, manager of the union's Baltimore Joint Board, attributes Raleigh's problems primarily to imports.

Domestic markets are being flooded by apparel from Holland, Romania, Yugoslavia, South Korea, Hong Kong and Taiwan, Nocella pointed out.

He charged that foreign manufacturers are "dumping" their products on American markets in an attempt to destroy the U.S. apparel industry. He said that the imports are selling for less in the United States than in the countries where they are produced.

Nocella offered as evidence a suit purchased at a store in downtown Baltimore—not far from the closed Raleigh plant. The three-piece suit—slacks, jacket and vest—retailed for $12.75. It was made in Taiwan.

While that particular suit was of poor quality, much of the men's apparel being imported from other low-wage foreign lands is comparable in quality to U.S.-made products, Nocella observed.

Nocella noted that 3 million foreign-made men's suits entered the United States in 1969, and currently are hitting U.S. markets at an estimated annual rate of 5 million.

As a result, clothing plants still in business in the five-state ACWA region have cut production. In a number of areas the workweek is down to 28 hours, and the union's membership has dropped about 20 percent since 1968 throughout the region.

'. . . Nobody Ever Grew Old'

Martinsburg, W. Va.—James Coffinberger had worked for Martinsburg Mills 50 years. He was laid off permanently last June when the company ceased all production operations and let go 375 of its 475 employes.

Coffinberger got no pension. The plan was abolished after Keyser-Roth took over the firm in 1962.

And like all the other 375 laid-off workers—many of whom had spent most of their working lives at the mills—Coffinberger received no severance pay.

But he was lucky in one sense. He was 65 and qualified for social security benefits. Many of his fellow workers, in their late 50s or early 60s, had to settle for unemployment compensation benefits that paid a maximum of $47 a week until they ran out.

JAMES COFFINBERGER

With a large segment of the community out of work, there were few jobs to be found, especially for the older workers.

Even before Coffinberger went to work at age 15 in the mill, then known as Interwoven, he helped haul the brick for the construction of the main plant building.

The mill, reputed to be the world's largest manufacturer of men's socks, worked its employes 12 hours a day, six and one-half days a week.

Those hours were in force until the workers organized a local of the American Federation of Hosiery Workers in 1933. Coffinberger was one of the founders of the local and served as its president in 1942.

"I remember knocking my knuckles bare on doors trying to get our people organized," he recalled of his service on the organizing committee. The union merged with the TWUA in the early 1960s.

Coffinberger now works four hours a day as a custodian in Martinsburg City Hall to supplement his social security benefits.

Martinsburg Mills will shut down the remainder of its operations—the warehouse, sales and shipping facilities—on June 15, and the remaining workers will be let go.

They, too, face bleak prospects of finding other work in the area. The unemployment rate for Berkeley and Jefferson counties, which encompass the Martinsburg community, is 11.2 percent. It will climb even higher with the added layoff.

Despite Veto Threat:

Public Service Jobs Approved by House

ministration to "sell" its revenue-sharing alternative to the nation's mayors, the two oragnizations that represent almost all city executives took a strong stand for the public service jobs bill and against the Republican substitute.

A joint letter from the National League of Cities and the U.S. Conference of Mayors, read to the House during the debate, summed up the case for public service jobs in this paragraph:

"The need for the services, the jobs, are there. The unemployed people are there. The element missing and critically needed at this time is federal funds to put unemployed citizens to work immediately within muncipalities throughout America performing worthwhile tasks for all."

Meanwhile, Congress was within one step of passing the other half of labor's program to lift the economy out of recession by using federal funds to create new jobs.

A House-Senate conference committee has already reached agreement on a $2 billion accelerated public works program to enable communities with high unemployment to put some 170,000 persons to work within a year building and repairing needed public facilities.

The conference report has to be acted on first by the Senate, and Public Works Committee Chairman Jennings Randolph (D-W. Va.) was waiting for a break in the prolonged debate over the draft extension bill to get the conference report to the floor.

Opponents will seek to kill the accelerated public works provision of the bill, which also extends the Appalachian Regional Development Act and the program of aid to disstressed areas. But supporters say they have the votes to pass the program intact.

With the House and Senate now having record votes rejecting the special revenue-sharing concept, the future of the President's proposal to turn over funds to the states without specifying how they are to be used appeared dim.

That conclusion was inescapable after the first day of hearings before the House Ways & Means Committee on the Administration's general revenue-sharing plan.

Treasury Sec. John B. Connally presented the Administration's case before a committee whose chairman, Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), and ranking Republican member, Rep. John W. Byrnes (R-Wis.), had already indicated their distaste for the concept.

About the kindest words Connally heard came in the courteous acknowledgement from Mills, "Let me congratulate you on a very fine statement in behalf of a very weak cause."

Thereafter the comments and questions were more caustic.

Connally, a former Democratic governor of Texas, complained about the difficulty he had in raising money to meet the state's needs.

Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) wanted to know whether Texas had a state income tax.

"No, ma'am," Connally replied.

"Well," Mrs. Griffiths retorted, "Michigan does have an income tax. I'm not interested in Michigan paying any more to help Texas meet its problems."

Several committee members, however, held open the possibility that a compromise solution to the admitted problems of financing city and state services could be worked out if the Administration were willing to depart from its blueprint.

The committee, having finished its work on the welfare reform and social security package bill, has scheduled two weeks of hearings on the revenue-sharing proposal. Then it is expected to decide whether to bury the plan entirely or work out its own substitute version.

The Senate remained tied up in an off-and-on debate over a bill extending the draft and providing pay raises to encourage enlistments in the military services.

The Game

NLRB Officials Back Plan to Speed Cases

Labor Board General Counsel Arnold Ordman defended the NLRB's record in handling its mounting caseload, but endorsed proposals to speed board processes by giving trial examiners greater authority in routine unfair labor practice cases.

Testifying before the House Special Labor subcommittee, Ordman said that authorizing the board to delegate to trial examiners power to decide the cases is "an administrative necessity for the continued successful disposition of the agency's growing caseload."

Board Member John M. Fanning and Chairman Edward B. Miller also appeared before the subcommittee which is conducting hearings on proposed amendments to the National Labor Relations Act which would strengthen protection of workers and cut down notorious procedural delays.

Subcommittee Chairman Frank Thompson (D-N.J.) has introduced amendments to:

- Give trial examiners final authority in routine unfair labor practice cases, subject to discretionary review by the full board.
- Make NLRB orders self-enforcing unless appealed within 45 days.
- Authorize workers discharged unfairly for union activity to sue for treble damages in the federal court system.

AFL-CIO Associate General Counsel Thomas E. Harris previously testified in favor of the first two proposed amendments, but opposed the third on the grounds that "it puts the burden of enforcement on the individual worker."

Ordman defended the board on the amount of time it takes to settle cases, noting that almost 80 percent of the cases are settled without resort to formal litigation.

Fanning said that "speed and decisiveness are essential ingredients in dispensing justice. Common sense lines must be drawn limiting the time spent searching for truth and justice, if justice is to be done at all."

Miller told the subcommittee that when Congress thinks about restructuring the NLRB, it should be thinking about how the board can best serve as an effective labor judiciary. He, too, said greater promptness could be achieved by giving legal effect to the rulings of the first-line decision makers.

Rep. Leslie Aspin (D-Wis.) called for amendments to provide triple back pay for employes illegally fired for union activity.

He said stiff fines must be imposed on employers who repeatedly violate the NLRA "because they find it cheaper to break the law than to comply with labor board findings."

Aspin made his recommendations on the basis of a study he conducted on illegal discharges in the New England area while at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

High Jobless List Expands To 55 Areas

The Labor Dept. had a more specific description of unemployment in each area:

- Saginaw—Increased unemployment reflected job losses in transportation, communications and public utilities, as well as scattered layoffs of residents working in surrounding communities.
- Duluth-Superior—Jobs showed a sharp decline here because a major electrical machinery firm closed down its operation.
- Hamilton-Middletown—Increased unemployment was the result of layoffs in paper and allied products and aircraft parts production resulting from the cancellation of the supersonic transport (SST). Since 1964, Hamilton-Middletown had been classified in the "moderate" unemployment bracket—3 percent to 5.9 percent.

One major labor area already listed as having substantial unemployment—Jersey City, N.J.—moved from the 6-to-8.9 percent bracket to the 9-to-11 percent bracket.

With the addition of Jersey City, there were 11 major areas in the 9-to-11 percent bracket.

Among the 150 major labor centers, six are currently classified by the Labor Dept. as having "persistent" unemployment—a jobless rate of 6 percent or more for a year with the rate at least 50 percent above the national average for several years.

Besides the major areas, 497 smaller ones are in the persistent category. Twelve of them were added in May.

AFL-CIO Asks $2 Wage Floor Now, Bids Senate Reject Lower Youth Pay for any other category of worker. We believe that the minimum wage represents a floor under wages, and that no one—young or old, black or white, male or female—should be asked to work for less than the wage floor."

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson earlier appeared before the subcommittee to present the Administration position for a freeze on the minimum for teenagers and students "to provide incentives for opening up new job opportunities for these young people."

But, Biemiller reminded the Senate panel, Hodgson's own annual report to Congress on the impact of minimum wage legislation pointed to an entirely different conclusion.

It cited "a comprehensive study of the relationship between youth unemployment and minimum wages" that the Labor Dept. conducted last year.

And it reported that "a significant finding was that it was difficult to prove any direct relationship between minimum wages and employment effects on young workers."

Biemiller termed it "beyond comprehension" that Hodgson and the Administration can recommend a lower wage for youth "in the face of their own reports."

Hodgson's testimony also reiterated the Administration position that the $1.60 wage floor be raised gradually to $1.80 in 1972 and to $2 in 1974, with the farm wage allowed to rise only to $1.45 in 1972 and then to a permanent level of $1.60 in 1974.

The AFL-CIO testimony termed it "unconscionable" for the Administration to ask that the $2 wage floor be postponed in the face of the sharp rise in living costs.

Labor's recommendation, Biemiller said, is "a uniform minimum wage for all workers of at least $2 now and with substantial increases in the next two years."

The same rates, he said, should apply to agricultural workers, household workers and government employes.

"We do not believe that social legislation should be used to create second-class citizenship. We reject arguments that expansion of coverage must be postponed if the minimum wage is increased."

Past increases in the wage floor have helped the nation's economy, Biemiller noted, despite predictions by opponents of dire results.

The Nixon Administration, he charged, has opened "a concerted campaign" to force a low wage economy on the nation. But in fact, he stressed, "the economy needs—and must have—the added purchasing power these increases will provide."

NBC Radio to Air Meany Interview

"A Conversation with George Meany" by Herbert Kaplow, White House correspondent for the National Broadcasting Company, will be broadcast over the NBC radio network at 12:30 PM, EST, June 13.

The program will be part of the Eternal Light series featured on NBC radio. Local NBC stations should be checked for broadcast time in various parts of the country.

Labor Dept. Names Two To Regional Staff Posts

The Labor Dept. has announced the appointment of Michael D. Banko, Jr., as asistant regional administrator for technical assistance in Philadelphia and William A. Toole as resident compliance officer in Baltimore.

Banko, a former active member of Carpenters Local 2235 in Pittsburgh, has served as vice chairman of the Lawrence County, Pa., Building Trades Association. Toole is a career professional who joined the Bureau of Labor-Management Reports in 1960.

Donated Skills Aid Policeman Rebuild Home

Columbus, Ohio—Union members here came to the rescue of a young policeman and father of five whose modest home was almost gutted by fire.

Skilled craftsmen of the Columbus Building & Construction Trades Council performed $9,000 worth of work on the damaged home of Patrolman Richard Hopson, cleaning out the charred interior, rewiring the house, installing new windows, doors, and drywall and painting all six rooms.

Columbus Building Trades Sec. Ralph G. Hockman said members of the following unions contributed their labor:

Bricklayers Local 55, Carpenters Local 200, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 683, Laborers Local 423, Painters Local 1275, Plumbers Local 189 and Roofers Local 189.

Senate Votes Jobs Spur, Passes Public Works Bill

Jobless Rate Returns to 9-Year High

By Tom Castor

Joblessness among American workers jumped back to its highest level in nine years during May, matching the 6.2-percent peak reached last December, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Although the number of employed persons increased—on both an actual and seasonally adjusted basis—the civilian labor force rose at the same time to more than 83 million, its highest level in history.

The result was an increase of one-tenth of 1 percent in the unemployment rate which the BLS regarded as "essentially unchanged."

The unemployment rate stood at 3.3 percent in January 1969, when Pres. Nixon took office.

Herbert Stein, a member of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, predicted that the jobless rate "could go a few tenths of a point higher." He said the current rate of 6.2-percent was cause for alarm, but hailed what he called "signs of reviving employment."

The AFL-CIO criticized the "torrent of optimistic words" flowing from the White House as both unemployment and prices continue to rise. "Rhetoric is of little comfort to the millions of jobless Americans, and words cannot bridge the gap between family budgets and prices," the federation's statement said.

Assistant BLS Commissioner Harold Goldstein called the slight rise in the jobless rate for May "statistically insignificant," but said it is significant that joblessness has risen slowly and steadily from the 5.8-percent rate recorded in February.

Goldstein made the comment over a telephone hook-up to a hearing room where the Joint Economic Committee of the Congress was in session the day employment figures were released.

Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.), the committee chairman, rigged a telephone to a public address system because he had been told BLS technicians were unable to attend the hearings in person.

He was told, Proxmire said, that BLS personnel were needed to answer telephone inquiries from newsmen since press briefings on job figures were cancelled last March.

During May, the ranks of the unemployed increased by nearly 130,000, bringing the total to 5.2

LABOR'S GROWING CONCERN with problems of poverty, civil rights, housing, education and other social issues are discussed in "A Conversation with George Meany" for broadcast on the NBC radio network June 13. GOP Fails to Block $2-Billion Program

By David L. Perlman

A 45-33 majority of the Senate voted to start up a $2 billion accelerated public works program to help both unemployed workers and their communities.

The vote closely followed party lines, with Republicans seeking to use a procedural controversy to block adoption of the public works program passed by the House.

Labor strongly supported the legislation, and the AFL-CIO stressed in a letter sent to each senator before the vote that the nation needs both the jobs and the facilities that would result from the program.

An estimated 170,000 jobs would be created the first year, both on and off construction sites. Federal funds would be used to finance needed public works projects that cities, counties and states have blueprinted—but have been forced to postpone because of lack of money.

These include waste treatment plants, water and sewer projects, hospitals and health clinics, street improvements and other construction and repair work.

A similar but smaller-scaled program helped pull the nation out of recession in the early 1960s.

Funds in the bill would be spent in communities where unemployment is above 6 percent, in areas of persistent unemployment and where joblessness among returned veterans is high.

While Senate Democrats argued the merits of the program in the debate, Republicans focused on what they claimed was an affront to the Senate's prerogative to amend legislation passed by the House.

The accelerated public works section had not previously been before the Senate, but had been added by the House to two regional development bills the Senate passed earlier this year.

'No-Strings' Sharing Hit As 'Wasteful'

America's cities would be shortchanged by the Nixon Administration's revenue-sharing plan, the AFL-CIO charged at House hearings.

Passing out federal funds without supervision over its use is "wasteful" and "inefficient," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller told the Ways & Means Committee.

Urban areas now get more than two-thirds of all federal grants, he noted, and the money must be used for the priorities set forth by Congress—including job training, education of disadvantaged children, health services and pollution control.

There is no disagreement that more federal funds are needed, Biemiller emphasized. Unless aid is increased, many states and nearly every large city will be forced to make "socially disastrous" cutbacks in public services.

But because "federal funds are not inexhaustible," Congress has an obligation to see that they are used where the need is greatest. Under the Administration program, only

UTU Hails 'Victory':

Rail Unions Upheld On Selective Strikes

By Eugene A. Kelly

The Supreme Court let stand a lower court decision that unions may call strikes selectively against a few railroads to bring pressure for a nationwide agreement.

The United Transportation Union, which was preparing to strike two carriers in March when negotiations on a national agreement broke down, called the outcome a "monumental victory for our members."

UTU Pres. Charles Luna told newsmen in Washington "we have said repeatedly in negotiations that we do not want a national crisis." The courts, he said, have now "spelled out a right that benefits not only UTU members but all of railroad labbor."

Luna did not announce what action the UTU will now take in its years-long effort to get improved contract terms from 170 major railroads.

The dispute over the right to call a strike on any basis less than nationwide grew out of a walkout called last Dec. 10 by the UTU and three other rail unions. The Railway Clerks, Maintenance of Way Employes and the dining car division of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes later came to terms with the carriers but the UTU opposed management demands to weaken protective conditions in the union's existing contracts.

The 180,000-member UTU served notice Mar. 8 of its intent to withdraw from service its members on the Seaboard Coast Line and Burlington Northern railroads.

The carriers obtained a restraining order from Judge John H. Pratt of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia on Mar. 10, and the UTU appealed. Judge Pratt ruled that such a selective strike could not be permitted, since the union bargained with the rail-

'Breach of Faith' Scored In Dropping Cargo Policy

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged the Nixon Administration with "a breach of faith and an unwarranted blow at the livelihoods of American seafaring men" in abolishing the requirement that 50 percent of all grain shipments to Communist-bloc countries be carried on American vessels.

Pres. Nixon revoked the requirement in authorizing U.S. businesses to export to Communist China a long list of goods, including wheat and other grains.

The President's action, Meany said, "constitutes a repudiation of firm commitments made by Presidents Johnson and Kennedy" intended to give "proper consideration to the legitimate interests of American seamen and to the public interest in the maintenance of an American merchant marine."

Meany noted that the maritime industry is suffering "acute economic adversity" and widespread unemployment. He pointed out that it depends for a large part of its work on the 50 percent cargo preference policy, whereas the chief beneficiaries of abandoning that policy will be "a few large corporate grain dealers."

Health Insurers Blamed For Driving Up Costs

New York —Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.), the chief sponsor in the House of the labor-backed National Health Security bill, declared that private insurance companies should "get out and stay out of the medical field" because they "have added absolutely nothing to the quality of health care in the United States, and do little except run up the individual patient's medical costs."

Mrs. Griffiths spoke here at the League for Industrial Democracy's 66th annual conference at which she was presented the League's 1971 Annual Award by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas Lane Kirkland.

Federation Pres. George Meany in a letter to Mrs. Griffiths, added his voice to the LID tribute and cited her "articulate, knowledgeable leadership in the legislative fight for true national health insurance."

Meany said labor is proud "to join you in this fight, and we look forward to the day when National Health Security will be enacted."

Mrs. Griffiths predicted the bill would pass "during this session of Congress because of the unfairness and utter inadequacy of the present health care system. And the American people, if National Health Security becomes a reality, will owe organized labor a debt they can

IUD Pledges Full Support In Wage Drive

New York—The Nixon Administration's failure to halt inflation makes it "all the more necessary" that unions negotiate "overdue economic benefits" for their members, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. declared.

The IUD executive committee, meeting here, "noted with satisfaction" the results of recent contract agreements in aluminum, can, cement and men's clothing.

It voiced "full support" for two industrial unions now moving into decisive stages of the bargaining process: the Communications Workers, which is polling its members on a strike against the Bell Telephone System, and the Steelworkers, now in the second stage of negotiations to win major contract improvements in basic steel.

"The IUD reaffirms its commitment of full support to these and other unions engaged in the process of winning adequate incomes and improved working conditions for their members," the statement said. "It is up to the unions of America to halt the steady erosion that unchecked inflation has brought about in the living standards of working people and their families."

IUD Pres. I. W. Abel also announced that the department had voiced support for the United Telegraph Workers and the CWA in the current strike against Western Union. The IUD called upon the big communications company to come forward with a "more realistic economic package" so that the dispute can be settled quickly.

On the second day of the meeting, the IUD officials visited headquarters of the United Nations for a series of briefings and discussions, which had been arranged by the United Nations Association.

The meetings included a breakfast session with Porter McKeever, UNA president; a special tour of UN headquarters and a half-hour meeting with Sec. Gen. U Thant, who expressed his pleasure at the interest and support shown the UN by American labor unions.

Other meetings were held with Paul Hoffman, one-time Marshall Plan director who now—at the age of 80—heads the UN's economic development fund for helping less industrialized countries; with David Morse, former director general of the International Labor Organization; and with Maurice Strong, director of a UN conference on pollution to be held in Stockholm next spring.

Afterwards, the delegation visited the U.S. Mission to the UN for a discussion with Ambassador George Bush and his top aide, Ambassador Max Finger.

Abel presented to the ambassador an IUD resolution urging U.S. ratification of the UN international agreement outlawing genocide, or mass murder of peoples.

Air Controllers Regain Status

The Professional Air Traffic Controllers Association, affiliated with the Marine Engineers, has been formally approved as a labor organization by the Labor Dept. PATCO announced its intention to seek an election as sole bargaining representative of controllers under Presidential Executive Order 11491 involving unions of federal employes.

Assistant Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., ruled after an objection from the National Association of Government Employes, unaffiliated, that PATCO has "demonstrated by specific affirmative action . . . that it will not engage in strike action against the federal government." He restored to PATCO the status it lost after a protest strike.

never repay—because they were in there when the battle was really hot and when they were really needed."

Kirkland called the National Health Security bill "an idea whose time has come."

"Now is the time," he said, "to translate into reality the notion that the richest society in the world has an obligation to all of its citizens to see to it that no one should suffer poor health or premature death because his pocketbook is empty.

"Those who oppose the National Health Security program argue that their own proposals would achieve the very objectives they once denounced as utopian. It's a sign of our times that radical and utopian rhetoric is always ultimately appropriated to camouflage and disguise conservative programs."

Kirkland assailed the Nixon Administration for declaring a "massive crisis" in health care, and then advocating "an utterly inadequate, piecemeal health insurance program designed primarily to preserve the system as it stands today."

Mrs. Griffiths warned that the main danger to National Health Security is that, while the Kennedy-Griffiths bill provides that the Social Security Administration negotiate directly with doctors, every alternative plan would preserve the traditional role of intermediary for Blue Cross and other private insurance companies.

"Now if anybody should get out of the medical field and stay out," Mrs. Griffiths declared, "it's the insurance companies. They've added absolutely nothing. These companies, under any of the alternative proposals, will have no incentive whatsoever to see that care is improved or that the cost is less. But they will be in there fighting all the way to be part of the health care bill that is finally passed.

"The real battle over National Health Security, in my judgment, is not between us and the doctors. The real battle will be between those who want quality health care and the insurance companies. And I am for staying in there to the very end to take the insurance companies out of the bill."

Earlier in the LID Conference, the "Prospects and Problems of Liberal Politics in 1972" were discussed by panelists Gus Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers; Benjamin Wattenberg, co-author with Richard Scammon of The Real Majority; and Joseph Duffey, former national chairman of Americans for Democratic Action.

Arnold Cantor of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research attacked Nixon's revenue-sharing proposals during a debate with William Green, Northeast regional administrator of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development. Cantor repeated labor's opposition to "no-strings" revenue-sharing without adequate federal control over how funds would be spent by local governments. "Alternatives to revenue-sharing," he said, "such as a full-employment economy and the enactment of National Health Security, would do a better job of aiding America's impoverished urban areas."

State-County Wins Sacramento Election

Sacramento—The State, County & Municipal Employes won the right to represent 700 operational and maintenance employes of Sacramento County, and also won runoff positions in two other county employe units.

Election results gave SCME Local 146 a vote of 344 to 161 for SOURCE — Sacramento Organizations United to Represent County Employes. The two runoff elections involve 802 medical center workers and 1,819 clerical employes.

6.2 Percent in May:

Jobless Rate Back At Nine-Year High

million on a seasonally adjusted basis. On an actual basis, unemployment fell by 300,000 to 4.4 million, but the decline was less than usually occurs in May.

The number of persons employed increased by 265,000, seasonally adjusted, putting the total just under 79 million—equal to the all-time high recorded in March 1970.

The effects of long-term unemployment had an increasing impact in May as the number of persons out of work 27 weeks or more rose by 150,000 to a total of 580,000, the highest level since 1963.

Workers unemployed 15 weeks or more totaled 1.2 million, up nearly 200,000 from the previous month on a seasonally adjusted basis. The average duration of joblessness jumped from 10.9 weeks to 11.5 weeks.

Unemployment rates for most major labor force groups showed little change, but the rate for women in the 20-24 age group continued its sharp increase, jumping from 10.2 percent in April to 11.5 percent—its highest level in 10 years.

The BLS said joblessness for construction workers showed a sharp increase on a seasonal basis, rising to 11.2 percent after declining to 9.6 percent in April.

Jobless rates for black and white workers remained unchanged in May with the rate for blacks at 10.5 percent—highest since November 1963—and 5.7 percent for whites, highest since September 1961.

The teen-age unemployment rate remained at 17.3 percent.

The rates for all adult men, 4.5 percent, and for married men, 3.3 percent, were not significantly different from their April levels.

The unemployment rate for women 20 years and over, at 6 percent, was unchanged. Joblessness among adult Negro women increased again in May to 10.6 percent, continuing an upward trend since January.

Among occupational groups, unemployment rates in May were up for sales workers from 4.5 percent to 5.5 percent, and for nonfarm laborers from 10.2 percent to 11.5 percent.

The number of persons who were unemployed because they lost their last job was virtually unchanged at 2.3 million, seasonally adjusted, up 30,000 from April.

But joblessness among persons with no previous work history—including returning veterans—moved up to about 750,000. Since September, the BLS said, this group of job seekers has increased by 150,000.

On the employment side, the number of wage and salary workers on nonagricultural payrolls was 70.8 million, 420,000 more than in April. After seasonal adjustment, payroll employment was up 130,000, the first gain since January.

A very slight increase in manufacturing jobs, 30,000, was industry's first job pickup this year. About 1.6 million factory jobs were lost in the period between late 1969 and last April.

Employment in finance, insurance and real estate and state and local governments increased by about 20,000 in each job classification.

The average workweek for all rank-and-file employes on private nonfarm payrolls was unchanged in May at 37 hours after seasonal adjustment. Factory overtime remained at an average of 2.8 hours.

Average hourly earnings of nonfarm workers were $3.40, up 2 cents from April. Compared with a year ago, hourly earnings have risen 6.3 percent, the BLS said.

Average weekly earnings were at $125.46, up $7.06 or 6 percent from a year ago. The Consumer Price Index rose by 4.3 percent during the year ended in April.

In a separate report, the BLS said the Wholesale Price Index posted a gain of three-tenths of 1 percent, seasonally adjusted, in May. Wholesale price rises usually foreshadow increases in the retail prices paid by consumers.

Selective Rail Strikes Upheld By High Court

roads nationally as a group, not separately.

A three-judge panel of the D.C. Court of Appeals, reversing Judge Pratt, ruled that the union has a legal right to conduct a selective strike in pursuit of a national agreement, provided it acts in good faith and gives at least two weeks' notice to the railroads it singles out. The appeals judges ordered the case back to the District Court "for such further proceedings as may become appropriate."

Appeals Judges Harold Leventhal, J. Skelly Wright and Malcolm R. Wilkey ruled that "when collective bargaining on a national handling basis has come to an impasse and all procedures of the law have been exhausted, it is not unlawful for the union to call a strike against some or a few of the carriers to put pressure on the railroads to reach a national multi-employer agreement."

The action came a week after another decision in which a 5-4 majority of the high court ruled that a threatened strike against a single railroad can be restrained if a judge finds that the union has not fulfilled its duty under the Railway Labor Act to bargain in good faith. The justices, in a case involving the Chicago & North Western and the UTU, sent the case back to District Court for a ruling on whether the union actually had tried to reach agreement over a four-year period.

No Management Offer:

7 Postal Unions File 'Bad Faith' Charges

Unions representing the nation's 650,000 postal workers have filed unfair labor practice charges accusing management of "bad faith" at the bargaining table.

The complaint was signed by the seven unions that have coordinated their bargaining through the Council of American Postal Employes.

It charged that after nearly five months of negotiations postal management has not made a single offer to improve wages or fringe benefits.

The union council's chief negotiator, Bernard Cushman, told a Washington news conference that the management attitude has thwarted the collective bargaining system established by Congress last year in the Postal Reorganization Act.

Postal management, he said, has insisted that unions accept a virtually unrestricted "management rights" clause before any consideration could be given to wage and benefit proposals.

Another management condition would break up craft representation rights mandated by law, Cushman charged.

The unions' spokesman expressed the hope that the filing of the unfair labor practice charges would open the way for meaningful negotiation and avoid the final and binding arbitration provided by law if the parties can't reach agreement.

An independent board of three neutral fact-finders has completed a 45-day study of the unresolved issues, but its 20-page report declined to make recommendations for settlement.

Management, the report noted, is seeking "freedom to contract out, to institute technological changes, to eliminate jobs, to establish new jobs or combine old ones, to fix flexible work schedules, to employ part-time workers and to effectuate discipline by removal of allegedly offending employes from their jobs, prior to the exhaustion of grievance-arbitration procedures."

The fact-finding report said "a major obstacle to collective bargaining" has been that management contends "it cannot make offers with respect to wages or other monetary items until issues affecting its capacity to manage have been resolved. The unions, on the other hand, have urged that a money offer from management is a prerequisite for intelligent and informed consideration" of the other issues.

Under the postal reorganization law, if the contract dispute remains unresolved by July 20—180 days after the start of negotiations—it will go to binding arbitration unless both parties choose to continue direct negotiations.

As for the unfair labor practice charges filed by the union, their status is complicated by the transition of the postal service from a government department, subject to the presidential executive order on employe-management relations, to a largely autonomous service, falling within the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board.

The transition will be completed July 1.

Meanwhile, under the government's internal labor policy, the unfair labor practice charge has been served on the Post Office Dept.—the agency that is accused. If unresolved at that level, it would eventually end up in the office of Assistant Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr.

In July, however, the complaint can be refiled with the NLRB, and Cushman indicated that would be done if the postal service management remained intransigent at the bargaining table.

Present at the news conference were the top officers of the seven unions—the Letter Carriers, Postal Clerks, Post Office Maintenance Employes, Special Delivery Messengers, Mail Handlers division of the Laborers, Motor Vehicle Employes, and Rural Letter Carriers.

POSTAL UNIONS bargaining for 650,000 workers hold a news conference to accuse management of "bad faith" at the negotiating table and to announce filing of unfair labor practice charges. After nearly five months, the unions are still waiting for their first money offer.

ILO Affirms Tripartite Principle In Electing Employer President

Geneva—The 56th conference of the International Labor Organization elected as its president Pierre Waline, a French employer, with the warm endorsement of the worker delegates.

Brushing aside the "strong protest" registered by Ivan V. Goroshkin, a Soviet deputy labor minister, the conference proclaimed Waline president without a formal vote at the opening of the three-week session.

Goroshkin had rushed to the rostrum in Geneva's Palace of Nations to object in the name of eight Communist countries to the selection of a non-government delegate to fill the presidency. The Soviet representative made clear that in objecting to Waline's election he was registering Moscow's disapproval of the autonomy enjoyed by the worker and employer delegates. This autonomy had resulted in "discrimination" against the Communist representatives, he complained.

Commenting later on the election, U.S. Worker Delegate Rudolph Faupl said he warmly endorsed the conference's choice of the French employer because "it rightly honors a man who has devoted nearly 50 years of service to the fundamental principles and ideals of the ILO."

"But I also welcome it," the leader of the AFL-CIO delegation continued, "because in electing a non-governmental delegate over the vehement Communist objections, the conference reinforced the ILO's tripartism by confirming that the presidency is not the monopoly of any one group."

The Communist delegations received a blunt warning at the conference's start to refrain from wasting its time by indulging in vain propaganda speeches.

"The ILO is not a political assembly," S. O. Koku, Nigerian labor ministry official, recalled when opening the session as chairman of the ILO Governing Body.

Calling for the shunning of all "sterile political debates and controversy," the Nigerian official said that the ILO objectives of "better conditions of work and life for the toiling masses of the world" could not be advanced by such tactics.

Earlier, the Governing Body had approved a plan to expand its own membership without altering the basic structure that insures independent representation to trade unions and employers as well as governments.

The executive body's 35 to 8 vote, with 5 abstentions or absentees, in favor of submitting the plan to the conference was a defeat for the Soviet Union.

Moscow was spearheading a drive to change the ILO rules that reserves 10 of the 28 government seats on the Governing Body for the most industrialized of the agency's member nations. The Soviet Union hoped to win support for its so-far unsuccessful campaign to reshape the ILO to its liking by getting more of its allies elected by the conference to the Governing Body.

Joseph Morris of the Canadian Labor Congress, leader of the worker members of the executive forum, angrily denounced the Soviet campaign.

Throughout the Communist speeches calling for changes in the ILO structure "runs the threat of reductions in the right of the groups to make decisions within the framework of their responsibilities to meet the needs and aspirations of working people," Morris charged.

Under the plan being forwarded to the 1973 conference, the Governing Body's membership would be increased to 56 by adding four government seats and giving two additional seats to both workers and employers, thereby increasing the totals of these two groups to 14 each.

At the request of the workers' group, the Governing Body placed on the agenda of the conference the questions of the prevention of occupational cancer and of paid educational leaves for workers.

Painters, Contractors Hit Wage Pact Rejection

Rejection by Pres. Nixon's Construction Industry Stabilization Committee of a pay raise negotiated by Philadelphia painters and their employers drew fire from both labor and management groups.

The committee headed by Chairman John T. Dunlop, Harvard University economist, notified Painters District Council 21 and the Associated Master Painters and Decorators of Philadelphia that a new agreement providing equity wage adjustments of $2.95 an hour over a two-year period has been disapproved.

Dunlop sent a letter to Sec.-Treas. Joseph Tyer of Painters District Council 21, Philadelphia, saying the committee voted June 4 "that the economic adjustments provided in the collective bargaining agreement" between Council 21 and the contractors' association are "unacceptable under Section 6 of Executive Order 11588."

Tyer said his council will resume talks with the employers' group soon to discuss their next course of action. But members of affiliated unions representing about 1,400 area painters feel the rejection was "extremely unfair," Tyer said.

Painters Pres. S. Frank Raftery is attending a meeting of the International Labor Organization in Geneva, Switzerland, and was not available for comment. But the union issued a statement saying the Philadelphia painters and contractors attempted to narrow a wage gap of $3.03 an hour by making $2 of the total increase effective May 1, 1971, to help achieve parity with wages of other trades.

Executive Director E. S. Torrence of the National Painting & Decorating Contractors Association told newsmen the pay boost was justified because Philadelphia painters have fallen behind wages paid other construction crafts. The effort to "catch up" is in keeping with Nixon's executive order, Torrence declared.

The rejection was the first since Nixon issued Executive Order 11588 Mar. 29 setting up committees aimed at "stabilizing" wages, prices, profits and executive income in the construction industry. Dunlop was named chairman of the committee on wages while Housing & Urban Development Sec. George W. Romney was charged with setting up a committee on prices and profits. Romney recently named himself as chairman but has taken no action yet on prices, profits or salaries in the industry.

IUD Endorses Proposal To Speed NLRB Action

The AFL-CIO's Industrial Union Dept. added its support to proposed amendments to the National Labor Relations Act that would give trial examiners final authority in routine unfair labor practice cases and make Labor Board orders self-enforcing.

"These steps could cut off some six to nine months on the average, from the two to three years now entailed in obtaining an enforceable court order of a board decision," said Elliot Bredhoff, IUD general counsel.

Bredhoff also urged the House special labor subcommittee to consider "additional remedial measures—such as making employes whole when an employer refuses to bargain—which is direly needed to effectuate our national labor policy."

"Additionally, the subcommittee should strenuously urge the board to make much greater use of its power . . . to seek prompt injunctive relief against employer unfair labor practices," Bredhoff testified.

He was accompanied in his appearance before the subcommittee by Nicholas Zonarich, organizational director of the IUD.

The subcommittee is headed by Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N.J.), who introduced amendments to expand the authority of NLRB trial examiners, subject to discretionary review by the full board, and make NLRB orders self-enforcing unless appealed within 45 days.

Another proposal by Thompson would give an employe discharged for union activity the right to sue for treble damages in the federal courts.

A host of witnesses from labor and from the board itself, spoke in favor of amending the NLRA.

The AFL-CIO supported two of the proposed amendments but opposed the third, on the ground that it would put the burden of seeking damages on the worker.

Bredhoff, in supporting the need to end delays in the NLRB procedure, cited labor's running battles with the J. P. Stevens Co. He pointed to 136 cases against Stevens, 115 of which have been won through the courts along with $1,073,000 in back pay.

The Method of Sharing

THE SHARING of federal revenues with the states and localities has been a part of the American system of government since its very beginning. The first programs date back to the Articles of Confederation of the 1780s, and today about one-fourth of the federal revenues available for domestic use is shared with the states and localities.

Agreement on the responsibility of the federal government to provide financial aid to the states and local governments, particularly in this time of rapid social and economic change, is widespread and longstanding.

So the issue is not whether the federal government should share its revenues with the states and localities. On that there is no disagreement. The issue before this committee and before the nation is the method of distribution and sharing.

The present method of categorical grants-in-aid transfers federal funds to a state or local government for specific purposes or "categories," geared to meet high-priority needs determined by federal legislation. Such programs are established by the Congress, through the normal process of legislation and appropriation, with the opportunity for congressional review of how the programs are working.

Moreover, the state or local government must use such federal grants, usually combined with additional small percentages of state or local funds, to provide specified public facilities or services, under performance standards—such as civil rights and labor standards—that are established by federal statute.

This system has served the nation well.

In contrast, the Administration has proposed a program of "no-strings" revenue sharing with no requirement that the funds be spent for any specified purposes or programs and without specified and enforceable federal performance standards.

THE AFL-CIO is firmly opposed to a concept of no-strings, no-standards and no-supervision revenue sharing. There is no justification for the adoption of a new federal-aid delivery system which is specifically designed to bypass the process of congressional legislation, appropriation and oversight.

The Administration's proposal is not a magical new concept. It will not create money where none now exists. It will not provide the substantive and immediate assistance so badly needed by state and local governments to meet growing public requirements.

Under the present system of categorical grants, federal aid to state and local governments has more than tripled in the past decade—rising from $7 billion in 1960 to $24 billion ten years later. The total is expected to exceed $30 billion in fiscal year 1971.

Despite this sharp rise of federal grants-in-aid—and despite increasing outlays by the states and local governments—mounting needs for public facilities and services have left many states, every large city and countless smaller government units unable to satisfy these needs.

These problems can be solved largely by an improvement in the existing system and a substantial increase in federal grants. And, in many cases, the programs that could provide the funds are already in operation, under federal law.

A Word Edgewise:

'Pass-Fail' Grading System Scored as Academic Swindle

By John P. Roche

ALL MEN are created equal, according to the Declaration of Independence, but we will all recognize the practical limitations of this abstract ideal. While human beings are equal in the sight of God, and should be equal in the eyes of the law, they are obviously not equally strong, bright, musically talented, etc.

Yet in recent years there has been a strong campaign in the nation's colleges and universities against the traditional grading system on the ground that it is not egalitarian, that in separating the men from the boys (or the women from the girls), intellectually speaking, the institution is engaging in undemocratic behavior.

For the old grading system—which used either letter grades with plus and minus or numerical evaluations—the eager reformers have been substituting a variety of alternatives. Here and there, the old wine was simply rebottled: A became "honors," A minus: "honors minus," B plus: "excellent plus," etc.

A version that was a professor's dream of heaven when grading papers involved three categories: Pass, Fail, and Honors. In fact, this is the way exams break—you can immediately spot the outstanding answers and the busts, but sorting out the intermediate mass into Bs and Cs, with plus or minus, is sheer torture.

However, the most "radical" system, which allegedly avoids any invidious discrimination, any elitism, is a simple Pass/Fail arrangement. All students who receive above 60, or D minus, get a "P" on their transcripts. If any manage to get less—which is no mean accomplishment these days—they receive "F."

In other words, the most brilliant student in a class and the marginal floater receive the same grade—this is "equality" with a vengeance. Its defenders insist that such a technique eliminates the "terrible emphasis on grades" or the "competitive environment which takes the joy out of learning." In fact, it is a swindle that ironically has exaggerated the competitive element on a different level.

It is a swindle, first of all, because the faculty no longer has to do any serious evaluation of student performance. If we had a Pass/Fail system, I could grade a hundred hour-exams in two hours. It is a swindle, in the second place, because it fosters a wholly unrealistic notion of the nature of life in the world out there, which is competitive unless one plans to devote himself to monastic contemplation, or has inherited a million dollars.

The real paradox is that the introduction of these mushy grading systems has led graduate and professidonal schools to throw up their hands in despair. As a member of the graduate committee which has the job of choosing students for admission, fellowships, and scholarships, I can speak from experience. A young man or woman applies from a college with the Pass/Fail system. The transcript is a useless record—all "P"s.

AWARE OF THE PROBLEM, some of these colleges have attached a document consisting of "personal comments" by the faculty in various courses. These are generally very revealing: "Fine student," "very perceptive," "good command of the subject matter," etc.

There are, of course, formal letters of recommendation, but they tend to be ritualized encomiums: Indeed, last year a professor at a university wrote us "this is the best student I have had in the last five years" for about two different applicants.

So what do you do? Reach for the GRE (Graduate Record Examination scores). The GRE are nationally administered examinations, the big brothers of the college boards that terrify high school seniors. The individual takes a test of general information, the so-called verbal, a math test, and an exam in his field of interest. The committee eagerly scrutinizes the results and, for lack of any other hard criteria, puts great emphasis on the scores. What could be more competitive?

The same process, I'm told, is true at the law schools, where college transcripts are practically ignored in favor of scores on the LSAT (Law School Admissions Test), another nationally administered objective exam. Students, who are a lot smarter than they are often given credit for, know this. It creates dreadful anxiety, which, if anything, the feedback from "reform" has increased. Now their academic futures virtually depend on one test.

Rooted in U.S. Problems:

'Scag Alleys' of Drug Addiction Run from New York to Viet Nam

The following is excerpted from an article in the New York Times—The Week in Review, June 6, 1971, titled "It's Always a Dead End on 'Scag Alley,'" by Tom Buckley.

THE SHANTYTOWNS that huddle close to the big American military bases in Viet Nam all have their "scag alleys"—the muddy lanes lined with corrugated iron and scrap-wood huts where for $5 or so GIs can buy enough heroin to keep at bay for a day or so the irritations of military discipline, the boredom of routine jobs or the anxieties of combat patrols at the tag end of an unpopular war.

Most of the big cities in this country have their scag alleys, too—usually in the fetid tenements that line the garbage-strewn streets of their ghettos, but more and more frequently in recent years in the middle-class suburbs and on the fringes of college campuses as well. The problem has become so serious that Pres. Nixon last week called for a national program to combat it.

The toll in death and misery is high both in the United States and South Viet Nam. An estimated 25,000 troops, or 10 per cent of the American forces currently on duty in Viet Nam, are believed to have become heroin addicts.

All but unknown three years ago, the heroin menace has grown as the number of troops has declined, and barely remembered now are the days when the home front was shocked by the news that many GIs were smoking marijuana. From last August through February, 95 deaths have been attributed to overdoses of heroin.

Representatives Morgan F. Murphy, an Illinois Democrat, and Robert H. Steele, a Connecticut Republican, who made a special report on the world heroin problem to the House 10 days ago, charged that the military in Viet Nam had been slow to deal with the addiction epidemic.

Mr. Steele declared, "The soldier going to South Viet Nam today runs a far greater risk of becoming a heroin addict than a combat casualty." At the same time, they acknowledged that the connivance of Vietnamese officials in the illicit traffic made it all but impossible to stamp out.

There is no over-all policy for narcotics treatment in Viet Nam. Encouraged by the high command, 10 units have established "halfway houses" where addicted men are tapered off over a period of two weeks or so, usually with decreasing dosages of the synthetic narcotic, methadone, which stills the craving for heroin and blocks its euphoric "rush" if heroin is taken.

The men also receive tranquilizers and psychiatric counseling. In other units, however, addicts may be forced to quit "cold turkey."

Statistics are incomplete, but it is known that in the first three months of this year, a total of 3,458 men passed through the halfway houses under an amnesty provision protecting them from punishment for the use of narcotics and that another 1,084 were charged with the serious offenses of possession, use or sale of heroin.

Another amnesty period is available for GIs who are about to be discharged. It is not known how many have taken advantage of it to get treatment, but bills have been introduced in Congress that would make testing for addiction mandatory and would require the services to keep men on duty until they had been detoxified. "Our response [to addiction] may be confused and fragmented, but no one has the answer in our civilian society, either," a Defense Dept. spokesman stated.

In that "civilian society," the number of addicts is estimated at 200,000 to 250,000, only about one-tenth of 1 percent of the population but troublesome out of all proportion. Half the country's addicts live in the New York metropolitan area, and many of them die there—20 a week on the average from overdoses since 1969.

MOST VICTIMS are found in slum cellars or hallway "shooting galleries," but last week the bodies of two white youngsters were found huddled together on the steps of a hospital in Elmhurst, Queens.

The anti-narcotics effort in this country has been hampered by a slow start, fragmentation of authority, which the President now apparently seeks to end, inadequate financing, and what many public health experts regarded as an overemphasis on punishment rather than treatment, both of addiction and its causes.

Besides the federal agencies, many states and several major cities have narcotics programs. As a result, programs often overlap or work at cross-purposes and administrative expenses tend to be extremely high in proportion to results.

The total cost of these programs is $250-million annually, or about $1,000 per addict, but the indirect costs—prisons, courts, welfare and hospitals, not to mention property losses as a result of thefts by addicts—must be many times greater.

In the past year methadone maintenance, in which addicts receive a daily dose of the drug, has become the dominant narcotics treatment program in New York City.

While the measurable success rate of therapeutic communities and other drug-free techniques has been close to zero, more than 80 percent of those receiving methadone have remained in the program. Of these, more than three quarters or more are working, going to school or functioning as housewives.

As for Pres. Nixon's "national offensive," no assessment was possible until he spelled out the details. Most experts in the field have become convinced in recent years not only that addiction itself is an intractable illness, but also that its roots lie deep within American cultural and social problems, and that even plenty of money and the best of intentions do not guarantee a cure.

Proposal Held Inadequate:

Nationwide Telephone Strike Hinges on Industry's Pay Offer

A NATIONWIDE telephone strike could be averted by improvement in the size and distribution of the industry's wage offer, Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers suggested.

Beirne said that with an industry proposal that falls far short of construction and railroad settlements set by a presidentially appointed board and Congress, "the odds are that a national telephone strike will occur this year."

The walkout would affect 95 percent of all voice communications in the country, Beirne noted. The AFL-CIO vice president made the statements as he was questioned by reporters on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Beirne declared that not only is the 11 percent offered for the first year "not enough on the 'go-down' itself," but the industry's proposal "would also widen the wage differentials . . . between North and South, East and West" that are "already too wide."

He also criticized the second and third year offers of 3 percent productivity increases, stressing that productivity gains in the telephone industry have averaged more than 5.5 percent a year for the last 10 years.

The union president said that although the nation's communications system is highly computerized and could function automatically for some period, major effects would develop "in a short period in a number of cities," such as Chicago, Detroit, New York and Miami, where "the equipment is in pretty sad shape."

Beirne said that the union's strike plans, if they are put into effect, do include protection of "the type of communications that most of us would consider essential." He said the union will send in crews "to maintain service for hospitals, for police departments, for fire departments, and for the essential services in the whole community."

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE DISCOVERY of the gruesome murder of more than a score of itinerant farm laborers appears to have little to do with the basic social and economic problems of the migratory worker. Most of the victims were reported to have been "winos" possibly used as pawns in a fraudulent wage scheme and quite apart from the normal life of itinerant workers.

Nevertheless, the fact that for a long period of time the murdered men were never even missed by their friends and families throws a blinding light on the failure of society to take farm workers of any kind into the community and serves to emphasize their "outcast" status.

This is not new. Some 10 years ago the late Edward R. Murrow made his famous TV documentary "Harvest of Shame," which set in motion all sorts of congressional activity in an effort to bring migratory workers into the mainstream of American life. So far, the results have been so meager that the one word that can really express the result is "failure."

Only recently, this failure was given new emphasis in a report made by the "Migrant Research Project," a division of the Manpower Evaluation & Development Institute, Inc. Made possible by a grant from the Office of Economic Opportunity, the report shows how the migratory worker and his family have been shut out of the normal social agencies of the nation, notably from public welfare.

The report, based on two years' research in 25 states covering more than 13,000 migrant agricultural families, makes no startling discoveries. Only a small percentage of migrant workers participate in social welfare programs; most of them have little or no knowledge of the programs; emotional problems hinder their participation in them; and regulatory barriers are present "which effectively diminish" their participation.

For labor experts in the field, these findings, of course, are significant as contributions to the public knowledge and understanding of the problems faced by thousands of migrant workers. But more importantly they point up two basic factors.

One is how little progress has been made since the days of Murrow's "Harvest of Shame" when it comes to legislation that really will help bring these workers into the American work force with all of the rights and protections that are now available.

MANY OF THE RIGHTS and protections are taken for granted by most Americans. Social security, Medicare and Medicaid unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation, the right to organize under the protection of the National Labor Relations Act, free public education, protection against pollution and harmful pesticides, decent housing, minimum wages . . . the list is representative of what services have become commonplace for the rest of us.

Persistently, one might say deliberately, the powerful agricultural interests have kept the migrant worker an outcast.

The second factor that has been highlighted is the role that union organization is now playing in brightening the lives of migrant workers. The breakthroughs that have been scored by Cesar Chavez and the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee have demonstrated that the migrant worker need not be an outcast; that he can be organized; that he can exercise power in the market place; that he will be supported by great numbers of people—as in the grape boycott—in his fight for a decent standard of living.

A significant portion of the migratory work force has now been organized in California, but a huge job remains to be done. Federal legislation that will give the agricultural worker the same rights and protections as the industrial worker is urgently needed.

The Nixon Administration is seeking to give the farm worker a toothless right to organize, but without the right to strike when a strike can mean something—during harvest. Under its proposal all the economic power would remain on the side of the employer. Such a right to strike only when it doesn't hurt the employer is an empty right, farm unionists say. They view only free and effective trade unionism as the answer.

THE ODDS FAVOR a national telephone strike this year, unless the industry improves both the size and distribution of its wage offer, Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, center, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were William Eaton, left, of the Chicago Daily News and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times.

Key Vote on Public Service Jobs Bill

The AFL-CIO strongly supported the public service jobs bill passed by the House on June 2. It would provide federal funds to enable cities and states to hire unemployed workers for necessary jobs that otherwise would go unfilled.

The key vote was the 204-182 defeat of an Administration substitute bill that would have scuttled existing manpower programs and replaced them with a limited revenue-sharing plan.

On labor's scoreboard, 198 Democrats and 6 Republicans cast Right votes (R) against the substitute bill; the 159 Republicans and 23 Democrats who voted for the substitute bill were Wrong (W).

Numerals show congressional districts; AL—at large; A—absent.

In Major Contract Talks:

Insurance Workers To Push Union Shop

Miami Beach—Contracts to be negotiated with the nation's largest insurance companies next year must include provisions for a union shop as well as substantial wage increases, the Insurance Workers agreed at the union's 7th biennial convention here.

The 370 IWIU delegates heard Pres. William A. Gillen declare that the union could devote its energies to programs designed to expand bargaining rights "only by overcoming the continuous treadmill imposed by the open shop."

The turnover rate in the non-casualty insurance industry compels the IWIU to replace 25 percent of its 25,000 members each year, Gillen noted.

With the total membership shrinking by 1,000 over the last two years despite 12,000 new applications, Gillen said the union finds itself "constantly engaged in a scramble to maintain the status quo."

He called open shop agreements "self-defeating and no longer tolerable."

The IWIU sessions were devoted almost entirely to preparations for contract negotiations with Metropolitan, Prudential and John Hancock next year.

Saying that "any union's ultimate weapon in collective bargaining is the right to strike," Gillen also encouraged delegates to build the organization and machinery "necessary to deliver that weapon."

The convention followed through by establishing a "strike activity program" including a strike approval mechanism and training for strike leaders.

The delegates rejected, however, a plan to provide strike benefits to members participating in a walkout.

Gillen and Sec.-Treas. Charles G. Heisel were returned to office by acclamation along with four vice presidents of the union. The delegates voted to reduce the number of vice president seats from five to four rather than fill a vacancy caused by a death since the last convention.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany was the chief speaker at the convention, delivering a broadside at the Nixon Administration for economic policies he charged are responsible for high unemployment in the midst of inflation.

Delegates concluded their activities with resolutions calling for reforms in the federal income tax laws to increase personal exemptions and boost the standard deduction, and condemning the Nixon Administration proposal to submerge the Dept. of Labor in a Cabinet reorganization.

Plane Crash Kills Hermann Bremer

Labor joined the diplomatic community in mourning the death of Hermann W. Bremer, labor counselor at the German Embassy, who lost his life in a plane crash June 7 at New Haven, Conn.

Bremer's "tragic loss . . . has brought deep sadness to me and all of his good friends in the AFL-CIO," Federation Pres. George Meany said in a message of sympathy to Mrs. Bremer and their four children. "Our friendship was not only a personal relationship but also was based on a shared understanding of trade unionism and the free labor movement."

Bremer, 53, had been stationed in Washington, D.C., since 1958—first as labor attache, then as labor counselor.

WHITE HOUSE INTERFERENCE in contract negotiations has placed government on the employer side of the bargaining table, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany tells delegates to the Insurance Workers convention in Miami Beach. Union Pres. William A. Gillen is at right.

New Pension Approach Ends New York Strike

New York—Strikes of 8,000 New York City employes were ended when the State, County & Municipal Employes accepted a proposal by the city government to settle a dispute over pensions caused by the refusal of the legislature to approve a negotiated agreement.

District Council 37 of the union accepted a settlement formula offered by the city's Office of Collective Bargaining. Under the formula, the pension plan negotiated last year by the union and the city will be resubmitted to the 1972 session of the state legislature. If it is not approved, the parties will renegotiate the terms, subject to mediation by an OCB panel with authority to make alternate recommendations not exceeding the cost of the 1970 agreement.

The city and the union agreed to the proposal by OCB Chairman Arvid Anderson. Ten local unions in District 37 had stayed out two days to protest the refusal of the Republican legislative leadership to call the pension bill up for hearings.

Walkouts started with SCME members striking city departments one by one—laborers, parks employes, sewage plant workers, incinerator firemen, water supply, highway and sewer workers.

Drawbridge tenders represented by the Teamsters left spans in an open position and walked off in sympathy, but returned on the second day.

District 37 said it was prepared to call more members out if the legislature did not take action on the pension agreement improvements negotiated last year. The legislative leaders recommitted the plan—tantamount to killing it—but agreed to appoint a committee to make recommendations next year.

District 37 said it refrained from expanding the walkout when the city "first began to negotiate seriously."

Delegates voted to end the walkout at a meeting held in a makeshift hall across from District 37 headquarters on Broadway. Three anonymous threats to bomb the headquarters caused the change in locale, SCME said.

Union spokesmen called the dispute settlement "an important victory."

Under the pension plan agreed to last year, city employes aged 55 and up may retire at half pay after 20 years of service, instead of the present 25 years. The plan also includes other improvements.

Illiteracy Rate in U.S Halved over Decade

Illiteracy was cut in half in the United States during the decade ending in 1969, according to a Census Bureau survey, which said that 1 of every 100 persons 14 years and over is illiterate—unable to read or write.

Ten years earlier, the rate was 1 of every 45 persons 14 and over. Between 1959-69, the total number of persons 14 and over who were unable to read or write declined from 2.6 million to 1.4 million even though the number of persons in this age group increased by 21.8 million, the bureau said.

AFL-CIO Hits Move to Ease Export Credit

A closer look at the effects on employment of the exportation of American technology was urged by the AFL-CIO in a statement commenting on proposed amendments to legislation extending the life of the Export-Import Bank.

The bank is a semi-autonomous agency that loans money and guarantees loans involving foreign trade.

In a letter to a House Banking subcommittee, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller stressed that certain types of exports as well as imports can have an adverse effect on American jobs.

When a shoe factory moves its modern machines from New England to Italy to take advantage of lower wage rates, it shows up as a plus in export trade statistics, he noted. But the cost in jobs and payrolls to the United States doesn't show up in the trade statistics.

Therefore, he said, the AFL-CIO is opposed to a provision in a bill before the subcommitte that would remove the present very mild export credit restraints that the Federal Reserve System is empowered to impose.

"Instead of removing all restraints on credits," he urged, "Congress should take a hard look at the effect government-backed exports of technology and machinery are having on our national well-being."

For similar reasons, he said, this is not the time to remove present restraints on trade with the Communist countries of eastern Europe.

"These East Europe nations do not want to trade with us for our finished manufactured goods and consumer products," he noted. The evidence points rather to their desire to acquire America's "production machinery, our know-how, our technology" and to use it to enter "third-nation markets where we now compete."

Labor Board Cases Up 13% To New High

The National Labor Relations Board received more petitions for elections and more unfair practice charges in the first quarter of 1971 than in any other three-month period in its 36-year history, it reported.

The total of new cases filed by unions, workers or employers—9,555—was 13 percent higher than in the same three-month period a year earlier. The previous high record—9,489 cases of all types—was reached in the July-September quarter of 1970.

For the first nine months of the fiscal year, the NLRB's new cases totaled 27,419, nearly 3,000 above the three-quarter mark for fiscal 1970.

The agency's workload has been rising steadily even as its staff has shrunk to 1965 proportions as a result of cuts in its budget, Gen. Counsel Arnold Ordman reported recently.

The increase in January-March filings was due primarily to 5,921 unfair practice charges against employers, unions or both, the agency reported. The total was 16 percent more than in the first quarter of 1970.

In the area of employe elections, the NLRB received 3,634 petitions, up 8 percent from the corresponding quarter of 1970. These included petitions for secret-ballot votes to choose a collective bargaining agent, union shop polls, changes in certification, or clarification of bargaining units.

Pennsylvania Labor Presses Bill To Improve State Aid for Jobless

Philadelphia—An all-out legislative campaign to improve benefits under the Pennsylvania unemployment compensation program was reaffirmed by delegates to the 12th convention of the State AFL-CIO here.

The action gives labor's official endorsement to Gov. Milton J. Shapp's proposal to raise maximum weekly payments for jobless workers to $74 this year and to $85 in 1975. The current maximum payment is $46 a week.

Paul J. Smith, Pennsylvania secretary of labor and industry, urged the 2,000 convention delegates to impress on their state legislative representatives the need to adopt the proposed amendments to the compensation law. Reform of the law would correct many of its inequities, Smith said.

The delegates also called for improvements in the state's workmen's compensation and occupational safety laws. More than 130 resolutions were acted on by the convention, ranging from consumer protection to establishment of a drug rehabilitation program and jobs for returning Viet Nam veterans.

Shapp, a Democrat who was elected last year with the backing of organized labor, told the convention that his administration would work closely with the trade union movement to bring progress in the state.

He announced at the convention the appointment of Michael Johnson, executive vice president and COPE director of the state federation, as the governor's representative to the Philadelphia Blue Cross board of directors.

Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) focused on domestic issues in his address to delegates. He scored Nixon Administration policies that have resulted in high unemployment and a sagging economy.

Jackson said that both the consumer and the business community have lost confidence in the Administration. He termed the deteriorating employment situation, with so many highly skilled workers out of jobs, "a great American tragedy."

Workers should prepare now, he declared, "for a great change in 1972. . . . What we need . . . is the kind of economic leadership that can provide the economic growth that will give us jobs, the revenue and the income to meet the problems of our cities, our school districts, our counties and our states."

National COPE Director Al Barkan summed up the economic problems in citing rising consumer prices, serious unemployment and a growing number of persons slipping into poverty.

Noting that the problems have magnified since Pres. Nixon took office, Barkan said the one place "to change this sorry picture" is at the ballot box.

"Whether you like it or not," he stressed, "the real vital, important decisions that affect you as a citizen, as a parent, as a worker, as a trade unionist, as a consumer . . . are made in Washington."

Barkan stressed the importance of voter registration programs and the need for continuing education of union members on candidates and issues that are vital to labor's goals.

Pres. Harry Boyer of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO agreed. He told the delegates that "we must strengthen the fiber of our democratic process by more active participation in registering and voting. . . . We must be ever alert to those who would destroy the trade union movement in this country."

Other speakers at the three-day convention included Robert P. Kane, Pennsylvania secretary of revenue; Jeffery Cohelan, executive director of the Group Health Association of America; Paul Ornburn of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., and Ben Stahl, regional director of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Institute.

$2-Billion Program:

Public Works Bill Approved by Senate

During a House-Senate conference committee meeting to work out the final form of the legislation, House participants warned that the substitution of any language not previously passed by either body would be out of order under rules the House adopted last year.

The effect was to preclude any major change in the accelerated public works section. It would have to be either accepted as it stood or rejected outright.

To most observers, the Republican effort to reject the conference report as a protest against the House rules appeared a smokescreen for the real goal—to defeat the plan and thus save Pres. Nixon from the hard choice of whether to veto a clearly popular program that the Administration opposes.

The President is likely to face that decision within a week, since final House approval of the conference report appears certain.

There was no partisan controversy over the other two sections of the omnibus bill.

One would extend for four years the Appalachian Regional Development Act—a program of highway building, health education and public facilities assistance that has helped break the economic isolation of the 14-state mountain region.

The other would extend for two years a companion program of multi-state regional commissions in other areas facing common problems.

To veto the accelerated public works program that the Administration opposes, the President would have to veto at the same time the regional development programs that enjoy strong bipartisan support.

Action on the public works conference report came during an interlude in the prolonged debate over extension of the draft bill and consideration of a broad assortment of amendments.

One major action taken by the Senate—over Administration opposition—was 51-27 approval of an amendment substantially raising the pay of the lower ranks of the armed forces.

The $2.7 billion pay raise would bring a 50 percent hike to servicemen in the five lowest enlisted grades and a 25 percent raise to the two lowest ranks of officers. The amount was recommended by a presidential commission as necessary to the goal of a voluntary army, but it is $1 billion more than the Administration had sought.

The House earlier adopted a similar total increase, but a large share of it would go to senior officers and non-coms.

In other votes on amendments to the draft extension bill, the Senate rejected, 49-43, a proposal to limit the draft extension to one year, and refused to allow conscientious objector status to persons objecting only to a particular war rather than to all wars.

With some die-hard opponents of the draft threatening a filibuster beyond the June 30 expiration of the present draft law, Senate Democratic and Republican leaders served notice that they will seek a cloture vote in late June if agreement on a final passage vote is not reached.

A June 16 vote is scheduled on the amendment sponsored by Senators George McGovern (D-S.D.) and Mark O. Hatfield (R-Ore.) to require that all American troops be withdrawn from Indochina by the end of this year.

City Re-Enacts Ban On Strikebreakers

Alton, Ill.—The Alton city council unanimously passed a new anti-strikebreaker ordinace that city officials believe will meet any test of constitutionality.

The bill was drafted with the help of the Alton labor organizations after a previously-passed law was declared unconstitutional by a federal district judge in Springfield.

The new law stresses that it is designed to "promote the public welfare, peace and safety of the people" by prohibiting the use of professional strikebreakers in place of employes involved in a strike or lockout.

The law sets fines of $100 to $500 a day each day an employer is in violation.

It defines a professional strikebreaker as a person who has accepted employment in a struck plant on two or more occasions within three years prior to the filing of charges under the city law.

Nixon Revenue Plan Scored as Wasteful

48 percent of the general revenue-sharing funds would trickle down to local governments. And there would be "no strings" to determine whether funds should go to "a wealthy tax-haven community carved to zone out the poor or to a poverty-riddled city."

Biemiller urged as far preferable the full funding of existing federal programs to aid cities and states—a closing of the growing gap between the amount Congress has authorized for these programs and the amount Congress actually appropriated.

Furthermore, he stressed, the Administration's refusal to spend billions of dollars already appropriated by Congress does not square with its professions of concern for the financial plight of state and local governments.

As examples, he cited, "The President has withheld $942 million for low-rent public housing and $583 million in model cities funds. Thus, the Administration is sitting on billions of dollars of aid that could be dispensed immediately."

Much more practical forms of revenue-sharing, Biemiller told the committee, would be federal grants to enable cities and states to hire unemployed workers, federal assumption of public welfare costs, and a federal program of National Health Security which as a by-product would relieve state and local governments of at least $3 billion spent for health services.

Federal grant programs can and should be simplified and in some cases consolidated, Biemiller testified. But he cautioned that revenue-sharing without strings "violates a major principle of good government—that the authority to collect taxes should not be separated from the authority to determine how these revenues shall be spent."

MOBILE MEDICAL AND EDUCATION equipment bound for Tunisia is described by Irving Brown, executive director of the African-American Labor Center, on a New York City dock. The equipment is a gift from the AALC to the General Federation of Tunisian Workers. Present for the loading ceremony were Ambassador Rachid Driss of Tunisia, second from right, and officials of the New York City Central Labor Council and the Longshoremen.

Unions Win 92% Of Federal Votes

Three of every four federal employes who cast a ballot in representation elections in 1970 voted for a union, the Labor Dept. reported.

Assistant Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., said unions won 572, or 92 percent, of the 624 elections supervised by the Labor-Management Services Administration. The average percentage of valid votes cast in favor of unions was 77.

LMSA said that of 141,895 federal employes eligible to vote, 87,191 or 61 percent, cast ballots. The percentage of employes voting varied from 72 in units of less than 100 employes to 55 percent in units of 500 to 999 employes.

Labor Backs Strict Limit on Mine Radiation

The AFL-CIO has added its strong endorsement to proposed federal guidelines improving protection against lung cancer for uranium miners exposed to radon "daughters" gas.

The recommendation to limit the annual exposure level to 4 Working Level Months (WLM) was issued by Administrator William D. Ruckelshaus of the Environmental Protection Agency, effective July 1.

Current federal guidance on the inhalation of radioactive contaminants is 12 WLM.

Abnormally high incidence of lung cancer fatalities among uranium miners has been attributed to the inhalation of radon daughters, Ruckelshaus said. Radon daughters is a radioactive gas given off in the transmutation of uranium into lead during mining operations.

In a letter to Ruckelshaus, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller noted that organized labor has been long concerned with "this deadly hazard."

"On the basis of our many years of analysis, we believe that your decision is both technically and economically sound and in the interest of protecting the health and lives of workers," said Biemiller, who also heads the federation's Staff Committee on Atomic Energy & Natural Resources.

The environmental agency's authority on uranium mine radiation protection standards is limited to providing guidelines to other federal agencies. Enforcement of radiation standards is up to the Interior Dept.'s Bureau of Mines and, in part, the Labor Dept., the EPA said.

Off-Broadway Actors Win Boost in Pay Floor

New York—An arbitrator has awarded off-Broadway actors represented by Actors' Equity a $100 minimum weekly salary in the first year of a three-year contract.

The minimum applies to productions grossing up to $5,500 and is scaled up to $175 weekly for actors in shows that gross more than $11,000. In the third year, salaries will rise to a minimum of $125, scaled up to $200.

The new contract, with the League of Off-Broadway Theaters, also calls for improvements in pension contributions, work rules, safety and sanitary conditions and sick leave.

Wage provisions of the contract are retroactive to Dec. 17, the first day of work after a 31-day strike by the 200 actors and stage managers which darkened off-Broadway theaters.

Before New York attorney Robert Feinberg handed down the arbitration award, the weekly minimum for off-Broadway actors had been $75. Management of the theaters had offered a minimum of $90 a week rising to $100 in three years.

The agreement to go to arbitration ended the strike just in time for a Christmas week reopening of the theaters, all of which have fewer than 300 seats.

"It is a fair and equitable resolution of the situation," said Executive Sec. Angus Duncan of Actors' Equity. "Salaries have been increased to an acceptable minimal level because it raised the minimum by 66⅔ percent over the term of the contract.

"Working conditions have been bettered, such as payment to understudies, and it is a significant gain that pension contributions now begin from the first day of rehearsal instead of from the first day of performance."

Previously, the union won a major gain in the field of video cassettes used to broadcast show selections. The league agreed to negotiate the actors' share of income from the cassettes for each show.

Pilots Open Job Gates For Returning Prisoners

U.S. pilots now held as prisoners of war or missing in action in Southeast Asia may look forward to immediate airline pilot careers when they return, thanks to a program worked out by the Air Line Pilots and Eastern Air Lines.

All rated military pilots who can can meet the physical and training requirements within a year after they return will qualify for employment. Eastern will provide the necessary training.

But more important, all will have a seniority date of May 30, 1971, in a profession in which seniority plays a major role in employment and advancement.

Of the more than 1,500 Americans carried in the missing status, or known to be in enemy prison camps, several hundred are believed to be eligible candidates, the ALPA said. It noted, too, that Eastern is one of the few airlines that has not furloughed pilots in the current traffic slump and expects to reopen hiring later this year.

Details of the program were worked out by an ALPA member, First Officer Charles Dyer and Frank C. Borman, the former astronaut and Air Force colonel, who is Eastern's vice president for operations.

Dyer, who also is a naval reserve pilot from Boston, has three friends currently believed held in North Vietnamese prison camps.

Capt. J. J. O'Donnell, president of the 31,000-member Air Line Pilots, called the program "a small but important reward for all prisoners of war and those now in missing status who may choose to take up the option within a year following their return to American control."

$2 Billion in Public Works Sent to Nixon by Congress

AGE IS NO BARRIER for those attending the convention of the National Council of Senior Citizens as five-year-old Scott Pryor twiddles his ear at his father, Rep. David Pryor (D-Ark.). At left are NCSC Vice Pres. Matt DeMore, former secretary-treasurer of the Machinists, and Mrs. Bessie Gottlieb, president emeritus of the NCSC. Pryor received an award of merit from the council for his service to disabled elderly in nursing homes. (Story, Page 10.)

Job-Creating Plan Faces Veto Threat

By David L. Perlman

The House sent a $2 billion accelerated public works program to Pres. Nixon's desk with a strong bipartisan endorsement despite a stern warning by Republican leaders that it would be vetoed.

It would enable cities and states to build the public facilities they need but can't afford—and in the process to create jobs and buying power to help pull the nation out of recession.

The legislation was high on labor's priority list and the House vote on approval of the final version of the bill was an impressive 275-104.

It had strong support from the Democratic leadership—and 95 percent of House Democrats present voted for the legislation. So did 40 percent of House Republicans, even though their leaders made an all-out effort to defeat the accelerated public works provisions of the bill.

The ranking Republican on the House Public Works Committee, Rep. William H. Harsha of Ohio, told the House bluntly that the Nixon Administration is adamantly opposed to the legislation.

He and other Republicans on the committee had met with White House aides when the bill was being considered in committee to see if some version acceptable to the President could be worked out.

"We were told in no uncertain terms," Harsha reported, that the public works jobs program was "totally and wholly unacceptable to the Administration."

Later, he said, committee Republicans suggested several possible compromises—only to be told firmly that "none of these sugges-

Negroes Join Labor's Bid On Pay Floor

America's working poor need a $2-an-hour minimum wage this year, not two or three years from now, 45 prominent black leaders told Congress.

Their statement was presented to a Senate Labor subcommittee by Clarence Mitchell, Washington director of the NAACP and legislative chairman of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights.

It backed up labor's position on minimum wage legislation on every major point, urging expansion of coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act to millions of workers now excluded.

The signers included top officials of the leading civil rights organizations, clergymen, public officials, university professors, publishers and editors of Negro newspapers and business leaders as well as trade union officials.

They noted that most persons

Teachers Fight Jersey Court's Harsh Penalty

Newark, N.J. — The Newark Teachers Union is waging a last-ditch legal battle in the State Superior Court here against execution of what has been called the harshest legal penalty against striking union members since the Danbury Hatters case early in the century.

For the fourth week in a row, union lawyers have asked Judge Samuel Alcorn to reconsider the fines and jail sentences he levied on union officers, 180 strikers and all dues-paying members of Teachers Local 481. Final arguments on the union's request were made June 11.

The jurist, who jailed the union president and two vice presi-

Meany Cites Nixon Pledge:

Labor Hits Scuttling Of 50% Cargo Rule

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and leaders of the federation's maritime unions called on Pres. Nixon to reconsider his suspension of an executive order requiring that at least half of U.S. grain shipments to Communist nations be carried in American vessels.

Meany wrote Nixon that abandonment of the 50-50 policy is "contrary" to the policy position he took during the 1968 presidential campaign.

A "position paper" issued by Nixon at that time termed it "essential" to increase the share of U.S. export trade carried in American-flag ships.

AFL-CIO maritime unions continue to support that policy and have reactivated their Save Our Ships Committee to deal with the problems caused by suspension of the executive order, Meany told the President.

The directive to use U.S. vessels for at least half the grain shipments was issued by Pres. Kennedy in 1963, when the government approved a large-scale sale of wheat to the Soviet Union. It was reaffirmed during the Johnson Administration after a dispute over evasion of the cargo preference order by grain dealers.

Meany stressed in his letter that the economic plight of the U.S. merchant marine is even worse today. Shipments in American-flag ships, he said, have shrunk to less than 5 percent of the nation's total export-import trade.

"This decline is reflected in rapidly increasing unemployment among American seamen and other workers in the industrial complex required to support a healthy merchant marine," Meany said.

Unions representing these workers "most earnestly protest" the abandonment of the cargo preference policy.

Members of the Save Our Ships Committee are Presidents Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen,

Phone Workers Gird For Nationwide Strike

Kansas City, Mo.—A nationwide strike for Communications Workers employed by the Bell System was set for 6 a.m., July 14, by CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne with a roar of endorsement by 3,000 delegates to the union's 33rd annual convention.

The strike was authorized by Bell System employes by a secret ballot vote of 205,431 out of 287,440 after Beirne and the union's executive board had reported to them that the company's final offer fell far short of the members' needs.

Beirne said CWA members would set up picket lines July 14 unless the Bell System comes up with a satisfactory settlement proposal in current talks. Contracts with 24 Bell companies have expired in the last two months and 11 more will run out by late July.

Management has proposed an increase in basic wages of 11 percent for the first year and "this we cannot and we will not accept," Beirne said. CWA contends a 25 percent increase for the first year is justified.

Meany Scores Assault On Individual Privacy

The right to privacy both on and off the job is "preeminent" among the rights of man and "essential to a humane conception of the individual's relations with his fellow men," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared at the conclusion of a People's Forum on "The Privacy Battleground."

The forum was sponsored jointly by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. and the Transportation Institute, a management-supported, nonprofit research and education organization dealing with transportation problems.

Paul Hall, president of the Seafarers and the MTD and an AFL-CIO vice president, said the forum was the first of many which will be dedicated to the presentation of "controversial issues not generally discussed on a non-partisan basis."

Meany's was the final presentation to the several hundred participants who had heard speakers ranging from the executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union to representatives of police information-gathering agencies and credit organizations.

The AFL-CIO president cited labor's long concern for protecting the right to privacy as a prerequisite to individual freedom.

"For organized labor's mission," said Meany, "is to insure that working men and women are treated in

WHITE HOUSE PRESSURE to hold down wage increases of the Steelworkers is aimed at all workers—everybody who depends on a wage or salary for a living, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland declared at the Office & Professional Employes convention in Miami Beach.

Free Workers Win Agenda Battle At Start of ILO World Conference

Geneva—Non-Communist workers scored a major success at the outset of the International Labor Organization's annual conference here by obtaining an immediate hearing for their call for a reinforcement of the United Nations agency's democratic structure.

The conference's resolutions committee made the proposal, seconded by employers from non-Communist countries, the number one item on its agenda.

At the start of its deliberations the committee voted to decide which five of the score of resolutions submitted to the conference would be given priority.

The highest number of votes went to the free workers' call for a strengthening throughout the ILO's activities of the "tripartism" principle on which Samuel Gompers and other farsighted trade unionists helped found the organization.

This principle provides for the participation with complete autonomy of trade unions and employer organizations alongside representatives of member governments in the work of the 121-nation ILO.

When urging priority for the tripartism resolution, Director Bert Seidman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security stressed that respect of the cornerstone principle in all circumstances is "vital to ILO survival."

The committee's decision was a setback for the Communist countries and their supporters who had complained bitterly that the autonomy of the worker and employer groups in the ILO results in the "exclusion" of their so-called trade unionists and employers.

The setback was particularly galling because all five resolutions to which the committee gave priority were presented by free workers.

The Communist and Arab delegates fought desperately to assure a hearing for a propaganda resolution attacking Israel for alleged violations of human and trade union rights, but the committee relegated it to the also-rans.

Other members of the AFL-CIO team headed by U.S. Worker Delegate Rudolph Faupl were also taking up their committee assignments at the three-week session of more than 1,200 labor, employer and government representatives.

Elected by the worker delegates to serve on their executive board and to represent them on the conference's key steering committee, Faupl was sitting also on the committee reviewing the ILO structure.

This is the body in which workers and employers have been successfully repulsing demands of the Communist countries for a reshaping of the ILO to suit their purposes.

Pres. S. Frank Raftery of the Painters and Pres. Thomas F. Murphy of the Bricklayers, are working on the committee that is drafting new international standards to protect against the health dangers of benzine.

Proposed standards to protect elected union representatives against discrimination by management are being prepared by a committee on which Vice Pres. Charles F. West of the Machinists is serving.

Pres. Miles Stanley of the West Virginia AFL-CIO is expounding American labor's views on a committee laying down guidelines for an ILO program to promote employment.

Edward J. Hickey, Jr., counsel for a number of AFL-CIO unions, is again working with the committee that has the difficult assignment of preparing a report for the conference on how governments abide by their ILO commitments.

The conference's general debate was also getting started with its employer president, Pierre Waline of France, not hesitating to gavel down Communist and Arab speakers when they sought to engage in propaganda tirades against the U.S. or Israel.

Charles D. Stewart, a Deputy Assistant Secretary of Labor, rose to protest against the attempts to use the ILO as a political forum. Nevertheless, he praised the conference president for having "handled this matter very well."

In Convention Action:

Office Union Backs 4-Day Workweek

Miami Beach—Increasing unemployment due to advancing technology, and rising discontent among white collar workers with their job conditions, will inspire the four-day workweek and trigger militant unionism among professionals, Howard Coughlin of the Office & Professional Employes predicted.

Calling the four-day week "inevitable because the alternatives are too grim," Coughlin said that without it "we will never win the battle against unemployment."

He made the remarks in setting the tone for the triennial convention of the OPEIU. The union called for a four-day week, embodying an eight-hour day, established in a six-day basic workweek with every worker receiving three consecutive days off.

Coughlin said the proposal would create additional jobs and add an additional business day to many industries now closed on Saturday. Both conditions would add "billions of dollars to the economies of the U.S. and Canada," he said.

Representing white collar workers in a wide range of jobs in industry, finance and government, the OPEIU is also mindful that the clerical and professional employe of the 1970s is becoming increasingly impatient and easily dissatisfied with his working conditions, Coughlin said.

In official actions, the delegates put particular stress on the problems of working women. About 70 percent of the union's 80,000 members are women and more than half the convention delegates were women.

They adopted a resolution urging the OPEIU's 300 affiliated locals to "cooperate and assist groups and organizations whose objectives are the achievement of full equality for all women." They also endorsed a program to train women for leadership positions within the labor movement.

Other resolutions attacked the lack of day-care facilities for the more than one-third of working women with children under 18 years of age and called on labor and industry to establish jointly-administered day-care centers.

The convention also noted the sharp increases in the number of violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act reported by the Labor Dept., particularly against women and older workers.

The convention called for equal participation of women in the work force, saying that organization of women workers will help end sex discrimination. A study made by OPEIU showed that "when female office employes unionize, pay disparities between the sexes vanish almost overnight."

In other action, the union reported breakthroughs in organizing bank workers and growth in demand for clerical skills despite the general business downturn.

Coughlin was elected to his eighth term as president of the union. J. Howard Hicks, OPEIU secretary-treasurer since the union was formed in 1945, was also re-elected.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the delegates that the Administration's attempt to hold down wage increases in the forthcoming steel negotiations is aimed at them as well as the Steelworkers.

"It is aimed at all workers," Kirkland said, at "taxi drivers, miners, school teachers, office workers—everybody who depends on a wage or salary for a living."

Kirkland, one of the major speakers at the convention, sharply challenged the contention of the President's economic advisers that it would be bad for the country if steel management agreed to a wage increase equal to that already negotiated by the union in the can industry.

"Bad for whom?" he asked. "Is the country nothing but banks? Nothing but stockholders? Nothing but money manipulators? Doesn't it include workers and their wives and children?"

As far as the Nixon Administration is concerned, Kirkland noted, "apparently not."

But, he said, "I don't believe Mr. Nixon's efforts to disguise the effects of his policies behind cheerful reassurances and optimistic press releases are going to sweeten the political climate in 1972.

"Samuel Gompers often pointed out that labor's basic approach to politics is very simple: 'We reward our friends, and punish our enemies.'

"You can't put it any simpler. And the formula is the same today as it was then."

Arkansas Labor Pledges Support For National Health Security Bill

Hot Springs, Ark.—Delegates to the eighth biennial Arkansas State AFL-CIO convention overwhelmingly endorsed the National Health Security bill, armed with the pledge that "we're going to get a dollar's worth of health care for each dollar we spend."

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller told the 300 delegates that the labor-supported Health Security program would provide quality health care for all Americans while controlling the soaring costs.

Biemiller said Health Security is the only national health insurance program that meets the twin goals of cost control and quality care.

The convention also adopted resolutions calling on the state legislature to boost the Arkansas minimum wage to $1.60 an hour, to upgrade the workmen's compensation law in line with federal standards, to establish no-fault auto insurance, and to make the state's property tax law more equitable.

Delegates re-elected the state federation's top officers—Pres. J. Bill Becker and Sec.-Treas. E. J. Jacobs—to their fourth consecutive two-year terms.

Becker reported that the state central body increased its membership affiliation 5,000 in the past two years, a gain of more than 10 percent.

He also reviewed successful legislative campaigns that made Arkansas the first state to meet federal standards in unemployment compensation and defeated an attempt to repeal the state law on full crews for railroad trains.

Becker set the number one goal of the state body in the next session of the legislature: the repeal of the Arkansas open shop law. He also called for an intensive voter registration campaign, geared primarily to enrolling the new 18-to-21 age group citizens. He urged a healthy alliance with young voters in an effort to achieve "labor's objectives and a quality life for all."

Biemiller warned that opponents of the Health Security program are unleashing a "big scare" barrage:

"They call National Health Security 'womb to tomb' health care. They try to make National Health Security sound evil and bad and un-American.

"We are not going to be frightened away," he stressed. "They say their proposals cost less in terms of federal dollars, but what they don't tell you is that their health plans are going to do much less."

Health care costs money no matter if it comes directly from the worker's pocket or from tax dollars, Biemiller noted, adding, "when we put our money together into a national system like National Health Security . . . we can begin to control costs. We'll have the financial leverage to reform the health care delivery system."

"The difference between the Nixon program and National Health Security is that our costs are out in the open," he said, while "the Nixon plan hides its true costs."

Biemiller called on union members in Arkansas to make their delegation in Congress aware of the need for Health Security.

Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers stressed the need for a unified labor movement in approaching the 1972 national elections for Congress and President.

Keenan warned delegates that the existing Taft-Hartley law is a "time bomb" that could cause additional harm to unions under an unfriendly Administration and Congress.

Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, called on labor to work more closely with the civil rights movement to produce benefits for all through cooperative action.

Other speakers included Gov. Dale Bumpers, Rep. Bill Alexander (D-Ark.) and Sec.-Treas. Roy R. Evans of the Texas State AFL-CIO.

State-County Chosen By Virginia School Unit

Non-professional school employes in Arlington County, Va., voted for the State, County & Municipal Employes in a representation election. The vote was SCME 301, no union 40 in a unit of 394 employes.

The victory was SCME's third in suburbs of Washington, D.C. The union recently signed agreements providing improved benefits for 400 city employes in Alexandria, Va., and 2,100 blue collar workers in Fairfax County, Va.

dents on contempt charges in February, also fined the union $270,000 and ordered nearly 200 other unionists to start serving jail sentences in July.

The court directed the Board of Education to attach all dues income, all welfare fund payments and other union income, all to be deposited in a special court fund.

In addition, the board was ordered to deduct 10 percent of the gross salary of all union members from pay checks to be set off against the $270,000 fine imposed on the local.

Union lawyers have argued that it is unprecedented for a court to attach the salaries of union members to pay fines growing out of strike action.

Federal labor law explicitly forbids the collection of judgments from members—only the union may be held liable.

Teachers are public employes and as such are not covered by the protections offered by the federal labor laws.

The federal law was passed many years after the boycott by the United Hatters in Danbury, Conn., against D. E. Loewe and Co. was held to be in restraint of trade under the provisions of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act.

The court ruled that individual union members were responsible for the union's actions. Members were assessed costs and damages totaling $252,000—the first application of the treble damage provision of the Sherman Act to a union.

In the Danbury case, the court ruled that member's homes and other property could be attached to pay the fine. In Newark, the court order applies to salaries and union income.

The Newark Teachers charged that if the ruling by Judge Alcorn is allowed to stand, it could seriously hamper the organizing efforts of public employe unions. It reported that a number of public bodies already have made wide distribution of news stories about the fines and wage attachments to slow down organizing drives.

Newark teachers voted last Jan. 31 to walk out for the fourth time in six years in protest against the school board's emphatic refusal to discuss any contract issues except wages and fringe benefits. They stayed out for 10 weeks despite arrests by police and harassment by militant groups. A compromise pact ended the strike but the fines and other penalties were kept in force by the court.

AFT Pres. David Selden said the national union will support the Newark local "all the way to the Supreme Court, if necessary."

Mrs. Carole Graves, Local 481 president, said "we would just have to close our doors" if the sentences are upheld. Also involved is another $40,000 in fines and jail sentences imposed in an earlier strike. Collection of the two money penalties "would completely wipe us out," she said.

2 Hawaiians Fill State-County Posts

Two officials of Hawaii unions have been elected to high office in the State, County & Municipal Employes. The SCME executive board named David J. Trask, Jr., executive director of the Hawaii Government Employes Association—SCME Local 152—as a vice president. Henry Epstein of the United Public Workers—SCME Local 646—was named to the union's judicial panel.

The two Hawaii unions, formerly independent, affiliated with the SCME earlier this year.

Trask will serve on the 20-member board which sets policy for the union. Epstein fills a vacancy on the nine-member judicial panel which resolves inter-union conflicts, SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf said.

Joseph Curran of the National Maritime Union, Paul Hall of the Seafarers, Jesse M. Calhoon of the Marine Engineers, W. R. Steinberg of the American Radio Association, I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers and Thomas F. O'Callaghan of the Masters, Mates & Pilots.

Meany spelled out the AFL-CIO position on the grain trade in a 2,000-word statement in 1965, and the committee reaffirmed that position in calling on Nixon to reinstate the executive order.

The federation statement noted that commercial wheat exporters receive a large export subsidy because federal supports raise the price of wheat above the world market. This subsidy is substantially higher than the extra cost involved in using U.S. ships for half the cargo.

Abandoning the 50-50 requirement may line the pockets of grain dealers, but the cost will be further destruction of American jobs and an undercutting of efforts to revive the U.S. merchant marine.

Nixon's 1968 campaign statement set a goal of raising the share of U.S. trade carried by American bottoms to over 30 percent by the mid-1970s, six times its present level.

It noted that most other major nations carry the largest share of their cargoes in their own ships.

"The governments and the people of these nations have determined that a high degree of reliance on their own shipping resources is important to their own self-interest," Nixon said at the time.

The United States should do the same, he urged.

Meany told the President that AFL-CIO maritime unions share his 1968 views—and oppose his abandonment of a policy designed to keep the American flag on the seas.

Labor Dept. Loses Test On Scope of L-G Power

The Supreme Court ruled that the Secretary of Labor has no right to initiate action against union election procedures unless a specific complaint has first been filed by an aggrieved member with his union.

The court, in a 7-2 opinion, upheld a lower court finding that the Secretary of Labor exceeded his authority under the Landrum-Griffin Act when he challenged an attendance requirement in the constitution of the Steelworkers.

The requirement is that a candidate for union office must have attended at least half the meetings of his local over a three-year period preceding the election.

The dispute started when Nicholas Hantzis ran for president of USWA Local 6799 in Pomona, Calif., and lost. He protested to the union that its facilities had been used to promote the candidacy of the incumbent president.

When the union gave him no satisfaction, he complained to the Secretary of Labor, repeating the charge about union facilities, but also raising for the first time an objection about the meeting-attendance requirement.

The Labor Dept. filed a civil suit against the union, and the U.S. District Court at Los Angeles ordered a new election on the ground that the use of union facilities aided the incumbent president's candidacy and violated the law. That part of the case was not challenged before the Supreme Court. But the District Court turned down the complaint about the attendance rule. It found the rule reasonable, and the Court of Appeals at San Francisco upheld its ruling.

The Supreme Court, in an opinion written by Justice Thurgood Marshall, said Congress intended to encourage unions to take action themselves to correct election processes. If the Labor Dept. could file suit against practices the union had not been given a chance to correct, union self-government "would be needlessly" weakened, the decision said. Justices William J. Brennan and Byron R. White dissented.

The court majority said it was unclear from Hantzis's complaint whether he objected to the attendance rule itself, or to the way in which the rule was applied during the election.

In another decision, the court held in an Idaho case that a worker cannot sue in a state court seeking damages from a union for causing him to be fired for non-payment of dues under a union-shop contract. Justice John M. Harlan, writing for the majority in a 5-4 decision, said that the issue is one to be settled by the National Labor Relations Board and the federal courts, not a state court.

The Idaho Supreme Court had ruled that Wilson P. Lockridge, former Western Greyhound bus driver, was entitled to damages for lost wages and ordered the Amalgamated Transit Union to pay him $32,678 and restore him to the membership he lost in 1959. Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and White joined in a dissenting opinion. Justices William O. Douglas and Harry Blackmun dissented separately.

Loan Guarantee Backed To Save Lockheed Jobs

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to approve a $250-million emergency loan guarantee to keep the beleaguered Lockheed Aircraft Corp. from bankruptcy and save the jobs of thousands of American workers.

Federation Pres. George Meany in a statement to the Senate Banking Committee, said the AFL-CIO has studied all the arguments against the measure—the Emergency Loan Guarantee Act of 1971—and has concluded "that its enactment is essential to the welfare of America's workers and is therefore in the national interest."

Meany warned that the collapse of Lockheed "would result in vastly increased costs to the taxpayers" through higher welfare costs and loss of corporate and personal income tax revenue.

Federal help for distressed businesses "is an established practice," he noted, dating back to the creation of the Reconstruction Finance Corp. 40 years ago.

He said the proposed loan guarantee would strengthen free enterprise, rather than weaken it as critics have charged. "Competition among as many producers as possible is the life blood of the free enterprise system. If Lockheed goes under, competition in aerospace will be reduced and the free enterprise system as a whole will suffer."

As for the argument that overall employment would not suffer because other firms would be available to build the giant aircraft—and might use American-built rather than British Rolls Royce engines—Meany said: "We wish this were true."

In fact, he noted, nearly one-third of the orders for the plane originate overseas and the decision to use the Rolls Royce engine was based in part on an understanding that "substantial" sales in Britain would result.

Therefore, he said, all evidence indicates that killing the plane at this point will mean fewer jobs for American workers, not more jobs.

Machinists Pres. Floyd E. Smith, whose union represents most Lockheed workers, told the Senate committee that a collapse of Lockheed would destroy 30,000 jobs and unemployment spreading to subcontractors would threaten an additional 90,000 jobs.

Refusal by Congress to continue development of the SST dealt a damaging blow to the aerospace industry and its workers, Smith said. "A followup refusal to help Lockheed would compound the injury."

Glass Union Wins Plastic Bottle Unit

Centralia, Ill.—The Glass Bottle Blowers were chosen by employes of the Wheaton Plastics plant in a representation election conducted by the National Labor Relations Board. The vote was 100 for GBBA, 33 for no union and 5 for the Teamsters.

The glass union originally organized the plant a year ago but lost the initial election after a strong anti-labor campaign by the company, GBBA Pres. Newton W. Black said. The plant is a big producer of plastic bottles.

43 Complete Training Plan In Cleveland

Cleveland—The first 43 black apprentices have completed four years of training under the guidance of Cleveland's Joint Apprentice Program to become journeymen in the building and construction trades.

The graduates of the program, sponsored by the A. Philip Randolph Institute and the Workers Defense League, have entered eight different trade unions. The Iron Workers have 13, Carpenters eight, Bricklayers and Painters five each, Cement Masons and Electricians four each, Sheet Metal Workers three, and the Lathers one.

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director Donald Slaiman, addressing the graduates at a banquet, said the federation is proud of the progress made in the program.

This was a welcome return to Cleveland, Slaiman said, from a confrontation in 1963 when there were only six black apprentices among the city's thousands of building trades members.

More than 160 young men from minority groups were participating in the city's Joint Apprenticeship Program in February 1971, Slaiman noted.

Administrator Hugh C. Murphy of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training also complimented the efforts of the program sponsors. He pointed out that more than 300 minority group members have been placed in the Cleveland building trades either as apprentices or upgraded as journeymen.

SCHOLARSHIPS are awarded to 300 New York City public school graduates through a program negotiated by Local 2 of the American Federation of Teachers. Recipients of the $4,000, four-year scholarships are children of low-income parents. The AFT members had foregone benefits for themselves so funds could be made available to finance the scholarships. In the lower photo, Pres. Albert Shanker of AFT Local 2, congratulates one of the graduates. The 300 winners were selected from more than 1,000 applicants.

Beirne Sets Deadline:

CWA Membership Authorizes Strike

"We could talk for hours pinpointing the inequities," Beirne declared. "We know that our wage inequities cry out for correction . . . We are a special breed of workers with special skills who have subsidized through our low wages the industry and, yes, the public, for too long."

Among other areas unresolved in the contract negotiations are the cost-of-living adjustment in the second and third years, wage differentials for work in dangerous areas, pensions, union security and full-time wages for local union presidents and shop stewards.

Contract negotiations aimed at achieving a pattern for the union are taking place with the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. and Western Electric, the manufacturing arm of the Bell System.

The stage for the convention action was set last month when in a televised "membership meeting of the air," Beirne reported on negotiations and the union's executive board voted to ask Bell System members for a strike authorization.

More than 74 percent of the ballots sent out were returned and the strike was authorized by more than 71 percent of those voting, the CWA reported.

As the result of the balloting was announced, it touched off a 30-minute demonstration with delegates marching around the convention hall and across the stage waving banners, singing and cheering.

The convention also re-elected officers, naming Louis B. Knecht executive vice president to replace James Massey who is retiring.

Rudy Mendoza of Santa Barbara, Calif., and Ray Stevens of Chicago, were elected to replace J. Curtis Fletcher, independent telephone director, and Vice Pres. Arthur B. LeFevre, who are also retiring.

A foreign policy statement adopted by the convention charged that "continued growth of Soviet power and political influence pose a serious threat to world peace" and declared the North Vietnamese, supported by Moscow and Peking, have sought at the Paris negotiations to take over South Vietnam through imposition of unacceptable terms for U.S. abandonment of Southeast Asia.

The statement also urged the United States to supply the "necessary financial support and military supplies" to help Israel survive as an independent nation.

In the domestic area, a statement on economic policy adopted by the delegates declared:

"More than ever before, the national economy needs an administration that will undertake the necessary policies to check its downward movement, assure that all Americans are gainfully employed and inflation is brought under control.

"The Administration should establish long-range and consistent goals for optimum growth and sustained employment.

"The goals should give attention to the priorities of our domestic needs and should include a time schedule for the complete elimination of U.S. poverty."

Actors Reach Pact to Spur Minority Jobs

New York—Actors' Equity and the League of New York Theatres have reached agreement on a plan to further the employment of ethnic minorities in Broadway plays.

During talks on other aspects of a new Broadway contract, management agreed that a script and other "pertinent material" will be submitted to an advisory committee before being given to agents or principals of a planned production.

The committee of three Equity members representing the interests of ethnic minorities will read the script, discuss it and then give management an advisory list of those roles in which minority group members could be cast.

Script delivery and committee recommendations both will be confidential, and suggestions for casting will be advisory and not mandatory. Submission of the script will be subject to the approval of the director of the play or the dramatist involved.

Negotiations on the new contract began May 21 and are still in process. The Equity negotiating team is headed by union Executive Sec. Angus Duncan. Bernard Jacobs is serving as spokesman for the league and Alan Jaffe is counsel.

Glass Workers Focus on Fall Contract Talks

Miami Beach—Contract negotiations with the glass container industry beginning in early September held the attention of 370 delegates to the 88th convention of the Flint Glass Workers as the union opened two weeks of sessions here.

AFGW Pres. George M. Parker reported that members employed in the production of glass tableware, scientific and electrical glass products now average $142.21 a week.

He said the emphasis in negotiations next fall will be on increased wages and improved pensions, health and welfare benefits.

During its first week of meetings, the AFGW attacked low-wage imports which have erased American jobs in the glass industry and have led to the closing of the Morgantown Glassware Guild, whose tableware once graced the White House dining room.

Parker also warned that "a growing threat to our members . . . has been the thrust of well-meaning ecology enthusiasts." He said that while "all of us want to maintain and improve the beauty of our land, the answer is not an unreasonable attack on the disposable bottle."

The AFGW president also noted that under the "guise of non-discrimination against women," state legislatures are removing labor laws originally designed to protect women from "inhuman conditions in manufacturing plants."

Writers' School Staff Votes for Office Union

New York—The instructors and clerical employes who test, evaluate and teach students of the Famous Writers School will be working as union members from now on. A 45-member unit of the Westport, Conn., correspondence school voted for the Office & Professional Employes in a National Labor Relations Board election.

300 Scholarships Given By New York Teachers

New York—Three hundred New York City public high school graduates have been awarded $4,000, four-year college scholarships by the United Federation of Teachers, Local 2 of the American Federation of Teachers, in an unprecedented program of helping children of low-income parents who are not members of the union.

UFT Pres. Albert Shanker, in congratulating the 300 scholarship winners, called the program the largest of its kind ever undertaken by a union or non-governmental agency.

AFL-CIO Regional Director Michael Mann reminded the youngsters and their families at the award ceremonies, held at Julia Richman High School, that UFT members had forgone benefits for themselves to negotiate financing for the unique scholarship program with the city's Board of Education.

Shanker said the college scholarship program "is another step in the union's continuing efforts to improve New York City's schools."

He pointed to other major union-sponsored programs, such as the introduction and expansion of the "More Effective Schools" plan, which offers smaller class size, remediation and supportive services and other educational innovations for schools in ghetto areas; the establishment of day-care centers for neighborhood children and teachers' children, and a million-dollar joint recruitment program to bring more minority group teachers into the school system.

The scholarship winners, who were selected from more than 1,000 applicants, were chosen by an outside committee on the basis of scholastic averages, class standing, overall school record, recommendations, school and community service and potential for academic success.

Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, addressing the graduates, called on them "to fight injustice wherever it is. Don't thank Al Shanker or me or the teachers. Thank yourself when you have fought so that somebody else can make it."

Rustin concluded by declaring, "These young people are the future of America. This is what the press should be talking and writing about. These young people are doing their thing—and they're beautiful."

The president of the Board of Education, Murry Bergtraum, was congratulated by Shanker as "being equally responsible with the union for this occasion" since he was "the chief negotiator for the board" when the scholarship benefit was bargained for successfully by the UFT.

Economic Slump Hardest on Hard Hats

Construction Joblessness Nearly Twice U.S. Rate

By Tom Castor

The plight of the American construction worker must be one of the greatest ironies of the times.

The "hard hat" is the convenient whipping boy for many who blame current inflation on wages. Yet he was among the first and hardest hit by the downturn that brought the nation's economy to its present low state.

He has been the target of the Nixon Administration's Construction Industry Stabilization Committee—aimed at holding down wage increases—even though he is lucky to work and collect wages eight months out of the year.

Now he is the victim of some of the worst unemployment in his industry since World War II because money for both private and government construction is scarce.

"The cost of money is just too damn high," said a spokesman for the Carpenters on the Administration policy of promoting high interest rates and failing to spend funds appropriated by Congress.

This page represents another in a series of features by the AFL-CIO News as a prelude to the conference on the nation's unemployment problem scheduled by the federation next July 12-13 in Washington.

The result is an unemployment rate in the construction trades of 11.2 percent, nearly double the national rate and the highest rate for any industrial grouping in the Bureau of Labor Statistics reports. It even outpaces joblessness in manufacturing where 1.6 million jobs have been lost in the past two years.

"The building trades always are hardest hit when the American economy depresses," said Pres. Frank Bonadio of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. "At the present time the unemployment rate of many of our affiliated trades is running 15 percent to 50 percent."

The BCTD represents 3.5 million of the nation's construction craftsmen in 17 unions.

The general feeling among those affiliates, as expressed by Bonadio, is that Pres. Nixon could cure most of their unemployment ills and breathe new life into the American economy by releasing the nearly $12 billion in frozen funds already appropriated by Congress for more than 100 different programs.

These sentiments were echoed in the reports of building trades leaders in all parts of the country.

Tom Nader, president of the Chicago Building & Construction Trades, said unemployment there has been as high as 25 percent this year.

"The men report that not everyone will get back to work this summer," he said, and the construction unions generally have no room for new apprentices.

For example, the Bricklayers formerly enrolled about 30 men every eight or 10 weeks in Chicago. But over the past several months they had to suspend classes and are just reopening the program.

Enrollment is down 30 percent at the Washburn Trade School for men entering the construction trades. It is supported jointly by local and federal funds.

Nader said that older apprentices generally are working, but openings for beginners are getting increasingly scarce.

The Laborers Union in Chicago is a traditional avenue to summer employment for college students and other youngsters.

But this year it's a dead-end street.

Local 1006 of the Laborers said it usually issues hundreds of permits to students seeking work on road building projects for the summer.

"There won't be any permits this year," said an official of the local. "Hell, half our 1,500 members are out of work as it is. This is a depression."

A $2 billion, cross-town, expressway planned for Chicago might have eased the unemployment pinch there, but the project has become a political football between the city and the state with the construction workers left sitting on the bench.

CARPENTERS WAIT IN VAIN for news of job openings at a Washington, D.C. union hall. The scene is representative of what's taking place in hiring halls across the nation as the unemployment rate for building tradesmen stood at 11.2 percent.

Nader cited the pressures that are building up as a result of the unemployment situation:

"On the one hand, the federal government is asking you to support new hires in equal opportunity and to provide skills to the unskilled when you are confronted with unemployment among your own members.

"And on the other hand they're withholding funds that would make all these things possible."

Bonadio voiced the same complaint, noting that the construction trades are "happy and proud" to participate in the training programs but adding:

"We now find ourselves in the untenable position of training people for the skilled trades and then having no work in which to place the apprentices."

Agencies like the Urban League and the A. Philip Randolph Institute-Joint Apprenticeship Program, which are trying to qualify young members of minority groups for apprenticeships in the building trades, are caught in a similar squeeze.

They are pressured by the government to fulfill training contracts in placing blacks and other minorities in apprenticeship slots.

But the apprenticeship slots are not there today.

"The industry is having problems keeping its present membership employed because of the economy, which means that it is difficult for us to negotiate jobs for blacks and other minorities," said Chuck Bremer, assistant national director of the Joint Apprenticeship Program.

"Many of the cities without Dept. of Labor contracts are running 40 to 50 percent behind our normal pace of placing minorities," Bremer reported.

"The federal cutback has hurt tremendously because it used to take up the slack in construction."

He cited eight labor areas where his agency is 31 percent behind in placements.

In Cleveland, the Carpenters usually train about 50 apprentices in the summer months. This year they will train 15—and the union is worried about placing even this number. More than half of the apprentices are from minority groups.

Unemployment among the Cleveland building trades this year has been the worst in 20 years. The rate has run as high as 50 percent among Carpenters, Bricklayers, Laborers and Electrical Workers, and as high as 30 percent for Plumbers. Operating Engineers were showing nearly 45 percent joblessness.

By rough estimate about 4,200 craftsmen were unemployed at one time in the Greater Cleveland area.

There is only one commercial construction job in operation within the city at present and there are no current plans for any others.

Many Cleveland construction workers have exhausted their unemployment benefits.

"We eat a lot of ground meat, run one car and cut down on everything else," said one jobless carpenter who has three children.

Carpenters were faring just as poorly in other parts of the country with one-third of the membership unemployed in New Orleans, and as many as 1,000 carpenters out of work in Miami.

Although only 6-7 percent of the carpenters in Chicago were unemployed, the rate went as high as 20 percent in Detroit, and 35 percent in the state of Arizona.

Another union hit hard in the West is the Operating Engineers, with 4,964 of their California membership, or 24.8 percent, unemployed. In Nevada, the union showed unemployment of 40.6 percent of its membership and nearly 40 percent in Utah.

There was underemployment, too, as the Engineers reported that 64 percent of the OEIU members worked 1,500 hours or less in 1970.

A report compiled by the Operating Engineers shows construction unemployment running about 17 percent in 13 Western states. This was due in part to a 13.2 percent decline in general construction during 1970 in California alone. As of March of this year, 51,000 construction workers in the state were jobless.

Over the years, most building tradesmen become inured to some unemployment on a seasonal basis. They learn to tighten their belts and plan ahead in anticipation of jobless periods.

But the industry's current job crisis is more than seasonal. It can be traced directly to the economic policies of the Nixon Administration. The question is: how long will construction workers be forced to bear the consequences of those policies?

Commuting Can Be Tough If Job Is 420 Miles Away

Cleveland—When Cleveland iron worker Ronald Fonseca couldn't find a job here because of high unemployment in the building trades, he decided to commute to another job.

The only trouble was that the job was in Philadelphia, about 420 miles away.

For more than six months, Fonseca made the drive, leaving his wife and four children here and living in a rented room for four to six weeks at a stretch before he could save some extra money to return home.

If the weather was good, he averaged $180 to $200 a week, sending $100 a week home. Long distance phone calls averaged $20 a month, and he paid $10 a week for a room.

The cost of living in Philadelphia and maintaining a family in Cleveland left him barely ahead of the bill collectors.

Fonseca tried working in a bakery so he could go home to his family at night in the Cleveland suburb of Newburgh Heights. But it didn't work out.

"I'm like many other iron workers," he said. "I just can't bear to work inside. I'm an outside man. It's freedom. I have to feel the sun on me in the summer and the cold in winter."

Fonseca's case is not unique. He's just one of about 400 members of Iron Workers Local 17 who have had to find jobs in other states. Many of them have developed marital problems as a result.

The last Cleveland job Fonseca had was on a bank building. That job is completed and the only commercial construction project in the city now is the new Bond Court. No other large commercial construction job is planned.

"We're starving," said a member of the local. "This is a depression. People are losing their homes and cars."

Ronald Fonseca is back in Cleveland looking for a job. The pressures of traveling to Philadelphia were too great.

Now he's another statistic, another casualty of the economic downturn, hoping that things will get better.

The President's Turn

THE FIRST SESSION of the 92nd Congress has acted quickly and responsibly to help reduce unemployment in those areas of the country where joblessness persists at high levels.

It is the President's turn now to demonstrate to the nation his concern for the unemployed, for the country's future economic well-being by quickly signing the $2 billion accelerated public works bill sent him by Congress.

The question is neither difficult nor esoteric. Unemployment has reached a nine-year high with the May rate at 6.2 percent. On a seasonally adjusted basis there were 5.2 million Americans willing and able to work who could not find jobs.

Of the nation's 150 major job areas, 55 had unemployment rates exceeding 6 percent last month.

TO ATTACK this problem the AFL-CIO has recommended to the Administration and Congress a wide variety of policies and measures including the accelerated public works measure. Back in February the federation's Executive Council declared:

"The states, local governments and federal agencies have great backlogs of needed public works projects. Many of these projects are ready to go within a short period of time as soon as funds become available. Many can be completed within 12 months after initiation or acceleration.

"An accelerated public works program would provide federal grants to state and local governments and federal agencies to initiate and step up public investment projects in localities which have been hit by high or rapidly rising unemployment—to build and repair such needed public investments as water supply and sewer systems, waste treatment plants, health care and recreational facilities and public buildings."

The council estimated that the $2 billion program "could increase employment by as much as 300,000 to 400,000 or more jobs."

Congress responded and made the accelerated public works program part of a measure that would extend for four years the labor-supported Appalachian regional development program and extend for two years the Public Works and Economic Development Act under which other regional commissions receive federal grants and loans. The vote for passage of a conference committee report in the House was 275 to 104; in the Senate 45 to 33.

REP. JOHN A. BLATNIK (D-Minn.), the chief sponsor of the measure, has noted that there is in existence a backlog of 8,700 applications from communities for public works projects.

This is the situation now before the President. As the measure has moved through Congress, White House spokesmen indicated their opposition to the public works program and at various stages threatened a presidential veto in hopes of defeating the bill. But the House and Senate shrugged off the threats and voted to do something to alleviate unemployment.

The President would do well to take full note of the testimony, the debate and the votes and add his own voice to those who would, by concrete action and federal funds, ease the crisis of joblessness.

A Word Edgewise:

20 Million Overseas Chinese Still Factor in Southeast Asia

By John P. Roche

SCATTERED throughout Southeast Asia there are about 20 million "overseas Chinese" who comprise what is known as the Hanyang. Often referred to as the Jews of Asia, they have by their industry, talent and collective responsibility gained a virtual monopoly on certain economic functions, notably small service enterprises.

Like the Jews in medieval Europe, they are also accused of money-lending at usurious rates of racial exclusiveness, and of lack of loyalty to the nations in which they live. Recently they have been burdened with an additional charge—that they are Communist fifth columnists.

Over the centuries there has obviously been a good deal of assimilation, notably in Thailand, but in general the Chinese minorities have retained their distinctive identities as a necessary measure of self-defense against a hostile world.

While most Chinese in Malaysia, for example, did not participate in the Communist insurgency, most of the insurgents, nevertheless, were Chinese. And the Malays, already nervous about being outnumbered on their own turf by the growing Chinese population, tended to settle for the proposition that all Chinese were suspect. This has led to nasty communal riots.

However, the real program took place in Indonesia in 1965. Nobody will ever know for sure how many people were killed in the wake of the abortive Communist putsch—a conservative estimate is half a million—but the enraged Javanese peasantry took the opportunity to decimate the resident Chinese.

The fact that Mao's regime was incapable of doing a thing to stop the bloodbath undoubtedly helped to trigger the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution. The humiliation and frustration in Peking must have been unbearable, and somebody had to be blamed.

Without taking a guided tour, it might be noted that every nation in Southeast Asia discriminates in some fashion against the Chinese.

Just recently the Philippine government passed a law designed to drive them out of a whole range of small businesses. The government in Saigon has given its Chinese population (estimated at well over 500,000) the choice of Vietnamese citizenship or exile, and the remaining Chinese in Indonesia have yet to stick their heads above ground. (The exception is, of course, the Chinese city-state of Singapore, which was kicked out of Malaysia to keep down the overall percentage of Chinese. With Singapore included, the Malays were heavily outnumbered in Malaysia.)

IN SHORT, the Hanyang has had a rough time, but it still cannot be underestimated as a political and economic force. Given the way they have been treated, the overseas Chinese have a vested interest in a strong China, one that can protect them in times of crisis.

Their interest is basically non-political. Whether a strong China is Nationalist, Communist or Zen Buddhist is fundamentally irrelevant. Like many Irish in 1690—who had a picture with King William on one side and King James on the other for use with varying military visitors—they want a winner.

Until recently Mao didn't look much like a winner. The convulsions of the Cultural Revolution were hardly symptoms of strength and stability, and no overseas Chinese could forget Peking's impotence in the face of the Javanese pogrom. Chiang didn't look like a winner, either, but he had influential friends, particularly in Washington, who could on occasion be helpful. (There is reason to believe that Washington privately told Philippine Pres. Marcos what a dim view it took of his anti-Chinese legislation.)

But since the ping-pong demarche, it is clear that Mao's stock has gone up throughout the Hanyang. An interesting index of this is the revitalized opposition to Lee Kuan Yew's Singapore government. Prime Minister Lee, a militant anti-Communist, responded vigorously by suppressing opposition papers and energizing his already well-employed secret police.

As we proceed to the "normalization" of relations with mainland China, we would be wise to keep the role of the Hanyang in mind. It is an important piece on the international chessboard.

Kirkland Stresses Common Goals:

Civil Rights Progress Linked To Labor's Economic Program

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland to a recent Chicago conference of the A. Philip Randolph Institute affiliates.

ONE THING can be said for the era that we are living in today; you don't have to look very far back to see a great deal of change. Ten or fifteen years ago, in the early days of the modern civil rights revolution, racism was the prevailing and the instinctive way of life for most people in this country. Most people practiced it one way or another and never even gave it a second thought.

We faced an elaborate system of segregation and discrimination, solidified by centuries, held together by a senseless tangle of ideologies, codes, customs, taboos, habits and prejudices against a background of economic stagnation, social neglect and widespread indifference.

Just a few short years ago, in the 1950s, everything seemed arrayed on the side of the status quo and yet, looking back, with all those problems, somehow the task seemed simpler; it seemed more clearly defined among those who were dedicated to change.

There was a strong feeling of hope and there was a unity of purpose and of approach. That force of spirit, that unity, didn't flounder and splinter because it was frustrated or because it failed. Indeed, it succeeded beyond the limits of what seemed possible only a decade ago, it cracked many barriers and brought them down. They are still falling, not withstanding the efforts of the Nixon Administration to shore some of them up. Yet today, this force seems to have faded. In too many quarters, it has yielded to confusion and to cynicism. Why?

One reason, I would suggest, is that a good many well-meaning, liberal-minded people never really understood the problem in the first place. All that needed to be done, they thought, was to tear down the "white only" signs and integration would naturally result; the problem would be over and done with; we would have reached the new Jerusalem.

These people could never quite manage the transition from the world of lunch counters to the world of jobs, housing, schools, health, transportation, sanitation, welfare, crime, overcrowding—the world in which black Americans have to live every day.

Some naive souls could not make that crossing because they were comfortable only with moral issues. They found that the intrusion of economics drained those issues of their moral content. It raised questions of money. It raised questions of taxes and that afflicts an entirely different set of nerves and it raises another set of barriers.

There were others who had a rather pleasant relationship to certain existing economic arrangements and were made uneasy by talk of such things as tearing down the slums, rebuilding the cities, guaranteeing full employment at decent wages, building housing that people can afford, upgrading public education, providing mass transit and the like. Our comfortable friends very accurately perceived that all of these social needs have very fat price tags and, indeed, can only be met through a vast expansion of planned public investment.

THE GREAT MAJORITY of American Negroes are working people. Their income derives from wages and salaries, not from dividends, capital gains and stock bonuses. So long as this is true, and it is going to be true for a long, long time, the Negro and the labor movement will necessarily share common interests. And because the black community is, in the main, a community of workers, its interests are bound with labor's and that bond must prevail over any differences.

Economic policies that are anti-labor must, inevitably, be anti-civil rights.

There is really no way to engineer a recession that raises unemployment in the ranks of labor but not in the black community. There is really no way to promote inflationary price increases that cut into the purchasing power of union members but leave intact the purchasing power of the black community. There is no way to keep union wages down, even in the name of fighting inflation, that allows incomes to rise in the black community.

An end to the heritage of slavery will not come from union busting, depressed wages, cheap labor pools or plantation-style paternalism.

It will not come from pitting black and white workers against each other in a struggle over scarce jobs.

It will not come from engineered recessions that render men and machines idle.

It will not come from inflation that starves the lean and feeds the fat.

It will not come from interest rates that enrich the bankers and wreck our housing programs.

It will not come from fiscal and monetary policies that redistribute income from those who need it to those who do not.

It will not come from a continuing neglect of our social and environmental needs in the midst of blight and disorder.

It will come from the vision, the goals and the broad national programs of the labor movement. It will come from the economic and social policies advocated by labor that would put our resources where our intentions are—on the side of integration.

Senate Drive Pressed:

Unions to Seek Improvements In Welfare Reform Legislation

THE LABOR MOVEMENT supports the thrust of the welfare reform bill now before the House of Representatives, but will press for strengthening improvements when the measure reaches the Senate, AFL-CIO Legislative Representative Clinton Fair declared.

Fair said that the Senate effort will center on raising the $2,400 income floor to at least the "minimum of the standard of need" and assuring that no qualifying family will get less because of the enactment of the new law.

Although many of the states now have cash benefits higher than $2,400, with 50 percent supplemented by the federal government, Fair pointed out that the House bill has no "financial incentives" for the states to maintain those levels nor any "requirement that the states supplement" the federal payment. "Many families, in many states, could be hurt."

Fair appeared on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Fair said there is already evidence of a trend in the country which indicates to us that many welfare recipients "could be in trouble" unless safeguards are written into the new law. He noted that New York has already reduced its cash benefits and "there is talk of further reduction" there, as well as in New Jersey and California. And, he added, "Texas just refused to raise its financial obligation," which will result in a reduction of state supplements to a family of four.

While "it is true that every state will benefit in cash" under the bill now before the House, Fair noted, "it's also true that the demands upon state governments are increasing in many other fields." He said the "serious financial problems" of many states create the "danger" that they will cut welfare to meet other demands.

Turning to the area of legislative tactics, Fair said the labor movement is supporting House passage of the bill as it stands because prospects for improving it there are far less than they will be when the Senate takes up the measure. "It is because we think that the Senate will do something better—improve (the bill) in a number of respects . . . that we are willing" to support House passage and work for amendments on the Senate floor, he asserted.

By Press Associates, Inc.

TODAY'S MOVEMENT, spearheaded by organized labor, for a system of national health insurance cannot be regarded as a new venture in social progress. It must be regarded as "unfinished business" that first came before the American people some 60 years ago.

The ills of our medical health care and its distribution at prohibitive cost are not new. They have been deeply ingrained in the nation's social and economic life for many years. They cried for correction in 1911 when Louis D. Brandeis first called attention to the need for a program of social insurance just as they cry even more for correction today.

And the same forces that held them back then, hold them back today; entrenched, organized medicine and medical insurance companies, then as now, cried out in alarm against it.

Go back to 1912 when Theodore Roosevelt and his maverick Progressives put a national health insurance program in their party platform.

Or, in that same year, when the American Association for Labor legislation, consisting of trade unionists and others, decided to create a Committee on Social Insurance designed to meet the problem of disastrous medical costs.

Or, again, go back to the Twenties when medical health insurance was killed by propaganda that it was a program "made in Germany" because Bismarck had instituted a similar program as far back as 1883.

But the issue would not die, because the need would not die.

In 1927, a Committee on the Costs of Medical Care was set up. In no less than 28 reports it told the story of the tremendous cost of medical care, the maldistribution of doctors and hospital facilities, the desperate needs of the poor, the elderly and more and more the middle class. It was not only the catastrophic illness, but day by day preventive medicine, that was the problem of greater and greater numbers of people.

In 1934, Pres. Franklin Delano Roosevelt set up his Committee on Economic Security originally designed to focus on the needs of the elderly. Today's social security system grew out of it. But, it was highly significant that this committee soon found that health care was as much on the minds of the public as was care for the elderly.

The American Medical Association, which had once supported the idea of an insurance program, now got into the act and at a special convention in February 1935 opposed the whole idea, supporting, instead, voluntary health insurance under the control of the medical associations. So violent was the doctors' opposition that even Pres. Roosevelt ran for cover.

IN THE ORIGINAL social security bill it had been proposed that a special study of the feasibility of a health insurance program be undertaken. This was now stricken for an innocuous clause calling for a study of all aspects of social security without using the dreaded words "national health insurance."

Medicare and Medicaid have been congressional answers to the problems of the elderly and those on welfare. But here again, a sound, national program has been lacking for the vast majority of Americans, including millions of workers who lack proper protection and for whom illness can be a catastrophe.

The American medical profession has had 60 years now to come up with a sound program of medical care within the reach of American pocketbooks. It has had more than half a century to create a medical care system to resolve problems of cost, inefficiency, waste and even harshness on a voluntary basis.

It has failed to do that.

Organized labor, which helped call attention to the need back in 1912, has now thrown its full weight into the balance for a modern medical insurance program without any "ifs, ands or buts."

It wants this basic problem of American life resolved—now.

LABOR HOPES to make the House version of the welfare reform bill stronger and better when the measure reaches the Senate, AFL-CIO Legislative Representative Clinton Fair, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Fair was questioned by Vincent Burke, left, of the Los Angeles Times, and James F. Welsh of the Washington Evening Star.

FDA Sounds New Warnings On Poisonous Pottery Hazard

By Sidney Margolius

WHO WOULD THINK that a nice-looking, bright-colored pottery mug or bowl, such as is found in millions of homes, might be a danger to your family?

The fact is, the number of seizures by the Food & Drug Administration of innocent-looking, but lead-containing, pottery in the past few months amounts to hundreds of shipments.

In further fact, this is only one of a number of hazardous products that continue to come on the market in the absence of any federal law requiring that products first be tested for safety.

The pottery that has been detained by FDA or has been the subject of warnings and recalls, contains leachable lead. Prolonged use of such pottery for food purposes could cause severe illness or even death, the agency has warned.

Most of the warnings and detentions of shipments have involved imported pottery, and especially Mexican pottery. The FDA collected 28 different samples of Mexican pottery and earthenware, and 26 of them contained varying amounts of lead leached from the glaze.

At least two shipments of pottery from Italy also have been the subject of warnings. Japanese dinnerware sold by Sears Roebuck stores under the "Evening Shadow" name now are being recalled because they contain two to seven times the level of lead considered by FDA to be safe.

One U.S. manufacturer, the Metlox Potteries of Manhattan Beach, Calif., also has recalled several of its patterns because of actual or possible lead contamination.

The FDA also has detained shipments of imported pottery containing cadmium, another poisonous heavy metal.

The problem appears to be related especially to low temperature-fired pottery, especially with bright colors. Pottery that shows a rough or dull glaze rather than a glossy one gives most lead when mildly acid solutions are placed in it.

It is especially important to avoid mixing fruit or other acid beverages in low temperature fired pottery. Such beverage powders as Kool-Aid and Funny Face, and even orange juice, apple juice and lemonade, can release the lead in low temperature-fired pottery.

As you can see in the list of ingredients on the packages. Kool-Aid has a high content of synthetic fumaric acid. This is similar to citric acid, and is used as a stabilizing additive in many other processed foods. (In fact, Kool-Aid doesn't have much more than fumaric acid, sugar and synthetic vitamin C.) Funny Face also has some fumaric acid.

General Foods, manufacturer of Kool-Aid, informs us that certain metals such as galvanized steel and copper also are "not suitable" for storing fruit juices or beverages such as Kool-Aid. GF says that actually it is safe to prepare Kool-Aid in aluminum and stainless steel containers, but on the package they warn against the use of any metal containers.

One of the lead-containing patterns from Italy named by the FDA was distributed nationally in this country by Holt Howard, Inc., Stamford, Conn. Some have the markings "H-H Italy" on the bottom. Another is the Empoli brand, sold by the Munford Co., Conley, Ga., through its World Bazaar stores around the country.

THE RECALLED METLOX pottery patterns are Mission Verde of the Poppytrail line; Petalburst, of the Vernon line, and six patterns of the Tempo line. Other Metlox patterns were not found to have excessive amounts of lead.

Most of the hazardous pottery colors, judging from the recalled patterns, appear to be the bright ones such as yellow, green, brown, beige and red. It is also unsafe to use such pottery bowls for salads, as they often are used. Tomatoes and vinegar-containing dressings are acid.

The government also has warned of problems in children's car seats and in baby walkers. A new federal safety standard has been issued for the car seats. The type which hooks on the seat back has been banned. But seats manufactured before April 1 when the standard became effective are still on the market. You can check the date of manufacture which must be stamped on the label under the new standard.

Here's One More Reason Not to Purchase Metlox

The Pottery Workers, with the support of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, is asking all union members to boycott Metlox pottery, cited by Margolious in this week's column.

Not only is the pottery a source of lead poisoning, but Lester H. Null, president of the Potters, noted that the company refuses to negotiate a contract although its employes voted for the union eight years ago.

"They have repeatedly refused to bargain and are now before the U.S. Court of Appeals on a contempt of court charge," he reported. "We urge all friends of labor to refrain from buying Metlox dinnerware."

HUMANITARIAN SERVICE award of the Children's Asthma Research Institute & Hospital is accepted by Pres. John H. Lyons, center, of the Iron Wokers in San Francisco. Joining in the tribute are Walter Farrell of Kaiser Industries and Mrs. Lyons. Lyons was cited for his efforts in raising money for the C. J. Haggerty Research Fellowship Fund, honoring the past president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. CARIH has now established the Lyons Research Fund in recognition of his service to asthmatic children.

Citizen Action Urged:

Pollution Imperils Nation's Waterways

TODAY most of our nation's waterways are polluted by everything from sewage and garbage to thermal pollution and great clots of oil. Some fear we will end up "a land laced by open sewers, as obnoxious as the drainage ditches of medieval European cities."

The sources of the pollution, what can be done to combat it, and the importance of citizen action are among the questions discussed in Our Troubled Waters: The Fight Against Water Pollution, by Gladwin Hill, a new Public Affairs Committee pamphlet.

There are three million miles of streams and thousands of large lakes in the United States," says Hill. "Once they were sources of clean water. Today anyone who kneels down to drink from one of them, does it at his peril."

This pollution comes from half a dozen basic sources, Hill explains. Foremost are industry, "whose wastes are laden with hundreds of far more complex and toxic chemicals than generally appear in sewage," and municipal sewer systems. Added to these are huge volumes of pollution from urban runoff and from agriculture—animal wastes, farm chemicals, and irrigation drainage. "Fallout" pollution, which comes down in rain and snow, has been blamed for the presence of lead and mercury even in remote lakes. Its source is the more than 200 million tons of gaseous contaminants that go into our skies each year. Finally, there is natural pollution—decaying vegetable and animal matter and silt.

EVEN WHEN proper treatment is applied to sewage, Hill points out, two stubborn chemicals—nitrates and phosphates—remain. Because they are natural fertilizers, they encourage the growth of algae and other objectionable plant life. And "this excessive vegetation can hasten by thousands of years a lake's natural tendency to fill up with debris and degenerate into a swamp—the process of eutrophication."

This explains the pressure to eliminate phosphates from detergents, for to remove nitrates and phosphates from sewage requires more sophisticated treatment than most communities have tried.

Until about 20 years ago, the government came on the scene only when sickness resulted from polluted water and questions of public health arose. Now legislation provides for: systematic federal technical assistance to localities in planning adequate sewage treatment; federal matching-fund grants to states and localities to help build treatment facilities; procedures for federal abatement of interstate pollution, and, at the invitation of states, of intrastate pollution.

A 1965 law requires states "to draw up codes of quality . . . for every distinct waterway." Compliance has been slow, but to date 31 states have drawn up standards.

The pamphlet summarizes the broad program for combatting water pollution outlined by the Council on Environmental Quality: "higher levels of governmental and industrial expenditures for water pollution abatement; improved state organization, programs, and enforcement; special efforts directed at problems of eutrophication, thermal pollution, agricultural pollution, and chemical wastes; and development of . . . treatment processes that would make water fully reusable."

But citizens don't have to wait for government action, Hill stresses. They can learn about the quality of water in their community and whether or not existing standards and laws are being enforced.

The pamphlet is available form Public Affairs Committee, 381 Park Ave. S., New York, N.Y., 10016, for 25 cents a copy.

Soup to Nonsense:

The Path to a Cluttered House Is Paved with Good Intentions

By Jane Goodsell

SPRING CLEANING has got me all unstrung. It's not the squalor I find behind the refrigerator that upsets me, nor even the nameless horrors crammed into the crevices of overstuffed chairs. In this era of women's lib, it's easy to placate my conscience with the thought that keeping a house spic and span shouldn't be my ultimate goal in life.

No, what depresses me is the debris left over from dreams that didn't pan out. The petit point I didn't finish. The tulip bulbs I forgot to plant. The language records I never played. The clothes I didn't wear. The books I didn't read. The letters I didn't write.

In my basement there are several dozen fruit jars which, when I bought them at a rummage sale, I envisioned filled with glistening peaches, pears, apricots and plums. Dreams, idle dreams! Over the years they have remained empty save for the cobwebs spun in them by spiders with a stronger sense of commitment than mine. There is a trellis which I never got around to painting, a meat grinder I meant to have repaired, and a collection of round tin boxes which would have been perfect for sending away the fruit cakes I had every intention of making at Christmas time.

My kitchen cupboards are cluttered with good intentions that came to naught. A tiny jar of truffles that I intended to use in the pate en croute that I never made. A vanilla bean that I forgot I had. A ten-pound bag of stone-ground flour for the bread I meant to, but somehow didn't, bake. And a box stuffed with about two million recipes which I'd clipped but never got around to trying.

My desk drawers are crammed with letters I never answered, letters I began and didn't finish, guest lists for parties I didn't get around to having, and lists of things to do that I didn't.

MY CLOTHES CLOSETS and bureau drawers bulge with heartbreaking reminders of the gap between illusion and reality. There is the midi that an eloquent salesclerk mesmerized me into buying. The peasant dress that I talked myself into during a spell of temporary insanity. The stretch pants I couldn't sit down in. The wig that I innocently thought would solve all my hair problems. The alligator pumps I bought the year that high heels went out of style.

Today's odds and ends are the stuff that yesterday's dreams were made of. 'Tis a sobering thought.

As City Jobs Decline:

Suburbs Challenge Restaurant Union

Chicago—"The ever increasing number of fast-food operations and the flight of middle- and upper-income citizens to the suburbs" pose the two major problems confronting the catering industry, Pres. Ed S. Miller of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes told the union's 37th convention.

In his report to the 850 delegates, Miller said that the fast-food operations "are no longer restricted to franchised hamburger and chicken shops." Many well-known and established hotels and restaurants "through the use of microwave ovens are foisting what amounts to 'TV dinners' on the public," he charged.

As an example of how the fast-food operation has reduced job opportunities for the union's 460,000 members, Miller reported that a nationally-known hotel in a major city that once had a staff of 125 and did all its own baking, cooking and butchering, "now has reduced that staff to a handful by the use prepared frozen foods."

He noted that although the union has recorded a gain in membership since its last convention, it has been able to achieve that gain only by joining the "flight to the suburbs" and expanding its organizing activities in that area.

Miller said that this population shift to the suburbs has hurt the membership of his union "because many center-city restaurants that we had had organized for years have been forced to go out of business or follow the exodus. . . ."

Also, he noted "many new restaurants have followed the people and the industries to the suburbs. In many cases the new employers attempt to hire local housewives or local high school or college students on a part-time basis, thus robbing veterans of our craft of full employment."

Miller pledged to the delegates that the union would continue to meet this new organizing challenge and continue to grow, but he also warned of other problems which can only be solved through legislative means.

This dependence on political action was echoed in a speech by COPE Director Al Barkan, who warned that labor and its allies will have to mount an all-out voter registration drive between now and the election. He pointed out that COPE's efforts almost swung an "election miracle" in the last campaign.

Barkan urged the delegates to develop committees on the local level so that in the coming campaigns they could use all the help available from national COPE.

Also addressing the opening sessions of the convention were Sen. Adlai Stevenson (D-Ill.), who spoke strongly against continued U.S. involvement in the war in Vietnam.

The delegates also heard an address from Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), who declared that Pres. Nixon's economic "game plan" had "failed miserably" with the result that inflation and rising unemployment continue to plague the nation.

He accused the Administration of creating a "terrible human tragedy" by clinging to these policies and said Congress must take an active lead in programs to speed recovery because "we can wait no longer for the President to take the lead."

Voting Drive Stressed At Jersey Convention

Atlantic City—The New Jersey AFL-CIO voted at its annual convention to put more effort and money into political action in preparation for coming elections.

The importance of united action in registering and voting was stressed in a convention policy statement looking toward next year's presidential election campaign. The delegates approved a companion motion to raise COPE's share of council per capita income from a sixth to a fourth.

A panel discussion on the impact of the Administration's trade and tax policies produced a report that uncontrolled imports of shoes, textiles, apparel and electronic parts have cost the jobs of 70,000 New Jersey workers in the past three years.

Presidents of three international unions took part in the panel discussion—Peter Bommarito of the Rubber Workers, George Baldanzi of the United Textile Workers and Thomas E. Boyle of the Chemical Workers.

Pres. Charles H. Marciante reported to the convention that labor will put forward its own slates for public office unless party organizations endorse more labor-approved candidates.

Delegates approved Marciante's stand after he reported that, in the state outside Essex County, only two candidates from labor ranks have been endorsed by Democratic leaders for legislative office. In Newark, in the state's largest county, labor is supporting a bipartisan independent slate containing some candidates from labor's ranks, he said.

The policy is not a permanent change in tactics but is designed to point the way toward a united front in 1972, Marciante said.

The convention voted to raise the president's salary from $20,000 a year to $23,000. Salaries of Sec.-Treas. John J. Brown and two executive vice presidents were increased from $17,000 a year to $20,000.

The delegates voted to donate $2,000 to the Newark Teachers Union in its legal battle against fines and jail sentences imposed after strikes in 1970 and 1971.

The convention also called on the Newark News to bargain in good faith with striking Newspaper Guildsmen. It endorsed a $155-million state bond issue for higher education and voiced support for the election rather than appointment of state judges.

Convention speakers included Gov. William T. Cahill (R), and Senators Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D) and Clifford Case (R).

Mediators Cite Trend Toward Coordination

Coordinated bargaining by unions has given a new incentive to labor's drive for narrowing or eliminating area wage differentials in multi-plant operations, the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service reported.

Problems have made the all-union approach to bargaining "extremely difficult," FM&CS Director J. Curtis Counts said in a report on Fiscal 1970, the service's 23rd annual summary of its work. But "there is every expectation that attempts at coordinated bargaining will continue, especially on issues that are company-wide in scope, such as pension and insurance programs," Counts related.

The report noted one new development in the construction industry—the successful use of multi-trade bargaining in Detroit to "achieve new agreements without strikes many months ahead of scheduled contract expirations."

The Detroit Building & Construction Trades Council agreed to negotiate on an informal group bargaining basis. With six men on each side representing some unions and some employers, agreement was reached on a package increase of $2 an hour. A no-strike, no-lockout provision was agreed upon in subsequent separate bargaining on working conditions.

The agreement also provided final and binding arbitration of unsettled issues. Several other unions later reached agreement paralleling the multi-trade agreement, the report said.

Other highlights of the year: an average of 326 settlements per week resulted from dispute cases assigned to federal mediators; no work stoppages occurred in 275 of the 326 settlements; the arbitration caseload increased to a new high.

Supreme Court Asked To Void Picketing Ban

A decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals in Florida that would seriously limit picketing rights of unions in so-called "secondary boycott" cases is being strongly opposed by the AFL-CIO and the Steelworkers.

The case involves the USWA and the Auburndale Freezer Corp., a Florida citrus processing company. At issue was whether the union had the right to picket an independent Auburndale warehouse where the company stored its products as well as a nearby processing plant.

The Appeals Court held against the union on the grounds that the warehouse was a "secondary" site at which there was no strike and that therefore the picketing there was illegal. The case was appealed by the union and is now before the U.S. Supreme Court.

Both the Steelworkers and the AFL-CIO, in friend-of-the-court briefs, contend that the ruling "tends to undermine the achievements of a decade."

"Unless the decision is reversed," the federation's brief said, "it is certain to stimulate a new cycle of litigation before the National Labor Relations Board and the lower courts over issues which this court justifiably regarded as settled . . ."

The brief cited numerous past decisions which justify a union in shutting down "the struck employer's entire production process from its start, the receipt of raw materials, to its completion, the delivery of the finished goods."

Thus, the AFL-CIO argued, there can be no one site which is the primary and only site that can be picketed. It held that "the type of work" that secondary employes are being asked to perform is the key to whether picketing is primary or secondary.

In this case, the brief continued, the type of work was part of the employer's regular operations and so was open to the economic pressure of a strike.

The brief declared that an employer could not justifiably be allowed to escape union pressure simply by storing his goods temporarily at some other site than his processing department.

It said that the Supreme Court's past decisions emphasized the nature of the work being performed by secondary employes and concluded:

"Since the decision below fails to heed this teaching and, instead, repeats the errors of the past in a critical and much litigated area of labor relations, it should not be permitted to stand."

Ralph Novak Dies, Ex-Guild Leader

Detroit—Ralph B. Novak, who was secretary-treasurer of the American Newspaper Guild from 1947 to 1951 and executive vice president from 1951 to 1955, died in a hospital here at 63. He was buried after services June 14 in Guardian Angel church.

Novak was an accountant for the former Detroit Times and active in the Detroit Guild when he first ran for ANG office. He returned to the Times in 1955 and, when it closed, became treasurer-manager of a newspaper employes' credit union, now known as the Communicating Arts Credit Union.

He was vice president of the International Federation of Journalists from 1952 to 1955. At his death he was director from Michigan of the National Credit Union Association.

Survivors include his wife Ida and four children.

ACKNOWLEDGING THE APPLAUSE of delegates to the National Council of Senior Citizens convention is Chairman Wilbur D. Mills of the House Ways & Means Committee, who has endorsed a bill to provide increased social security benefits for the elderly. NCSC Board Member Mrs. Virginia Ferracho and Pres. Nelson H. Cruikshank are shown with Mills.

Health Security Endorsed:

Improved Social Programs Pressed by Senior Citizens

By John R. Oravec

The 10th anniversary convention of the National Council of Senior Citizens underscored the vital needs of the nation's 20 million older persons in resolving their social and economic problems.

The list stretches from improvements in social security benefits through housing for the elderly and mass transportation to National Health Security for all age groups.

While endorsing the labor-supported Health Security legislation as being the kind of program needed to deliver quality care with built-in cost controls, the more than 2,500 delegates also called for immediate improvements in Medicare and Medicaid.

These improvements would pave the way for National Health Security, a convention resolution pointed out. It also stressed that the Kennedy-Griffiths legislation "truly reforms the health system, using advance budgeting to control costs and avoiding the expensive use of private insurance carriers as middlemen."

NCSC Pres. Nelson H. Cruikshank noted in this report to the convention that "the main reason our organization supports the Health Security bill before Congress is our concern for all age groups . . . . Our objective is a better life for all Americans, including the elderly."

"What is good for all our citizens is good for senior citizens," he stressed.

The convention also endorsed a bill introduced by Chairman Wilbur D. Mills of the House Ways and Means Committee that would increase social security benefits 5 percent next Jan. 1.

But citing certain inadequacies in the Mills bill, the delegates called for an additional 25 percent increase in retirement benefits. They urged that a national policy be established to assure a level of income that would eliminate poverty for all persons, including the aged.

Cruikshank told the convention that "there is much that is good" in the Mills bill—"and much we must seek to correct when the bill goes to the Senate."

Mills, a major speaker at the convention, outlined other benefits contained in the legislation that runs for 687 pages. He said the objective "is to assure that ultimately all aged, blind or totally disabled people will have incomes above the poverty line."

For single persons with no other income the bill provides monthly payments of $130 in fiscal 1973, $140 in fiscal 1974 and $150 thereafter, Mills noted.

Payments for eligible couples would be $195 in fiscal 1973 and $200 later. The legislation also would give financial support to states to supplement the payments, especially in urbanized areas where living costs are higher, he added.

Mills pointed out that the bill would also bring improvements in Medicare by extending coverage to about 1.5 million long-term disabled social security beneficiaries not previously covered.

The NCSC delegates adopted a resolution supporting the Steelworkers in current basic steel bargaining and urged the union "to demand that past retirees have pensions raised to equal those of future retirees."

The convention warned that many pension funds "are in great jeopardy; their administrators are squandering workers' pension money" by financing corporate ventures.

Calling attention to a national housing crisis affecting the elderly, the NCSC proposed a 16-point program to resolve the problems. It urged full funding of housing programs to achieve the national goal of 2.6 million new units per year and called for the immediate release of $928 million authorized and appropriated by Congress for housing construction that was impounded by the Nixon Administration.

Expressing concern over the shrinking public transportation systems, the NCSC urged a national policy to develop an effective mass transit program.

Congress should act immediately, the delegates said, to earmark funds for mass transit using substantial portions of revenues from taxes on gasoline, oil, motor vehicles and road usage.

The convention also endorsed the concept of no-fault auto insurance which would assure policyholders of payment for damages without involving costly legal action.

Looking to the coming White House Conference on Aging, the first since 1961, the NCSC cited the need for more frequent sessions. It called for state conferences every two years and national conferences every three years, "so that senior citizens can make each President accountable" for programs for the elderly.

The NCSC presented merit awards to Sen. Edward W. Brooke (R-Mass.) and Rep. David Pryor (D-Ark.) for their efforts in Congress to aid the elderly.

Union Volunteers Hailed For Community Service

Norfolk, Va.—Union volunteers are the "heart of the AFL-CIO Community Services program", Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the 118 graduates of the Community Services Union Counsellor Training Program here.

The volunteers from local unions in the Norfolk area had devoted several hours a week for eight weeks to studying their community and its social services. As union counsellors they will work a few hours a week in their plants and in union halls referring workers with problems to the social agencies that can help solve them. Their training was sponsored by the Community Services Committee of the Norfolk AFL-CIO.

Kirkland remarked that the essence of their task was to transmit the "basic message of human concern, human solidarity and human brotherhood."

The tradition of labor participation in community affairs is based on the same idea that forms the base of the labor movement itself, Kirkland observed. "All men are in the same boat, and the only way to keep it afloat and on course is to make it seaworthy for all."

During the early struggle for the basic right to unionize and bargain collectively, Kirkland noted, workers did not have time to become involved in community problems. But, he went on, since labor's involvement in war-relief and community projects during World War II, unions have discovered that they have the "facilities, the resources, the manpower and the ability to get things done."

He pointed out that today the AFL-CIO has 181 community services representatives working full-time to help develop and coordinate volunteer activities with social services and agencies. This work, and the abilities of the community services representatives, "are among the nation's most valuable assets" in coping with emergencies.

Kirkland cited the statistics of United Fund campaigns to show the importance of union community activity:

- In 1955, 34 percent of the U.S. and Canadian community chest funds of $350 million came from workers.
- In 1970, total contributions came to $843 million and the worker's share had grown to 60 cents of every dollar.

Kirkland credited workers with the "lion's share of the responsibility for fund-raising" and with deep involvement in seeing that the money is used effectively.

Communications between labor organizations and social agencies are improving, he said, especially on the "level that counts most—the level of personal, daily, face-to-face involvement in community affairs by individual union members."

He reminded his audience that labor's fundamental job is still "protecting and advancing the well-being of all who work for wages"—through collective bargaining and political action.

Training Fund Set Up By Sheet Metal Union

The Sheet Metal Workers have doubled their membership in the past 10 years and expect to double it again in the next decade through growth of the air conditioning and allied industries, Pres. Edward J. Carlough said in announcing a new union-management program to train workers for the industry.

Carlough joined Pres. Cavet Snyder of the Sheet Metal & Air Conditioning Contractors National Association, Inc., in reporting the launching of a national training fund and the appointment of Wilbur L. Fillippini as its administrator.

Union and management recently agreed that the fund will be financed by the employers with a contribution of 2 cents an hour per man, and jointly administered. By the third year of its operation, it should have financing at the rate of $3.2 million a year, the sponsors estimated.

The two officials said the training of future sheet metal workers and the retraining of present journeymen are both essential to assure that their productivity will continue to rise during a period of technological change.

Fillippini, a former Sheet Metal Workers business manager in Santa Barbara, Calif., has been business manager of the Santa Barbara County Building & Construction Trades Council since 1959.

The new fund, according to its sponsors, has these purposes: to establish loans or grants to help local unions and contractors use modern equipment in training workers; to use grants in training journeyman workers in new fields, such as air pollution control; to maintain full-time national and field staff officers to assist local training programs; to develop new training methods to improve work skills in the industry.

Nixon Transportation Disputes Bill Seen Prelude to Broader Strike Ban

If Pres. Nixon gets passage of his bill to remove the right to strike in transportation industries, it could be the pilot for even more sweeping anti-strike proposals.

This was disclosed in testimony by Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson in opening the Administration's drive in Congress for a measure labor charges would impose compulsory arbitration on 4 million workers in five industries—railroads, airlines, longshore, maritime and trucking.

Under questioning from Chairman Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.) of the Senate Labor Committee, Hodgson said the Administration attaches importance to a provision of its so-called "emergency disputes" bill which hasn't gotten much publicity.

The provision would set up a commission—whose seven members would be named by the President—to develop ways for restricting strikes in other industries, including those that may be only regional or local in nature.

In answer to a question from Sen. Robert Packwood (R-Ore.), Hodgson revealed that the Administration had considered making its present bill applicable to many industries but instead decided to immediately concentrate on transportation industries because of the "difficult time" the government has with them.

Nixon's legislation would lump all five industries under a new section of the Taft-Hartley Act and give the President three "options" for settling disputes: Seek a 110-day no-strike injunction, allow partial operation of an industry, or appoint a board that would impose the "final" bargaining offer of either side.

Since only one "option" could be used, unionists contend "option three" would always be applied. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has assailed it as "a scheme incompatible with principles of democracy." Leaders of nearly all of more than 30 unions whose members would be affected similarly have denounced it.

However, Hodgson repeatedly referred to the bill as "reform" in his testimony, charging it would "redound to the benefit of labor and management alike." He contended it is not compulsory arbitration and referred to the Administration as "the champions of collective bargaining."

Since the Administration builds its case for the bill on threatened railroad strikes, Packwood wanted to know how airline strikes "could be anything but an inconvenience?" Williams wanted to know why trucking was covered. Hodgson saw strikes in those industries as a potential threat to "health and safety."

Williams showed a preference for his bill, backed by the AFL-CIO and railroad unions, which would spell out the right of unions to engage in selective strikes on railroads, a right recently upheld by the Supreme Court.

He indicated, as he has before, that the committee plans extensive hearings on a number of other proposals before advancing any legislation. Hodgson was the only witness heard and no further date for hearings was set.

Boot & Shoe Label Brands Footwear

Boston—The first use on leather of the new union label of the Boot & Shoe Workers was announced by union Pres. John E. Mara. The label shows the clasped hands of the AFL and CIO against a background of the North American continent encircled by the union's name. It will be used on products of the Crosby Square and Classmate shoe factories in Watertown, Wis., whose workers are represented by Local 79.

Permission to use the AFL-CIO emblem in the Boot & Shoe Workers' union label program was granted last year by the federation, subject to the usual requirements.

Despite Veto Threat:

Public Works Plan Put Up to President

tions or proposals was acceptable and that if the bill included an accelerated public works program, a recommendation would be made to the President to veto the bill."

If the bill isn't vetoed, Harsha said, "there will be a great and tremendous credibility gap" between the White House and himself.

Two sections of the legislative package were relatively non-controversial—a four-year extension of the successful Appalachian Regional Development Act, which provides federal grants to mountain-isolated areas of 14 states, and a two-year extension of a companion program for other regions with common problems.

Republican leaders sought to defeat the House-Senate conference report and then come back with a bill limited to those two provisions. But they were opposed not just by the more liberal wing of their party but by a number of "mainstream" Republicans representing districts with heavy unemployment.

Under the legislation sent to the White House, federal funds would pay for 80 percent of the cost of public works projects that can be started up quickly.

These include sewage treatment plants, sewer and water systems, hospitals and health facilities, street improvements, public buildings and recreational facilities.

Most of them have already been blueprinted, but have been shelved for lack of funds.

In cases where cities have neither the funds nor the legal borrowing authority to finance 20 percent of the cost, the federal government would pay the full amount.

Testifying for the bill earlier in the year, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany termed it "revenue-sharing from a very practical viewpoint."

A similar program, he noted, helped the nation pull out of its last recession.

If the bill is vetoed, the first test will come in the Senate where the 45-33 vote for passage was less than the two-thirds that would be needed to override a veto. (Rollcall on this page.)

A number of Senate Republicans, however, based their vote against the legislation on a procedural dispute over House restrictions on changes that can be made by a House-Senate conference committee. A veto would force them to vote strictly on the issue—for or against a program designed to help both unemployed workers and the communities where they live.

On deck in Congress is a companion job-creating bill—a labor-supported program of federal grants to enable local and state governments to hire unemployed workers for a broad range of public service jobs.

Both the House and Senate have approved similar legislation and a House-Senate conference committee has been named to work out the final version of the bill.

BENEFITS PROVIDED in the National Health Security bill are explained by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) at the first national leadership conference staged by the State, County & Municipal Employes in Washington. Kennedy is flanked by SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf, left, and William Lucy, executive assistant to Wurf. More than 120 council officers, local presidents and SCME staff members attended the three-day conference. Other speakers included Senators Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.), Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.), Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) Harold Hughes (D-Iowa) and Birch Bayh (D-Ind.).

Kennedy Terms Nation 'Ready' for Health Care

Millions of Americans in every walk of life are fed up with the high cost, poor quality and low accessibility of health care, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) told the Group Health Association of America at its annual institute.

"America is ready for national health insurance," he stressed, "if only Congress will listen."

Kennedy, the chief Senate sponsor of the labor-endorsed National Health Security bill, said that the public wants a change from the existing outmoded health delivery system. He cited a recent opinion poll that found the feeling running 55 percent to 30 percent in support of national health insurance.

"They're ready for a change, and the only fear they have is that the change we make may not be equal to the need," Kennedy observed.

Only Health Security will be able to fill that need, he said, adding that it "is the only bill now pending before Congress that can establish a uniform, comprehensive health care system. It is the only bill that can effectively change the health delivery system."

Pres. Leonard Woodcock of the Auto Workers, who is also chairman of the Committee for National Health Insurance, was particularly critical of the Nixon Administration's health care plan.

"We in organized labor, and the millions of Americans working with us, reject the Administration's proposals," he declared.

"We scorn their self-described patches which would give our members fewer benefits than they now have, and which would offer the poor and near-poor the crumbs of the table of medical care," Woodcock added.

He said the Administration's health programs and those of organized medicine and private insurance companies would increase costs and provide little or nothing toward the improved health care which the professions are capable of.

Woodcock's Committee for National Health Insurance is working closely with the AFL-CIO for passage of the Health Security bill.

Also addressing the institute was Richard Shoemaker of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, who decried the over-emphasis on profits by many insurance companies, hospitals and Blue Cross-Blue Shield organizations.

Many of these groups have been too interested in serving themselves, "with the good of the patient a by-product," Shoemaker declared. Insurance companies have not "changed their spots," he stressed in citing their drive for profits.

He also suggested that hospitals need to be more representative of the communities they serve and the "Blues" need to do some soul-searching about their board representation.

LABOR'S CASE for substantial increase in the minimum wage and expanded coverage is bolstered by testimony of Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky at Senate hearings. Potofsky and Jane O'Grady, the union's legislative representative, are welcomed by Senate Labor Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.). Williams is sponsor of a bill to raise the wage floor to $2 immediately and $2.25 a year later.

Black Leaders Join Drive for $2 Pay Floor

being paid less than $2 an hour are white and that "poverty continues to oppress American workers of all races, all ethnic groups, both men and women."

But a large percentage of black workers are found in the poorest-paid occupations, the statement noted.

"Often they perform tasks of unrelieved monotony at jobs requiring harsh physical exertion, or labor under substandard conditions at work which is dirty and unappealing. These are jobs which, though necessary, are shunned by the rest of the labor market."

Yet, while "much has been said and written of the evils of the welfare system," the present minimum wage "relegates fully-employed men and women and their families to a standard of living no better than that of welfare recipients."

The statement urged that "by extending the minimum wage coverage to some of the poorest among us and by increasing the minimum to $2 now and substantially more in the following year, Congress will be doing justice to the entire nation, black and white."

As the Senate hearings continued, union and employer witnesses clashed sharply on the impact of an immediate increase in the minimum wage on the economy.

A U.S. Chamber of Commerce spokesman termed it "surprising that Congress would even be considering an increase in the minimum wage" at the present time. And the executive director of the Associated General Contractors joined him in questioning the wisdom of "initiating substantial minimum wage increases" in a period of inflation and recession.

Jacob S. Potofsky, president of the Clothing Workers, spoke forcefully to this point in his testimony.

"There are some who may question initiating substantial minimum wage increases at a time of recession," he noted.

"In answer to this," Potofsky said, "permit me to remind you that federal minimum wage legislation was born during the worst depression in our nation's history, specifically as an anti-depression measure."

The minimum wage floor, he stressed, "did, in fact, prove to be a potent instrument for bringing us out of depression" and labor's proposals for raising the minimum wage would "help now to bring us out of the current recession."

Stresses Labor's Concern:

Meany Hits Attacks On Right to Privacy

a manner commensurate with their inherent human dignity.

"And, of course, that end can only be achieved in a nation truly dedicated to maximizing personal freedom."

Meany listed three fronts on which labor is battling to protect the right of privacy:

- It is attempting to arrest, through legislation, the movement toward increased wiretapping and bugging.
- It is fighting to "bring our internal security system in line with a decent regard for the right of privacy, and its corollary, the right of free and untrammeled association."
- It has mounted a nationwide attack on the misuse of the polygraph, or so-called lie detector.

Meany reiterated the AFL-CIO Executive Council's position on wiretapping — that it should be banned with the exception of "federal agents, under specific court orders . . . in an area clearly defined to cover espionage, treason and kidnaping."

"Even assuming that wiretapping does substantially aid in police work, we remain persuaded that, in general, the preservation of individual freedom should have priority over easing police work," Meany said.

On the problem of security, Meany noted that organized labor, as the major, responsible anti-Communist organization, is solidly behind defense of the country from enemies within and without.

"But we flatly reject the notion that the way to fight communism is to jettison the individual liberties that are an essential part of democracy."

Meany drew applause when he stated, "We do not believe communism can be defeated or democracy aided by suspending the Bill of Rights and the 14th Amendment [or] by undertaking to outlaw particular views and ideas, whether by governmental fiat, or vigilante action."

On lie detectors, the federation's Executive Council has objected to their use, "not only because their claims to reliability are dubious, but because they infringe on the fundamental rights of American citizens to personal privacy."

And Meany added, "our founding fathers could not have foreseen this variant of the 'star chamber' but given their abhorrence of forced self-incrimination, we may be sure that they would have outlawed the lie detector."

Meany abhorred the attempts by the Defense Dept. and defense industries to bring back rigid security measures that could be used for union-busting — the same tactics outlawed by the Wagner Act in 1935.

And he said that employer attempts to invade workers' privacy must be made the subject of collective bargaining and arbitration.

Pres. Edward J. Carlough of the Sheet Metal Workers, who is chairman of the MTD's Committee on Privacy, observed in a keynote address to the forum that a free society cannot exist without privacy.

"We may have to rewrite our Constitution—so that we can define, with more precision than our forefathers did—this right to our own privacy," Carlough suggested.

John McCart, operations director of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council composed of 34 unions, described abuses of employe privacy within the federal service ranging from use of the lie detector to personality tests containing intimate questions on personal relationships, sexual matters, religious beliefs and finances.

He said the AFL-CIO council is supporting legislation now before the House to limit these abuses.

Among other speakers were Sen. Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (D-N.C.), Sen. John L. McClellan (D-Ark.), and Representatives Ogden Reid (R-N.Y.), Walter E. Fauntroy (D-Washington, D.C.) and John Moss (D-Calif.).

O. William Moody, MTD administrator, and Herbert Brand, administrator of the Transportation Institute served as chairmen of luncheon and forum sessions.

The Invasion

Court Prods NLRB To Speed Decisions

Six years is too long a time for a union to wait for an order requiring a balky employer to negotiate a contract, the U.S. Court of Appeals declared in reviewing a previous decision.

A three-judge panel enforced a National Labor Relations Board ruling that Ex-Cell-O Corp. of Elwood, Ind., illegally refused to bargain with the Auto Workers after the union won a representation election in 1964.

But the court canceled a previous decision to send the case back to the board. It agreed with the NLRB that in this case, plant employes are not entitled to be paid for wage increases and other benefits they lost because of the company's refusal to bargain. But it urged a speedup of NLRB handling in similar refusal-to-bargain cases.

The judges repeated their belief that the NLRB does have the power to grant relief to workers in such cases when a company's objections to election results are "patently frivolous" and its refusal to bargain with a certified union is a "clear and flagrant violation of the law."

Reviewing a decision the same court made three months ago, the judges decided the company's objection to conduct of the election was not "frivolous" but based on an objection to a union newsletter which was "slanted" but not spurious or fraudulent.

"All members of this court agree that expedition . . . is desirable, especially in regard to elections," the court wrote. It would be appropriate, the judges said, for the board to "review its procedures for those cases when the union wins the election and the company does not acquiesce."

The objective should be to identify those cases that raise no substantial problem and to enter an order to bargain even in advance of a decision on other matters that require further consideration, the court said.

In the Ex-Cell-O case, the union was certified in 1965 as winner of the election. The company sought a court test by refusing to honor the certification, and a trial examiner recommended that the company be ordered to negotiate and make employes whole for their "measurable losses."

A long delay resulted when the board consolidated the Ex-Cell-O case with three other refusal-to-bargain cases. It heard oral arguments in July 1967, and last August decided it does not have authority to prescribe make-whole remedies. The appeals court disagrees with that part of the board's finding.

Budget for Job Safety Criticized as Too Low

Labor asked Congress to put a higher priority on enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act than the Administration did in its budget request.

The $25.3 million Labor Dept. budget for the enforcement program is "woefully inadequate," AFL-CIO Legislative Representative Kenneth Peterson told a House Appropriations subcommittee.

With more than 4 million workplaces to inspect, Peterson urged, the Labor Dept. should have at least 1,000 trained safety officers.

He asked the House panel to approve an additional $10 million to bring the department's safety force up to that level.

"Only with a force of this size can a compliance program be started which will give this Act some meaning to the millions of Americans who have for so long been exposed to every kind of safety and health hazard on the job," Peterson said.

The AFL-CIO testimony also urged full funding for the new Institute for Occupational Safety & Health in the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare budget, and for the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission which will review contested citations under the law.

The $300,000 requested for the commission should be "at least doubled in order to acquire the necessary number of hearing examiners and backup personnel required to assure swift and orderly adjudication of the inevitable file of contested citations," the witness said.

In a supplement to the testimony, the AFL-CIO also urged increases in a number of other programs.

It asked funds for a 10 percent rise in the investigative staff of the Workplace Standards Administration, which administers the Fair Labor Standards Act and an assortment of other laws including the ban on age discrimination, garnishment provisions of the Consumer Credit Protection Act, the Service Contracts, Walsh-Healey and Davis-Bacon Acts.

Because of staff shortages, there was a backlog of 8,500 wage-hour complaints at the start of 1971, the AFL-CIO noted. Nearly four times the cost of enforcement has been recovered in back wages due workers, the statement emphasized.

Another section urged substantial increases to modernize and upgrade Public Health Service hospitals so that they can better serve their communities. It expressed labor's concern over the Administration's attempt to close down these hospitals and said the goal instead should be to put them to better use.

Air Base Workers Vote for AFGE

San Antonio, Tex.—White collar employes at Kelly Air Force Base voted in favor of exclusive recognition rights for the Government Employes in an election under Executive Order 11491, the presidential directive on labor-management relations among federal employes.

The vote was AFGE 3,097, no union 2,160, in a unit of 8,562 employes.

A local organizing committee and seven AFGE organizers were aided by AFL-CIO Regional Director Nicholas Kurko and two staff members. The election victory brings AFGE-represented workers at Kelly AFB to nearly 20,000, AFGE Organizing Director W. J. Smith said.

In the past year, AFGE has won 129 elections for 83,365 workers, the union reported.

Union Representatives Join United Fund Staffs

Three new AFL-CIO Community Services representatives have been added to the staffs of local United funds, CSA Director Leo Perlis announced. This brings the total to 180 AFL-CIO-CSA staff members in 140 industrial communities.

New representatives include Alfred Boandl in Allentown, Pa., Harold Terry in Brockton, Mass. and Barbara Miller, Houston. In addition, agreement has been reached for a full-time representative on the United Fund staff in Las Vegas.

NLRB Slaps Stevens Firm For 12th Time

The National Labor Relations Board found J. P. Stevens & Co. guilty of federal labor law violations for the 12th time in four years.

A three-member panel held the company discriminated against two members of the Textile Workers Union of America at the Stevens plant in Statesboro, Ga., because of union membership or activity. The company was ordered to stop its unlawful practices and to read to employes the text of an appendix to an NLRB order "during work time, by departments and shifts."

Also the company must mail a copy of the order to each Statesboro employe, give the union "reasonable access" to company bulletin boards and provide a name-and-address list of employes within one year.

The board, however, turned down requests by TWUA that the order be extended to all Stevens plants in North and South Carolina and Georgia; that the company give the union a list of all employes with their classifications, wage rates and length of employment; and make whole the employes for benefits denied them because of the company's unfair practices.

In the latest case, Stevens was found guilty of unlawfully reducing overtime work of one union supporter and denying a wage increase or promotion to another union adherent. It was ordered to give one employe his lost overtime, and the other a 12-cent hourly wage hike retroactive to Feb. 23, 1970, plus 6 percent interest in both cases.

Unions Seek $2 Pay Floor For Canada

Ottawa—The Canadian Labor Congress has called on Parliament to increase the national minimum wage to $2 an hour effective July 1 and to $2.50 Jan. 1, 1972.

The CLC said a proposed bill to raise the wage floor to $1.75 an hour is inadequate and would be of little help to Canada's "working poor." The present minimum is $1.65.

Workers who are paid only the bare minimum wage are unable to earn more than a subsistance living for themselves and their families—even when they can find work for the entire year, the CLC said.

Other improvements sought by the CLC for the Labor Standards Act include provisions for equal pay for equal work regardless of sex, better maternity leave provisions, changes in requirements on termination notices and severance pay, and other protections.

Welfare Reform Bill Wins Major Test in House Vote

AN IUD PRESENTATION of a bust of the late John L. Lewis to the Smithsonian Institution's National Portrait Gallery on June 16 marked the 35th anniversary of the founding of the Steel Workers Organizing Committee. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany joins Industrial Union Dept. and Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel in inspecting the bust by sculptor Ben Goodkin which will be on permanent display in the Gallery's Sculpture court.

Labor Backs New Plan As 'Overdue'

The House voted to put a federal floor under welfare benefits and to guarantee a minimum family income to the nation's working poor.

It sent the welfare reform plan to the Senate as part of a legislative package that includes higher social security benefits and changes in the Medicare and Medicaid programs.

The key vote in the House was the 234-187 defeat of a motion to kill the entire family assistance program, the welfare reform section of the bill.

Under House rules, the section could not be amended. It had to be either approved intact or rejected.

The AFL-CIO took a strong stand for passage of the legislation intact.

It has "some defects," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller wrote to congressmen before the vote. "We will urge the Senate to make improvements."

But, he stressed, "welfare reform is long overdue." And the legislation should be passed "as a necessary first step toward uniform eligibility and federal financing and administration of welfare."

Some House liberals disagreed. They cited "harsh" work requirements that would force mothers of young children to take job training or employment. And they joined their votes to those of the most conservative members of Congress who wanted to kill the section because it would increase the number of

Enforcement Held Key to Work Safety

By John R. Oravec

Vigorous enforcement and full funding of the Occupational Safety & Health Act emerged as the key demand of delegates to the Industrial Union Dept. safety conference.

The two-day conference brought nearly 600 union safety specialists from 35 states to Washington. They were sent by AFL-CIO affiliates and a number of state and local central bodies.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the conference that "no law is going to save a single life or prevent a single accident . . . until the intent of Congress is translated into action in the shop and on the job."

When the law was passed, Meany recalled, "the AFL-CIO served notice that we were going to be watching over the government's shoulder to see that it doesn't get watered down, and that it doesn't wither away because of neglect or financial starvation."

Meany warned that proper enforcement of the law will be impossible if the Labor Dept. does not recruit and train enough inspectors or increase its budget for the administration of the law.

He also warned that the Labor Dept. must not rely on states to enforce the job safety and health standards.

"There can be no waiting to see what the states do to amend their laws to assume jurisdiction by providing equal or better protection—as they may or may not eventually do under the act," Meany said. "America has already waited too long for the states to take action."

IUD Pres. I. W. Abel, in his opening address to the conference, said that labor is not going to pay any environmental blackmail nor is it going to "succumb to threats that meeting safety and health standards will mean a loss of jobs."

He said jobs do not have to be lost to cleaning up the environment, stressing that "we can have both together—jobs and a clean environment."

Employers who are insensible to the welfare of their workers, and those "who insist that people must work under hazardous or disease-laden conditions, must be forced to change their attitude," Abel stressed.

Conference chairman Peter Bommarito, president of the Rubber Workers, said the "complacent attitude of industry to correct safety and health hazards in the plant will no longer be tolerated."

Highest Rise in 15 Months:

Hope of Inflation Slowdown Jarred by Surging Prices

By Tom Castor

The Consumer Price Index shot up six-tenths of 1 percent in May, the sharpest increase in 15 months, puncturing hopes that the rate of inflation had slowed down.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that higher prices for apparel, used cars, homes and postage—an increase from 6 to 8 cents for first class mail—accounted for most of the increase.

Prices actually rose five-tenths of 1 percent during the month, but the seasonally adjusted formula used by the government pushed the rate higher.

The May increase brought the index to 120.8 percent of the 1967 average, meaning that the same goods and services that cost $10 in 1967, now cost the consumer $12.08.

Federation Pres. George Meany termed the sharp increase in living costs further proof that Pres. Nixon's economic policies "add up to a miserable failure."

"The Nixon Administration stubbornly refuses to see the light and take action to correct the economy," Meany told delegates to the Seafarers convention.

Commerce Sec. Maurice Stans had addressed the same group hours before the May CPI figures were released. He told delegates that the Administration had brought inflation within "controllable boundaries."

But after the BLS released the statistics, a White House spokesman said last month's sharp increase was neither unexpected, nor conclusive.

The following day, the Administration pointed to increases in earnings, noting that May was the fifth consecutive month in which earnings showed an increase over year-ago figures.

Real spendable earnings—weekly take-home pay expressed in terms of 1967 dollars on which the CPI is based—amounted to $91.13 for the average worker with three dependents.

This was an increase of 47 cents, or five-tenths of 1 percent, over April. Real spendable earnings were 1.6 percent higher than in May 1970, but still 1.9 percent less than the all-time high reached in September 1968.

Over-the-month increases occurred for workers in all major industries except services.

Weekly take-home pay advanced $1.11 during May to $110.08. Compared with a year ago, take-home pay was up $6.31, or 6.1 percent.

If the May rate of increase in the CPI should persist—which the White House feels is unlikely—it would mean an annual inflation rate of 7.2 percent.

With gains of only three-tenths of 1 percent in March and April, and smaller gains in the first two months of the year, the CPI had been running at a quarterly rate of 2.8 percent.

4 Million Youths Join Race for Scarce Jobs

An additional 4 million young people in the 16-24 age range will be in the labor force next month as compared to April levels, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The annual influx of students and graduates into the labor market comes this year in the face of a national unemployment rate of 6.2 percent with the most severe joblessness among teenagers.

The BLS reported the May unemployment rate for those in the 16-19 age group as 17.3 percent, and for the 20-24 age group as 11.1 percent.

The BLS forecast that in July, the civilian labor force will include 21.6 million persons aged 16-24—an increase of 1 million young job seekers over July 1970 when unemployment in this group was considerably less.

The bureau estimated that it will take an additional 3.1 million jobs in the April-July period for there to be any reduction in the seasonally adjusted unemployment rates in the 16-24 age group.

Students entering the labor force for summer jobs will account for about two-thirds, or 2.7 million, of the overall increase, the BLS said.

The remaining 1.3 million will be high school and college graduates moving into the labor force this summer on a permanent basis.

Public Service Program Gets Conference OK

A public service jobs bill that ranks high on labor's priority list was cleared for final congressional approval with the unanimous support of both Democratic and Republican members of a House-Senate conference committee.

It would authorize federal funds over the next two years to enable cities, counties and states to hire an estimated 150,000 jobless workers.

They would receive the same pay, benefits and working conditions as other public workers in comparable jobs—and in no case less than the minimum wage.

Pres. Nixon vetoed a smaller-scaled bill last year and the Administration dropped veto threats

Rail Aid Plan Proposed by Study Panels

Railroad labor and management agreed after a year's study that the federal government should help the nation's rail carriers survive through grants of federal funds for roadbed maintenance and for research.

Two task forces of union and management leaders recommended establishment by the federal government of an "interstate railway transportation trust fund" for track and roadway improvements and maintenance, with money allocated also to research "in a manner similar to that of the Highway Trust Fund."

Other funding recommendations included creation of a $1 billion loan "pool" of Railroad Retirement Board funds for the carriers under government guarantee, at an interest rate higher by one-half percent than the prime loan rate, for "specific improvements to facilities and services."

The task force on right-of-way concluded that, since increases are needed in the annual track and tie work on railroads, and because of the industry's "obvious inability to pay for such increases," a wide variety of financial aids is needed.

The task force on freight movements into terminals agreed to a year's experiment at the East St. Louis, Ill., terminal. Members learned that slow terminal operations contribute to the movement of box cars at an average of 4.4 days instead of the expected three days from shipping point to receiving point.

The conferees will meet again within 60 days to consider the next step, according to George E. Leighty of the Congress of Railway Unions. Other union participants are:

Presidents C. L. Dennis of the Railway Clerks, Charles Luna of the United Transportation Union, and Harold C. Crotty of the Maintenance of Way brotherhood; Vice Pres. O. W. Jacobson of the Railway Carmen; Research Director V. F. Davis of the Locomotive Engineers; Pres. J. E. Yost of the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes Dept.; J. E. Burke, D. W. Collins and W. W. Carson of the UTU; John Palloni of the Waymen, A. R. Lowry and F. T. Lynch of BRAC.

Engineers Win Vote At Norfolk Shipyard

Norfolk, Va.—The Technical Engineers and the Tidewater Federal Employes Metal Trades Council retained bargaining rights in an election among planners, estimators, progressmen and schedulers at the Norfolk Naval Shipyard.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization reported the vote as 124 for the council, 68 for an unaffiliated association and 5 for no union. AFTE Local 35, a council affiliate, represents the technical group.

CWA Gives $100,000 To Telegraph Strikers

A gift of $100,000 towards the relief of 17,000 members of the Telegraph Workers on strike against Western Union was announced by the Communications Workers as a measure of solidarity and support.

"We're in this together," said CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne in presenting a check to Telegraph Workers' Pres. E. L. Hageman at CWA headquarters. Some 3,000 of Beirne's members, too, are on strike against Western Union in New York and New Jersey.

The unions have maintained picket lines at telegraph offices across the country since June 1. Management still refuses to budge from an offer made before the walkout started, union negotiators reported after meetings called by federal mediators.

CWA members will continue to draw strike benefits through regular union channels, that union said.

As the strike ended its fourth week, UTW members began making personal visits to some of Western Union's best customers—senators and congressmen, to tell the strike story in their own words.

The United Telegraph Workers, in newspaper advertisements published in New York, Washington and 18 other cities, told why its members are striking and said they will stay on strike "until management sees the light—on wages, on secure pensions, on job security."

Further, the union said, "we're determined to get assurance from Western Union that the company will halt its plan to give many of our jobs away to unqualified 'agents'—taxi companies, laundries, service stations and others."

Western Union Corp. Pres. R. W. McFall reported recently to stockholders that 1970 earnings had reached a new high—total income nearly $400 million, profits up to $23.4 million. In addition, Western Union is putting $130 million a year into capital expenditures, the UTW said.

The union ads emphasized:

- The number of employes goes down year by year—nearly 2,000 fewer in 1970 than in 1969.
- The ratio of salaries, wages, pensions and other benefits keeps dropping every year in relation to revenues—63 percent in 1961, 50 percent last year.

"Western Union is making more money," the ads declare. "It's putting more money into computers and equipment. But it's cutting down on service to the public and holding out on decent wages, benefits, job security and secure pensions."

At Washington Convention:

Seafarers Hit Nixon On Shipping Policies

Delegates to the 15th biennial convention of the Seafarers vowed to oppose the Nixon Administration's proposed strike ban in the transportation industry, denounced Nixon's suspension of the 50-50 grain cargo rule and mapped strategy for full implementation of the Merchant Marine Act of 1970.

The 200 delegates meeting in Washington backed up Pres. Paul Hall's denunciation of the Administration's attempt to get a special law banning strikes in the transportation industry.

"The government already has massive machinery to deal with strikes which it feels affect the national health and safety," Hall said. "The existing law can be applied in any labor dispute—although the record makes it abundantly clear that the 'national emergency' disputes procedure has been invoked against transportation unions more often than against anyone else."

Since such legislation is on the books now, his statement said, it has made "many management representatives unrealistically stubborn at the bargaining table."

The Administration proposal would give the President a choice of methods to end transportation strikes, including a form of compulsory arbitration.

Hall, who also serves as president of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. told delegates that the maritime unions are "obviously going to struggle against the Administration attempts to allow grain to be shipped to China in foreign-flag vessels."

Pres. Nixon suspended an executive order issued during the Kennedy Administration which required that 50 percent of all U.S. grain shipments to Communist nations must be carried in American vessels.

The suspension brought an immediate rejoinder from organized labor, and Hall told delegates that "tactics are being developed and will be developed further." He declined, however, to reveal any strategy and the convention was at work on a resolution dealing with the situation.

Delegates applauded AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany when he pledged the backing of the AFL-CIO on whatever course of action the maritime unions take.

"I don't know what the reaction of the maritime trades is going to be," said Meany. "We don't make decisions for our organizations. They make them for themselves.

"But whatever the reaction is, I can tell you here and now, it will have the backing of the AFL-CIO."

Delegates accepted an Executive Officers' Report submitted by Hall in which the importance of full funding and implementation of the Merchant Marine Act was spelled out.

The new law calls for the building of 300 new American vessels in the next 10 years to rejuvenate the American merchant marine fleet, which has slipped to fifth largest among the merchant navies of the world.

In 1946, it was number one.

The Merchant Marine Act would mean more jobs, both in building and manning ships.

"We can be proud of the role we played in this historic legislation," said the report. "We must now work to make this legislative mandate a reality."

Idaho Unions Approve Hike In Per Capita

Boise, Ida.— Delegates to the Idaho AFL-CIO's 1971 convention unanimously approved an increase in per capita payments from 25 to 30 cents and re-elected Pres. Robert W. Macfarlane by acclamation.

Sec.-Treas. J. Paul Mais also was re-elected along with Vice Pres. Edward Johnson and three members of the state federation's executive board—Thomas Payne, Harold Charlton and Verl Bitter.

New members of the board are Robert Denevan, Irvin Harlow and Larry Harris.

The increase in per capita was earmarked for a legislative fund to support the state federation's activities during the 1972 state elections.

Besides the per capita increase, the 133 voting delegates also approved a constitutional change on convention rules which is expected to make the annual session run smoother procedurally.

The convention adopted resolutions in support of National Health Insurance and improved social security and unemployment compensation benefits.

The resolution on health insurance called on Congress to enact necessary legislation this year so that the plan can go into effect in 1973.

The convention's social security resolution urged maximum benefits for all workers contributing to social security since 1937—regardless of income levels.

CONVENTION

The Hatters will hold their 14th triennial convention Oct. 14 in the Statler Hilton Hotel in New York City, the union executive board announced.

Aid Sought for Seized U.S. Fishing Vessels

A proposal to speed up reimbursement for ship owners whose fishing vessels are illegally seized and fined by foreign countries received the support of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

O. William Moody, administrator of the MTD, testified in support of the proposed legislation before the House subcommittee on Wildlife & Fisheries.

He spoke on behalf of the MTD as well as his own union, the Seafarers, which represents fishermen through the United Cannery & Industrial Workers.

"It is these fishermen who have been harassed, shot at and who have had their livelihood threatened by the irresponsible seizures of our fishing boats in what should be international waters," Moody told the subcommittee.

Ten Latin American countries have claimed sovereignty over waters 200 miles from their shores, and Ecuador has been enforcing the claim by seizing tuna boats and imposing fines averaging $50,000 on the owners.

The Fishermen's Protective Act already provides for reimbursement of illegal fines. But because of Administrative delays, largely in the State Dept., some owners have had to wait up to eight months for their money, Moody said.

The proposal now under consideration would establish a revolving Fishermen's Protective Fund from which the Secretary of the Treasury would promptly reimburse shipowners for fines improperly assessed by foreign countries.

During the hearings, Ned Everett, chief counsel of the subcommittee, revealed that Ecuador has been using U.S.-made gunboats to seize the tuna vessels illegally.

Moody criticized the government's failure to invoke the Military Sales Act which stipulates cancellation of sales to any country that seizes American vessels on the high seas.

And he called for additional measures such as deducting the amounts of "these extortionate fines from foreign aid we give to the offending nations" as provided in the Fishermen's Protective Act.

He told the congressmen that from Jan. 1 to the end of March, fines amounting to $1.3 million have been levied against American fishing ships.

Bank Reform Endorsed To Curb Money Monopoly

Passage of bank reform legislation is needed "to halt the trend toward economic concentration of power," the AFL-CIO said in a letter to Chairman Wright Patman (D-Tex.) of the House Banking Committee.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said the bill before the committee would help eliminate conflict of interest and "bolster confidence" in the banking system.

Especially desirable, he said, are provisions barring interlocking directorships, prohibiting banks from demanding an equity in a business before extending credit, and restrictions on bank investments.

One byproduct, he added, would be greater safety for pension funds for workers.

Program Set for July 12-13:

Parley to Focus On Loss of Jobs

Labor's national conference dealing with loss of jobs in America will be "one of the most important ever held by the AFL-CIO," Federation Pres. George Meany said in announcing the program for the two-day meeting.

The Conference on Jobs is scheduled for July 12-13 at the Statler-Hilton Hotel in Washington, and will deal with all aspects of the job loss problem—from foreign trade to aid for the unemployed worker.

Meany will deliver a keynote address at the opening session, followed immediately by House Speaker Carl Albert.

Five AFL-CIO vice presidents will deliver papers on the current situation, and that will be followed by discussion groups headed by federation vice presidents and including leading members of Congress.

The conference will conclude the following morning with Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland serving as chairman of the session.

Group discussion chairmen will make reports followed by floor discussion, and Meany will deliver a summation.

AFL-CIO vice presidents delivering papers during the conference and their subjects are:

I. W. Abel, president of the Steelworkers, foreign trade; Floyd E. Smith, president of the Machinists, reconversion; S. Frank Raftery, president of the Painters, public works; Jerry Wurf, president of the State, County & Municipal Employes, public service employment, and James A. Suffridge, president-emeritus of the Retail Clerks, immediate aid for the unemployed.

The discussion groups, with their chairman, and panel members are:

- Foreign Trade—Paul Jennings, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, chairman, with Representatives John W. Byrnes (R-Wis.) and James A. Burke (D-Mass.).
- Reconversion—Joseph D. Keenan, secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, chairman, with Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.).
- Public Works—Hunter P. Wharton, president of the Operating Engineers, chairman, with Rep. John A. Blatnik (D-Minn.).
- Public Service Employment—Matthew Guinan, president of the Transport Workers, chairman, with Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.).
- Immediate Aid for the Unemployed—Peter Bommarito, president of the Rubber Workers, chairman, with Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.).

Contract Goals In Flint Glass Set at Parley

Miami Beach—The Flint Glass Workers will demand "the largest wage and benefit increase" in the union's 93-year history when it opens contract negotiations with the glass industry next month, Pres. George M. Parker said at the close of its 88th convention here.

Negotiations with the Glass Container Manufacturers' Institute, representing 12 major glass industry companies employing union mold makers, will begin here July 7.

Contract talks will be conducted later with the Illuminating & Allied Glassware Manufacturers, Table & Art Glassware Manufacturers and Corning Glass Works.

The 370 delegates to the two-week convention re-elected all incumbent officers. In addition, Joseph Lewis, of Bellaire, Ohio, and Philip Girardi, of Vineland, N.J., were elected international representatives to fill vacancies caused by two deaths in 1970.

Constitutional changes were made by the delegates, including a provision barring international officers from seeking re-election following their 64th birthday.

Such officers, however, would be allowed to continue as "special assistants to the president" until they reach retirement at age 65.

Laborers Approve Pacts To Spur Housing, Jobs

The Laborers signed agreements with four major industrial housing manufacturers in a move to increase the supply of low-cost housing and to improve job opportunities for members of minority groups.

The contracts were signed at the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development by the union and C. W. Blakeslee & Sons of New Haven, Conn., a subsidiary of the Westinghouse Electric Corp.; Anvan Industries of Glen Ellyn, Ill.; Stylemaster Homes of Lansing, Mich.; and the First Behring Corp. of Ft. Lauderdale, Fla.

HUD Sec. George W. Romney, on hand for the signing ceremony, praised the union and the companies for their efforts toward stabilizing the industry and toward training minority workers for employment in factory construction.

The union-employer agreements provide for on-the-job training, for employer participation in the Laborers' National Industrial Pension Plan and the Laborers' Union Label Program. Strikes and lockouts are prohibited during the life of the agreement. Wages, hours and fringe benefits will be negotiated locally.

Romney said the signing of the agreement was a major step in the drive to provide volume-produced housing to relieve the country's housing shortage. Congress set a 10-year goal in 1968 for 26 million new housing units to overcome the shortage. Less than half the amount needed is being built annually.

Pres. Peter Fosco of the Laborers said his union has a direct interest in encouraging new technology in the housing field. "A high percentage of our members are from minority groups who suffer the most from the lack of adequate and decent housing in our inner cities," he noted.

The union has pension investments and commitments this year totaling $6 million in the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust Fund, which was set up to help finance construction of housing for lower- and moderate-income families.

"We are using construction industry pension resources to provide necessary housing and steady work opportunities for our members," Fosco stressed.

UNION MEMBERS must be educated to the rights and provisions of the Occupational Safety & Health Act if safe working conditions are to be gained, Pres. I. W. Abel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. tells delegates to the IUD job safety conference in Washington.

IUD Safety Conference Spells Out Need to Finance, Enforce New Law

"We will work within the framework of the law," Bommarito assured the delegates, "utilizing every provision to its fullest extent."

He told the union safety specialists that they must know and understand the provisions of the law in order to protect the right of workers to safe and healthy conditions on the job.

Bommarito also called on the Occupational Safety & Health Administration—the Labor Dept. agency that has the job of implementing and enforcing the law—to recruit compliance officers from the ranks of labor.

He pointed out that those who are working in the midst of hazardous conditions are eminently qualified to carry out the enforcement.

And while more than 5,000 labor representatives have applied to OSHA for positions on the compliance force, Bommarito said there is none known to have been accepted.

Eugene Newman, acting director of the OSHA Office of Compliance, admitted that there are "very few" labor people on his staff, but promised that efforts would be made to take in labor representatives.

Newman reported that OSHA is continuing its training of compliance officers and expects to have 735 on duty by the end of June 30. He said while 235 of these officers would be based in Washington, the remainder would be operating in field and regional offices across the country.

The compliance force is expected to grow to 1,000 officers by the end of this year and each officer would be capable of inspecting 200 workplaces annually.

While this number of officers could theoretically inspect 200,000 plants and job sites, the act was established to cover 4.1 million workplaces. This means that 3.9 million workplaces would be missed by the inspectors.

AFL-CIO job safety specialist George H. R. Taylor warned that little protection could be afforded by the states because of their limited number of inspectors.

Taylor pointed out that most states have many more fish and game wardens than they do occupational safety officers, thereby offering better protection for trout and rabbits than for workers.

Currently no state can meet the federal standards on job safety, Taylor observed, including New York and California, which are regarded as having the best state standards in effect.

The possibility of states improving the safety laws to conform to federal standards in the near future is slim, he said, noting that the legislatures of 32 states will not meet again until 1972 and 18 others will convene in 1973.

Other speakers at the conference included Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.), who led the House fight for the passage of the law; Sen. Richard S. Schweiker (R-Pa.) a member of the Senate Labor Committee; Dr. Marcus Key of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and acting director of the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health, Dr. Irving Selikoff of the Mt. Sinai School of Medicine and Dr. Bertram Carnow of the University of Illinois School of Medicine.

Little Litter Fighters Set Clean Up Goal

Labor's campaign to improve the environment and its support of the Keep America Beautiful anti-litter campaign got a boost from some fifth and sixth graders in small Churchville, N.Y.

The elementary schoolers have sent out 1,000 letters asking all citizens to pick up 25 pieces of litter during the summer of 1971 so that there can be "a cleaner environment for all."

The AFL-CIO is glad to "help spread the word," as the children's letter asked.

Rubber Workers Sign Plan for Health Study

The Rubber Workers and B. F. Goodrich Co. have set in motion a pioneering occupational health program and have contracted with Harvard University's School of Public Health to conduct studies in nine plants where 11,000 union members work.

Teams of health specialists will study on-the-job environment health problems at each plant and draw up long-range programs based on the findings. The Harvard researchers will also assist in developing occupational health standards and controls of new chemicals and manufacturing processes.

The contract for the program was signed in Washington by representatives of the Rubber Workers, Goodrich and Harvard at the close of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.'s Occupational Safety & Health Conference.

The URW-Goodrich program is a follow-up to an agreement negotiated by the union last year with Goodrich and other major tire and rubber companies, URW Pres. Peter Bommarito said.

The companies pay one-half cent an hour for each worker into the joint occupational health fund. The cost of the Harvard studies will come out of the Goodrich contribution to the fund.

Signing the three-way agreement at the Washington conference were Bommarito; J. W. Reynolds, Goodrich industrial relations director, and Dr. James Whittenberger, associate dean of Harvard's School of Public Health.

The contract calls for Harvard to organize an Occupational Research Study Group, name a group director and begin the studies promptly.

Whittenberger called the tripartite contract "a landmark agreement." He said that until now, industrial epidemiological studies—research in diseases affecting a large number of persons—have been rare.

In a joint statement, Bommarito and Reynolds said:

"Both the union and the company have concern for the protection and preservation of the health and welfare of employes. By establishing this program, we have recognized that a firm and continuous commitment to a sound industrial health program is in the best interests of the employe, the company and society."

"We in the URW," Bommarito added, "have long been committed to the development of a sound and coordinated action program in the area of occupational health. Our prime objective has been to make the working environment, where the industrial worker spends a major portion of his adult life, as healthy as medical and scientific knowledge will accommodate."

Bommarito also expressed the hope that the URW-Goodrich agreement will set the pattern for similar programs covering millions of other industrial workers across the country.

Production and maintenance workers at six tire plants and three others making industrial and general products are covered in the agreement.

Policing Job Safety

NO LAW is going to save a single life or prevent a single accident in the future until the intent of Congress is translated into action in the shop and on the job.

And before that happens, labor has some more tough battles to fight.

At the time the Occupational Safety & Health Act was passed, the AFL-CIO served notice that we were going to be watching over the government's shoulder to see that it doesn't get watered down, and that it doesn't wither away because of neglect or financial starvation.

We warned that if this law isn't fully and effectively implemented, we would scream bloody murder. Because bloody murder—the bloody murder of workers—is the issue. It's what this law is supposed to stop.

Overall, we believe, the Dept. of Labor is taking its task seriously. It has made the necessary assignments of responsibility within the department's administrative structure. It is setting up the machinery it needs to start work. It is hiring and training inspectors.

THERE ARE SOME DOUBTS and reservations about the way the Dept. of Labor is going about its job of making the Safety & Health Act work. We believe there is room for improvement, and we expect and hope to see improvements made.

But the record made by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare toward meeting its share of administering the Safety & Health Act is much, much worse.

The Secretary of HEW hasn't established for operations the new Institute for Occupational Health, which has crucially important work to do. The institute is responsible for research, demonstrations, safety, training, development of criteria, recommendation of standards, and monitoring, measuring and publishing a list of toxic materials found in America's work places. But the Secretary hasn't even officially designated where the institute is to be physically located. There is no excuse for such delay by the Secretary of HEW.

The President has appointed the three-man Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission, which will be responsible for adjudicating all contested citations for violations under the act.

The AFL-CIO opposed the creation of that commission, because we believe its authority should have remained within the Dept. of Labor. But Congress ruled otherwise. We are completely dissatisfied with the $300,000 budgeted for the commission's activities over the next year. The figure should be at least doubled to provide for the number of hearing examiners and other staff members that are going to be needed if the commission is going to be anything but a bottleneck.

We are going to keep on pressing both HEW and the Labor Dept. to see that this law is implemented in every respect as Congress intended, and as American workers deserve.

But the ultimate responsibility lies on us here in labor. This is our law, and we have to see that it works. We intend to work closely with all of our international unions in developing and carrying out safety programs.

A Word Edgewise:

Dispute on Vietnam Escalation Enlivened by 20-20 Hindsight

By John P. Roche

IN RETROSPECT, it is seldom hard to construct conspiracy theories of history. For many years, distinguished southern historians, for example, worked diligently to demonstrate that Pres. Lincoln had deliberately tricked the South into the Civil War, that after the innocent Confederates fired on Fort Sumter, Lincoln rubbed his hands with glee and used the incident to justify mobilizing Union troops. Similarly, Franklin D. Roosevelt was attacked in immense detail by so distinguished an American historian as Charles A. Beard for instigating the Japanese assault on Pearl Harbor.

These studies had a lunatic logic—indeed, I found rereading the classic on Lincoln a hypnotic experience—but they suffer from one overwhelming liability: they are not true.

Lincoln did not want war. Roosevelt did want war, but with the Nazis, not the Japanese. In fact, if Hitler had not gone completely off his rails and declared war on the United States, we might well have gone roaring off into the Pacific in 1942 and left Europe to its fate.

So let us, as we read the memos floating back and forth between Assistant Secretaries, ask the simple question: Why would Lyndon Johnson have wanted to get mixed up in war in Indochina? He was well aware of the unpopularity of wars, he recalled vividly the treatment Harry Truman had received over our Korean intervention, he wanted above all to get down to the serious business of the Great Society.

The Joint Chiefs are paid to plan for wars. They have over at the Pentagon an immense welfare program (Aid to Dependent Colonels, I call it) dedicated to contingency planning. (Back in the 1930s they spent a couple of years deciding how to cope with a combined attack by the British and the Japanese.) You name a country, they have a man on it equipped with detailed maps, target analysis, etc. Obviously a good deal of this is necessary in our uncertain world, but the important thing to note is that most contingencies never occur.

Presidents, on the contrary, are paid to keep us out of wars whenever that is conceivably possible. And while Pres. Johnson, like his predecessors, was committed to containing Communist aggression (whether monolithic or polycentric), the first item on his agenda was how to do this and avoid war.

Viewed from this perspective, Step Number One was deterrence, that is, letting the enemy know that if it did certain things, it would get hurt. When deterrence works, nobody cheers. (It has worked, notably with NATO and with Red China.) It hardly took a task force to devise the Tonkin Gulf Resolution; it was simply a rewrite of the one passed by Congress in 1958 on the Formosa Straits, which worked.

Unfortunately, as suggested here before, Ho Chi Minh was not impressed. So the next step was to raise the ante, employing a minimal force level to indicate that we meant business.

ENTER THE AIRPOWER spokesmen. Now whatever the Assistant Secretaries may have written to each other, and despite the optimism of the "Air Marshals" (as those of us who distrusted the policy called them), bombing North Vietnam was seen as a way of avoiding war.

Hanoi, it was argued, would appreciate the seriousness of the American commitment to the Republic of Vietnam, calculate that the stakes were too high, and call off its "liberation" movement.

There is no need to detail the rest of the gloomy progression. Johnson ended up with more than 500,000 men in Vietnam, and a full-scale land war, by opting at each stage for the least-worst alternative. With retrospective omniscience—which is a widespread malady these days—one can argue that he should have gotten off the escalator in 1964 or '65.

But history is a very different thing when you are approaching it head-on, rather than with 20-20 hindsight. And one could (as I do) suggest that—without getting into disputes on how the war was fought—the President's reluctant decisions were a natural and legitimate consequence of the American people's then staunch commitment to freedom for South Vietnam.

Labor and Civil Liberties:

Phone Taps, Lie Detectors Held Incursion on Basic Freedoms

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany on June 16 in Washington at the People's Forum on Privacy.

ORGANIZED LABOR is active in the political and industrial life of this nation. We do not simply sit back and brood about the invasions of a basic right. We attempt, with all the vigor at our command, to do what we can to blunt the efforts of those who would invade our freedom. In pursuit of this objective the labor movement has emphasized these principal issues.

First, we have sought legislation to arrest the movement toward increased wiretapping and bugging.

One of the aspects of totalitarian government which renders it so abhorrent to Americans is its all-persuasive policy on the question of the right of privacy or the destruction of the right of privacy. And this consideration to our mind outweighs the public interest in law enforcement through indiscriminate wiretapping. This seems especially clear since opinions differ as to the utility of wiretapping as an instrument for detecting crime.

Even assuming, however, that wiretapping does substantially aid in police work, we remain persuaded that, in general, the preservation of individual freedom should have priority over easing police work. That is a basic value judgment, and I recognize that our conclusion with respect to it differs from the conclusion reached by some, though not all, law enforcement officials. But it is not surprising, nor novel, that some law enforcement officials have a tendency to put law enforcement ahead of individual rights. In general, however, this reverses the proper priorities.

There can, of course, be overriding considerations which tip the balance the other way on specific issues. Recognizing this we do accept the necessity of some invasion of the right of individuals to be free from police scrutiny, to the extent that the infringement is reasonably necessary in the interests of national security.

Second, organized labor has been the major responsible anti-Communist organization which has fought to bring our internal security system in line with a decent regard for the right of privacy, and its corollary, the right of free and untrammeled association.

The AFL-CIO, of course, believes that the United States government must and should fully protect itself against Communist aggression and treachery, both from without and from within. The strength of America's military forces, and those of its allies, must be maintained. The AFL-CIO likewise supports vigilant counter-intelligence work, vigorous enforcement of the criminal laws, and an effective security system.

But we flatly reject the notion that the way to fight communism is to jettison the individual liberties that are an essential part of democracy, and to adopt the very tactics which make communism completely unacceptable to those who believe in human freedom. We do not believe communism can be defeated or democracy aided by suspending the Bill of Rights and the Fourteenth Amendment. We do not believe that communism can be defeated or democracy aided by undertaking to outlaw particular views and ideas, whether by governmental fiat or vigilante action.

The AFL-CIO has therefore opposed, and will continue to oppose proposals to reinstate the discredited internal security programs affecting non-sensitive jobs in government struck down by the Supreme Court. For the national security is not protected by the harassment of many millions of government workers engaged in activities far removed from the handling of classified information. And organized labor has opposed and will continue to oppose procedures which make a mockery of our professed dedication to the due process of law.

Third, the AFL-CIO has mounted a nationwide attack on the misuse of the polygraph or so-called "lie detector." In announcing this campaign, the Executive Council stated "we object to the use of these devices not only because their claims to reliability are dubious, but because they infringe on the fundamental rights of American citizens to personal privacy."

THIS EFFORT on our part has led—among other pluses—to quite a few collective agreements doing away with this 20th Century form of the "yellow dog contract"—the requirement that employes undergo a lie detector test whenever management tells them that they have to do so.

There are, naturally enough, those who justify the use of lie detectors on the grounds of security, prevention of pilferage, and the ever-present quest for "efficiency." Our response in this area is the same as our response to the defenders of wiretapping; not one of these goals—important though they may be—outweighs the right of individual privacy of mind and body. For the use of these devices is a clear perversion of the basic concept of American law that the individual is presumed innocent until proven guilty. A lie detector makes a mockery of the Fifth Amendment.

It can be said with perfect justification that the labor movement has not secured 100 percent compliance with any of its goals in these fields. And that while we have pursued these goals through the tedious process of education, persuasion, lobbying and collective bargaining, new breaches in the dike continue to appear. However, I am not pessimistic about this. The problem of the proper accommodation of privacy to other valid interests is a complex one. And as Judge Learned Hand stated: our system "presupposes that right conclusions are more likely to be gathered out of a multitude of tongues than through any kind of authoritative selection. To many this is, and always will be, folly; but we have upon it staked our all."

Shift in Trade Policy Needed:

500,000 U.S. Jobs Wiped Out By Runaway Manufacturers

MANIPULATION and exploitation of American capital and technology overseas have "displaced large portions of U.S. production" and cut more than half a million jobs from this country's economy, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger charged.

The U.S. consumer market has become largely a one-way route in world trade, declared Goldfinger, with trade doors open to a "flood of imports," while goods produced here are "hampered and barred" in the export market "by the policies of foreign governments."

He said that since World War II, "American business has set up something like 8,000 foreign subsidiaries," mostly to take advantage of wages that run as low as 10 and 15 cents an hour, sending their products into both the U.S. market and those of other nations with which this country seeks to trade.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, the AFL-CIO research director cited recent congressional figures showing that imports now claim major portions of U.S. consumer sales ranging from automobiles and electrical appliances to glassware and clothing.

Yet Goldfinger stressed, despite overseas production at wages only a fraction of those workers here earn, U.S. consumers rarely get any benefit of lower prices.

GOLDFINGER CALLED for a "sharp change" of U.S. policy, including the end of "tax incentives and other assistance and encouragement to American businesses to set up foreign subsidiaries;" control and regulation of the export of American capital, technology and know-how; greater effort toward "development of fair labor standards . . . on wages and working conditions on products that are shipped in world trade," and establishment of "an orderly marketing mechanism—with quotas," to stem the "sharp rise of imports that are disrupting American markets."

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE OTHER DAY Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), chairman of the Senate Labor & Public Welfare Committee, rose on the floor of the Senate and made public for the first time a significant, 83-page report of the Comptroller General of the United States.

In the report, the Comptroller General disclosed the result of his findings showing that the Bureau of Mines and Dept. of Interior were critically lax in their enforcement of the Federal Coal Mine Safety Act of 1969.

Williams said that as chairman of the Senate Labor Committee he had requested the Comptroller General to review the Bureau of Mines actions and plans for implementation of the safety legislation.

The question that arose in many minds, as a result of Williams' Senate speech, centered on the Comptroller General. Who is he? What does he do? To whom is he responsible?

All these questions were answered a few days later on the floor of both the Senate and House when members rose to pay tribute to the 50th anniversary of the General Accounting Office (GAO) which is under the direction of the Comptroller General.

Through the years of mushrooming federal bureaucracy, the GAO and the Comptroller General have played vital and powerful roles but their activities have been so screened and so silent that relatively few outside of government are aware that they actually exist.

The basic function of the GAO is to assist the Congress by examining the manner in which all government departments and agencies using public funds discharge their financial, legal and management responsibilities.

The GAO and the Comptroller General are an arm of Congress, yet operate independently of it. They have been called the "watchdogs" of government and "protectors of the public purse".

Members of Congress may ask the GAO to review or study use of public funds or the agency may initiate its own investigations. The findings in need of attention by Congress or the departments and agencies are reported to them. Recommendations are made, too, on how they can carry out their programs and operations more effectively, efficiently and economically.

OVER THE YEARS the GAO has built up an extensive professional staff of almost 3,000 employes who include accountants, auditors, lawyers and a growing number of specialists in other fields. These include experts in business administration, industrial management, engineering, statistics, economics, systems analysis, automatic data processing, mathematics and public administration.

GAO has 16 field offices on the mainland U.S. and five overseas offices: Frankfurt, New Delhi, Honolulu, Saigon, and Manila.

The Comptroller General is appointed by the President for a 15-year term and must be confirmed by the Senate. The current Comptroller General, Elmer B. Staats, is only the fourth to hold the post since 1921.

As might be expected, the GAO conducts minute, on-site investigations of expenditures in foreign assistance, military and civilian operations abroad as well as domestic expenditures of concern to Congress.

By its very nature, the GAO has to be flexible, adapting to the ever-changing social, economic and technical facets of our society.

In underscoring the GAO's present and future role, one senator remarked on its 50th anniversary: "I believe that we can feel confident that it will continue to ably assist all of us in making those very necessary objective analyses and evaluations of ongoing and proposed legislative programs."

Paying tribute to the GAO were liberals and conservatives, Democrats and Republicans—all of whom rely on the "watchdog" for assistance within the complexities of the bureaucracy.

HALF A MILLION jobs have been cut from the U.S. economy by the flight of American capital and technology overseas, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger, center, charged on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Tom Joyce, left, of Newsweek magazine and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Hotel Union Focuses On Nationwide Pacts

Chicago—Delegates to the Hotel & Restaurant Employes 37th convention voted to change the traditional pattern of collective bargaining in their industry and go after the big hotel and restaurant chains on a national basis.

The 850 delegates directed their union to organize and bargain with the industry on a chainwide basis wherever possible. The union now has national contracts with Sky Chefs, serving the nation's airlines; the Racetrack Council's restaurants and with the Playboy Clubs. It also represents nearly all Hilton and Sheraton hotels, but bargains on a local basis with these organizations.

The convention re-elected Pres. Ed S. Miller and Sec.-Treas. Robert L. Diefenbach along with eleven vice presidents. All ran without opposition.

The problems of women workers and young workers got special attention from the delegates. The convention resolved to continue the union's opposition to the Equal Opportunities Amendment to the U.S. Constitution "because of its potentially destructive impact on women's labor legislation."

At the same time, it voted to expand efforts to win federal support for day care centers for children of working mothers along with equal pay and equal employment opportunities for women.

Because young workers need encouragement to take an active role in the union, the convention voted for leadership programs and training for international organizers aimed at younger members.

The convention gave stand-by authority to the union's executive council to raise per capita payments by not less than 1 cent nor more than 10 cents.

Delegates also passed resolutions calling for an immediate $2 an hour minimum wage, with an eventual rate of $2.50 an hour; a vigorous "get-out-the-vote" drive in 1972 on the local level; increased participation in community services programs to meet the emergency needs of workers; and strengthening of the Food, Drug & Cosmetics Act to protect consumers.

Citing a rise in health costs of almost 50 percent in the past decade, delegates backed the passage of the Griffiths-Kennedy bill which would provide National Health Security for every person in the country.

The present program of withdrawal of troops from Vietnam was endorsed and a resolution was passed calling on the United States to withdraw from the International Labor Organization.

U.S. Delegate Warns:

ILO Support Keyed to Role Of Defending Worker Rights

Geneva—"The American labor movement is proud of the long record of support we have given to the International Labor Organization," Rudolph Faupl, U.S. worker delegate, told the United Nations agency's annual conference here.

But the AFL-CIO representative cautioned the worker, employer and government delegates that the continued support of American labor hinged on the ILO's return to its "original role of defender of the welfare and liberties of workers all over the world."

"It is no secret that for some time the AFL-CIO has become increasingly dissatisfied with certain trends in the ILO," Faupl said. But he stressed that "at no time" has any AFL-CIO spokesman "suggested or intimated" that the United States was not "obligated to pay its annual contribution as long as our country is a member of the ILO."

The U.S. worker delegate praised conference president Pierre Waline, a French employer, for having guided the debate with a firm hand by "refusing to tolerate extraneous political discussion."

"I can only hope," Faupl continued, "that others who will sit in your chair in future years will follow your excellent example."

Faupl denounced the use of the ILO for propaganda purposes by totalitarian countries which flout the human and trade union rights it defends.

"It is these very totalitarian elements and their allies who abused the platform of this conference year after year by their unrestrained attacks on my country, other democratic countries and the free trade union movement," Faupl said.

"At the same time," he added, these totalitarian elements have sought to hamstring the ILO by voting against the budget year after year."

This year was no exception for the Soviet Union and its allies. They alone voted against the budget that the conference adopted for the years of 1972-73.

Meanwhile, the Communist countries were undergoing a severe trial in the conference's committee that annually reviews how the ILO's 121 member states observe their pledges to the organization.

Czechoslovakia was indicted for failing to live up to the ILO convention, or treaty, guaranteeing workers against discrimination on race, religious, political or other grounds in employment.

During the committee discussion Edward J. Hickey, Jr., general counsel for a number of U.S. rail unions, noted that there had been no dissenting opinion among the independent experts who had found Czechoslovakia in default.

The experts had unanimously ruled that a provision in the Czechoslovak labor code permitting a worker to be dismissed for not being a "sufficiently reliable" upholder of the Communist order contravened the convention.

Over the vehement protests of the Communist delegates Czechoslovakia was placed at the demand of the free workers on the committee's list of member states found in default of their ILO obligations.

"This is the first time in eight years that the committee has moved against a Communist state," Hickey noted.

The Soviet Union also was challenged in the committee regarding the conformity of its new labor legislation with the ILO Freedom of Association convention guaranteeing workers the right to organize in unions of their free choice.

Soviet government delegate Ivan Ivanov complained bitterly that the ILO experts were not "objective."

The issue was left hanging pending the receipt of further explanations on the new legislation demanded by the ILO experts of the Soviet Union.

Nevertheless, George H. Hildebrand, U.S. under secretary of labor, was to tell the conference that it was "gratifying" to see the review committee raise the issue of the convention's application in Communist countries.

"Freedom of association is a fundamental purpose of the ILO," Hildebrand reminded in his address during the general discussion. "The conference must not exempt any country from this review procedure," he stressed.

The ILO trend had been to bury the issue with regard to the Communist states because these countries used as a smokescreen what they called their "different economic and social systems," Hildebrand said.

Marshall Elected Head Of Michigan AFL-CIO

Grand Rapids, Mich.—Delegates to the Michigan AFL-CIO convention unanimously elected William C. Marshall to succeed August Scholle as president of the 300,000-member state federation.

Scholle announced his retirement after 30 years as a central body president. He headed the state AFL-CIO since the merger after serving as president of the former Michigan CIO Council.

A staunch advocate of union political activity, Scholle was a leader in the successful fight for "one man, one vote" legislative apportionment and in the early court battle for "portal to portal" pay.

Marshall was elected to the presidency after serving two years as secretary-treasurer and nine years as an executive vice president of the state central body. He is a member of the Amalgamated Transit Union.

Delegates elected Walter Campbell to fill the post of secretary-treasurer. He has served as the director of Allied Industrial Workers Region 7 which is composed of 100 local unions in Western Michigan.

The 800 convention delegates extended the two-year terms of officers to four years.

In another major constitutional change, they approved an increase in per capita tax from 13 to 15 cents a month. The annual fee paid by local central bodies and other subordinate groups was increased from $25 to $50.

Convention speakers included Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) who issued a call for "a decade of development, a decade of reconciliation, of reconstruction of our society."

Cesar Chavez, director of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, told delegates that Michigan is one of 20 states where the UFWOC is inaugurating organizing efforts among migrant workers.

Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes called for federal financing of the welfare system, congressional approval of the public service jobs bill and release of funds by the Nixon Administration.

Other speakers were Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute; Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock, and Michigan Gov. William G. Milliken (R).

The convention adopted a resolution backing a voluntary plan by the Detroit building trades to increase minority hiring from 15 to 20 percent over a five-year period.

Another resolution adopted by delegates called for a progressive state tax system based on a graduated income levy. Such a tax is now prohibited by a provision of the Michigan Constitution.

Revenue-Sharing Proposal Scored, Perkins Cites No-Strings Pitfalls

Public and congressional rejection of the Administration's special revenue-sharing proposal has been predicted by Rep. Carl Perkins (D-Ky.), chairman of the House Education & Labor Committee.

Interviewed for the July program of COPE Report, the new cassette tape project of COPE, Perkins said:

"I believe that when it is fully known what the Administration proposal contains in the so-called special revenue-sharing legislation, it will be soundly rejected by the public and by the members of Congress."

Perkins noted that the Administration proposal would repeal the $9.5 billion authorization in the Elementary & Secondary Education Act of 1965 and substitute for it an expenditure of $3 billion.

Present federal aid for education is distributed according "to a precise formula" to state and local educational agencies, Perkins said. Distribution of the special revenue sharing education funds would be at the discretion of the U.S. Commissioner of Education.

"By law, the Administration cannot withhold funds appropriated by Congress which are to be allocated among the states and school districts according to a statutory formula," Perkins continued. But if the special revenue-sharing measure is adopted the Administration could "withhold appropriated funds."

Perkins said that no one is against the concept of sharing federal revenue so long as it would not "destroy effective and efficient programs that are operating so well at the local level."

The Administration proposal, he said, would give some money to local communities "in lieu of the present programs, which, in reality, means short-changing the local communities."

Also on the July program is an explanation by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany of the need to expand foreign trade while safeguarding jobs of American workers.

Other COPE Report features include a report on the condition of the economy by Nat Goldfinger, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, an examination of the 18-year-old vote by Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, and background information about National Health Security and the Administration's freeze of $12.8 billion in federal funds.

Information about the cassette program is available from COPE.

Pamphlet Exposes Communist Record

The record of Communist territorial expansion since 1939 is set forth in a new pamphlet, "Who Is the Imperialist?" prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs.

The 52-page, two color publication cites the record and concludes that the "Soviet Union, Communist China and their offspring have relentlessly pursued policies of swallowing country after country." The free world has helped 68 former colonial or semi-colonial areas to become independent nations, the pamphlet shows.

The publication, No. 148, is available from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division. A single copy is free; up to 100 copies the price is 40 cents each; over 100 the cost is $35 per hundred.

Low Wages in Mexico Erode U.S. Jobs

Border-Jumping Companies Spurred by Tariff Loopholes

By David L. Perlman

South of the 1,900-mile border between the United States and Mexico, the minimum wage drops from $1.60 an hour to a range of 20 to 46 cents. The dropoff from union-negotiated wage scales is, of course, even steeper.

This pay differential has enriched a growing number of runaway manufacturers. And it has lined the pockets of a motley assortment of middlemen on both sides of the border.

It has meant unemployment—permanent loss of jobs, not just temporary layoffs—in Kansas City, Mo., and Oshkosh, Wis., in Forrest City, Ark., Niles, Ill., and scores of other cities.

And it is an important part of the story of depressed wages and obstacles to union organizing in the border areas of Texas, New Mexico, Arizona and California. When 40-cent-an-hour labor is just a few miles away, an employer doesn't have to run very far—and the threat hangs over every picket line.

This page represents another in a series of features by the AFL-CIO News as a prelude to the conference on the nation's unemployment problem scheduled by the federation next July 12-13 in Washington.

Ironically and inexplicably, U.S. tariff laws and trade policies have encouraged this export of jobs.

U.S. government agencies take part in seminars to sell employers on the ease and convenience of shipping components and semi-finished goods across the border where the "labor-intensive" work is done at a fraction of the U.S. wage scale.

So long as the U.S. components are shipped back to the United States, Mexico charges no import duty. And the U.S. tariff on the "added value" of the Mexican labor is only a token amount—far below the savings in wage costs.

Chambers of commerce in the major cities on the U.S. side of the border have been actively promoting the "twin plant" concept—encouraging U.S. manufacturers to move the domestic part of their operations close to the site of their Mexican plants. This facilitates the division of work that allows manufacturers to combine the maximum use of Mexican labor with the minimum customs charge.

David T. Lopez, Texas-based AFL-CIO organizer, describes the "twin plants" on the U.S. side of the border as "at best poor cousins." For every job supposedly established on the American side, at least 10 jobs are set up in Mexico, he notes.

Defenders of the program claim that it doesn't actually displace U.S. workers because otherwise the firms would move their entire production to competing low-wage areas such as Hong Kong, Korea and Portugal.

Some might, but the special incentives and conveniences offered to employers under the Mexican border program quite clearly lure employers who would not find it practicable to set up shop across thousands of miles of ocean, with the added time lags, shipping costs and import restrictions.

At a conference sponsored by business interests in El Paso, Tex., and Juarez, Mexico—and co-sponsored, incidentally, by the U.S. Dept. of Commerce—there were flowery words about the benefits to both countries of the border program.

But when it came to making the hard pitch to the U.S. manufacturers attending the conference, the focus was on low wages.

With an air of open frankness, Executive Director William Reid of the El Paso Industrial Development Corp. acknowledged that the 32-cent minimum wage in the Juarez area isn't the full labor cost faced by the U.S. employer. Various benefits required by the Mexican government bring the actual pay floor up to about 42 cents an hour.

But, he assured his audience, "actual wages in Juarez are near minimum because of the tremendous supply of labor." And "training wages, incidentally are even lower. During the training period, the employes can be paid as little as half of the minimum wage."

The counsel for the Mexican counterpart of the development commission adds that it is up to the employer to decide when the beginning worker has progressed sufficiently in his training to move up to the full minimum wage.

While taking advantage of low-cost labor across the border, company executives can live in El Paso where, Reid noted, "you can play golf year-round."

AN ACROSS-THE-BORDER plant in Matamoros, Mexico, is used by Booth Fisheries for peeling and deveining shrimp. North of the border, these women would be paid at least $1.60 an hour. Here they earn $3.20 a day.

And with an oversupply of workers streaming into the city across the international bridge, "El Paso is one of the few American cities where there still is an ample supply of domestic help."

Actually, as a number of U.S. manufacturers have found out, it isn't even necessary to establish a twin plant on the American side of the border. Components can be shipped from existing plants of the parent company. And with the choice industrial sites on the Mexican side of the border rapidly being exhausted, the Mexican government recently announced that it was opening up new areas of the country where U.S. manufacturers can bring in components duty free so long as the products are returned to the United States.

"The border program is in the national interest," San Francisco Chamber of Commerce Executive Thomas Caylor proclaims. "It will keep prices down and it will also keep wages down, which is just as important. It is in the natural stream of things to develop the affluent society of both countries."

So to develop this "affluent society," the research director of the Ladies' Garment Workers noted, "a Whittier, Calif., knitwear plant shrunk from 400 to 200 employes when work was transferred to Mexicali, Mexico, to thwart a union organizational drive." Nor are runaways limited to union operation; non-union jobbers have forced unorganized contractors out of business by shifting work across the border.

Employment at two Los Angeles area plants of the Mattel toy company, where the Rubber Workers hold bargaining rights, dropped abruptly as employment at the across-the-border Mexicali plant rose to 2,000.

Because of the cloak of secrecy that shrouds the border operations, exact statistics are hard to come by as to the number of U.S. workers displaced. The AFL-CIO Dept. of Research estimates that the number of U.S. companies operating under the border industrialization program rose from 30 in 1967, employing some 4,000 Mexican workers, to about 250 at present with an estimated 30,000 workers.

There is no sign that the growth has been stemmed. And there is clear evidence that other low-wage nations close to the United States have completed the lure of a tariff policy that encourages runaway employers.

Thus U.S. business executives have been circularized by a firm in Haiti that promises to "save you two-thirds of your present labor cost on practically any assembly of components." The firm's letterhead says, "Anything by hand—electronic components, casettes, valves, switches, systems, woodworking, sewing, etc."

An Associated Press story cites a minimum daily wage of 70 cents an hour and a 48-hour week as lures bringing in American manufacturers.

Granted the loss of jobs in the United States, do these runaway employers really boost the economy of the low-wage countries?

They provide jobs, certainly. But just as southern states competed to lure runaway employers from the North with promises of low wages, no unions, tax exemptions and generous financing, so the low-wage nations are subject to the blackmail of international companies that threaten to move elsewhere if wages and working conditions are improved.

When South Korea's unions sought substantial wage hikes a couple of years ago—to bring their pay up to the Hong Kong scale — American-owned Oak Electro-Netics Corp. closed down its $2.3 million electronic components plant near Seoul to move its operations elsewhere in the Far East.

An article in Business International magazine at the time noted that one effect of the move is that "employes of the other U.S. firms have become less aggressive in their demands for fear of losing their jobs" and the government has cracked down on "strikes and excessive wage demands."

$1.72-an-Hour Job Now Pays 45 Cents

By David T. Lopez

Brownsville, Tex.—Mrs. Hortencia Cantu, after two years of unemployment, is reluctantly leaving her home in this southern tip of Texas to seek a job—any job—in Chicago. Most of her friends, she said, left months ago.

In July, 1969, Mrs. Cantu was the last of 410 employes of Booth Fisheries to be permanently laid off as the shrimp packing operations were moved to a Mexican plant built under the border industrialization program.

When Booth employes chose the Meat Cutters as their representative in 1964, there were 640 in the bargaining unit, according to International Representative Juan Gonzalez.

That was before the Mexican plant opened under the bilateral program to lure American businesses to use low-wage Mexican labor.

Booth opened the plant across the border in Matamoros in the fall of 1967, agreeing to ship all of its products for sale in the United States, to qualify for special tax and tariff treatment. In the Brownsville plant, 60 workers got layoff notices for Christmas, timed to prevent them from getting holiday pay.

Gonzalez says that today Booth employs only 230 in Brownsville, nearly 800 in Matamoros. Many of the Brownsville employes work short shifts, some as little as six hours a week.

Nearly all of the laid-off workers, like Mrs. Cantu, are of Mexican descent.

Mrs. Cantu, who went to work for Booth at 75 cents an hour in 1957, was a key union organizer at Booth. The first union contract, in 1964, moved the pay scale slightly above the federal minimum wage. And when Mrs. Cantu was laid off in 1969, she was earning $1.72½ an hour.

Today, across the border, a Mexican worker now is doing Mrs. Cantu's job for 226 pesos a week—about 45 cents an hour.

For the 410 Brownsville workers, mostly women, who lost their jobs, there was no severance pay, not even a polite notice. "We were just pulled off the line and told we weren't needed any more," Mrs. Cantu said. Her unemployment benefits of $32 a week were exhausted in about four months, she said.

"Just about everyone is going away," says Mrs. Cantu of the laid-off workers. "You can't raise a family on the wages of the father alone in this community."

Of those laid off, only a few have found jobs in Brownsville. "Every time I apply for work, they ask me where I worked before," she said. "When I say I worked at Booth, they ask me if I was in the union. I tell them I was, and I never hear from them again."

Such retaliation is but one example of the dilemma of organizers in the area. As a local union leader said bitterly: "If we accept a low increase to keep the jobs here, the employers point to unions as ineffective. If we strike, they bring Mexican residents in to scab. If we win a fair settlement, they start moving the jobs out and telling people the union lost them their job."

The intimidation pays off—for the employer. Workers at Alberti Seafoods, where the work complement was cut in half when a Mexican plant opened, reluctantly gave up their union through a decertification election in the hope of placating their employer.

"I hope we can come back in about four years, when my little girl is ready to go to school," Mrs. Cantu said. "I would like to give her a chance to grow up here."

She added bitterly: "But I just don't know. They tell us to send our children to school and give them an opportunity. But then our government robs us of any chance to make a living. It's just not fair."

Labor Asks Improvements:

Welfare Reform Moves to Senate

families eligible for federal assistance, establish a guaranteed income and for the first time supplement the pay of persons employed at substandard wages.

The bill had Administration support and the near-unanimous endorsement of the influential House Ways & Means Committee.

Its social security provisions, raising benefits and increasing the taxable wage base to pay for them, proved less controversial. After the House voted to retain the welfare reform section, the entire package was approved by a one-sided 288-132 margin.

In the Senate, the legislation will be wide open to amendments first in the conservative Senate Finance Committee and then on the Senate floor, where the liberal voting strength is substantially greater.

As passed by the House, its key provisions are:

- Social Security—A 5 percent increase in all benefits effective June 1, 1972, and thereafter an automatic raise in any year in which the consumer price index rises at least 3 percent.

Widow's benefits would be raised to 100 percent of the amount their deceased husbands would have received if they had lived. Persons who worked at least 15 years under social security coverage would be guaranteed not less than $5 a month multiplied by years of employment.

The amount of money a retired worker could earn without loss of benefits would be raised to $2,000 a year. Beyond that benefits would be reduced only $1 for each $2 in earnings.

Other benefits would give men retiring at age 62 the same pension computation formula now allowed women and would allow long-service workers to improve their pensions by permitting more "dropout" years of low earnings.

To pay for these benefits and for medicare improvements, the amount of wages subject to social security taxes on employers and workers would rise from $7,800 to $10,200 next January. The tax rate would go up slightly more than scheduled under present law, reaching 6.2 percent in 1975 and 7.4 percent in 1977.

- Medicare—Medicare coverage would be expanded to persons under 65 who are receiving social security or railroad retirement disability benefits. On the minus side, patients would have to pay a portion of hospital costs during the 31st to 60th day of hospitalization.

- Medicaid—It would be harder for persons not on welfare to qualify for health services provided by the federal-state Medicaid program, and charges could be made based on income.

- Family Assistance — Families with dependent children would be guaranteed federal payments amounting to $2,400 a year for a family of four, which states could supplement. But they would no longer be eligible for food stamps.

Able-bodied persons would be required to take jobs or training if available, but the requirement for mothers to work would depend on the availability of adequate child care facilities.

The working poor would receive subsidies keyed to their income and family size. In the case of a family of four with earnings of $3,000 a year, the subsidy would add another $800 to income.

An important although little-noted section of the bill authorizes federal funds to provide day-care facilities for 875,000 children, more than 400,000 job training slots, and federal financing of 200,000 "transitional" public service jobs.

Included in the 687-page bill, but unrelated to its other provisions, is a liberalization of the income tax deductions for child care that now are available only to persons with incomes under $6,000 a year. The income ceiling would be raised to $12,000.

While the House moved ahead with a busy legislative schedule, the Senate finally found a way to reach a vote on the draft-extension legislation that has been before it since early May.

By a 65-27 vote—more than the required two-thirds—it imposed a limit on debate. Among those voting for cloture were a number of southern senators who had led filibusters in past years and protested any curb on unlimited debate.

The bill is not out of the legislative woods yet, however. Earlier, the Senate added an amendment calling for withdrawal of U.S. forces from Indochina within nine months if American prisoners of war are released. If the House refuses to go along with that provision, a House-Senate conference agreement could face a new filibuster threat in the Senate. Meanwhile, the basic draft law expires on June 30.

Included in both the House and Senate bills is a pay raise for lower-ranking members of the armed forces.

Public Jobs Program Gets Conference OK

freely in unsuccessful efforts in both the House and Senate to block the legislation or at least convert it into a revenue-sharing formula.

But there were strong indications that the President will sign the bill worked out in conference. Labor Dept. officials proposed to the conference committee a compromise formula they said the President would approve. A number of the Administration proposals were rejected, but Republican conferees all signed the final version and expressed optimism that it will become law.

The final version of the bill provides "special consideration" in hiring to Vietnam veterans. It establishes also a two-year program, as passed by the Senate, rather than the four-year version adopted by the House.

Up to $750 million the first year and $1 billion the second year would be available so long as the national unemployment rate remained above 4.5 percent.

An additional $250 million each year would be earmarked for communities or city neighborhoods where unemployment is at least 6 percent—regardless of the national rate.

Not more than one-third of the persons hired under the program could be professionals—and their pay could not exceed $12,000 a year. Teachers, however, would not be covered by the limit on the number of professionals.

A section of the bill requires that unions representing public workers be given an opportunity to comment on implementation of the program.

AMA Cheers as Nixon Attacks Health Security

Atlantic City—Pres. Nixon found a friendly and enthusiastic audience at the American Medical Association House of Delegates meeting here for an attack on National Health Security, the AFL-CIO-backed national health insurance program.

The President claimed that the bill introduced by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) would "tear apart" the present health care system. He told the doctors that "no system of health care in this nation will ever work unless the doctors of this nation make it work."

He also took the occasion to try and drum up doctor support for the Administration proposal which the AFL-CIO Executive Council has called a "financial bailout for insurance companies" and "a giant step backward."

But Nixon did not mention the AMA's own "medicredit" proposal of tax credits for persons who buy private insurance.

The President said the Kennedy-Griffiths bill would cost the federal government more than $77 billion in 1974.

In Washington, Sen. Kennedy pointed out that "the cost of Health Security is not new money. Americans will still be paying the same $77 billion for health care in 1974 whether we have the Health Security Act or not."

Nixon said that Health Security would mean "complete federal domination of our medical system."

Kennedy responded that it would do "nothing of the sort. It means federal financing, but it also means new and better forms of private organizations and private delivery of health care, with private doctors and private hospitals free to practice the medicine of which they are really capable."

Nixon's visit to the AMA meeting came amid fresh signs of physician dissatisfaction with the AMA.

For the first time in at least 50 years, the number of physicians paying dues to the AMA dropped below 50 percent of those eligible.

Additionally, many doctors are complaining about the 50 percent increase in expenditures for the AMA's public relations campaign and a $1.5 million advertising budget to fight National Health Security.

Over the years, the AMA has levied heavy assessments on doctors to finance massive advertising and public relations campaigns aimed at pinning the label of "socialized medicine" on every proposal to assure high standards of medical care for all Americans.

It was credited with a major role in defeating the national health insurance program proposed during the Truman Administration. But it failed with the same tactics to block enactment of Medicare for persons over 65.

Jump in Prices Jolts Hopes For Inflation Curbs

But with last month's sharp increase, the rate for the three months ended in May was 4.2 percent.

Clothing prices posted their largest gain since August 1968, rising nine-tenths of 1 percent on a seasonally adjusted basis. The biggest single factor was a 1.2-percent increase in the prices of women's and girls' clothing.

Food prices rose only two-tenths of 1 percent overall after jumps of nine-tenths of 1 percent in April and 1.1 percent in March. But the prices of fruits and vegetables, which had spurred those overall increases, continued their sharp advance, rising 1.2 percent last month.

Services posted their biggest increase since January, rising six-tenths of 1 percent overall. Housekeeping and home maintenance services showed the biggest increase, up 1.7 points.

The price of cars and gasoline increased in May, instead of declining as they usually do at this time of the year.

The price of used cars showed an increase of 2.7 percent on the heels of a 2.8-percent April increase, perhaps reflecting a consumer trend toward buying used, instead of new cars during the current recession.

Approximately 43,000 workers will receive cost-of-living escalator adjustments based on the national CPI for May or one of the individual city indexes.

This includes 20,000 employes of firms belonging to the Pacific Coast Shipbuilders Association who will receive 3 cents an hour based on the Seattle index.

House Votes 225-172 Against Move To Deny Food Stamps to Strikers

A solid 225-172 majority of the House defeated an attempt to deny food stamps to strikers and their families.

The anti-labor motion was proposed by Rep. Robert H. Michel (R-Ill.) as an amendment to the Agriculture Dept. appropriations bill.

Under present law, food stamps are distributed on the basis of need—so that people without money won't go hungry.

Supporters of the Michel amendment argued that allowing needy strikers to receive food stamps prolonged strikes because workers who had enough to eat were less likely to abandon a strike.

Rep. Thomas S. Foley (D-Wash.) ripped into this argument. It implies, he told the House, "that the strike itself is an evil and all strikers are miscreants who should be punished . . . and their families as well."

But, he added, "we do not even treat criminals this harshly" since families of convicts are eligible for food stamps.

Labor's legislative representatives were especially elated by the size of the margin against the Michel amendment. Last December, in the closing days of the 91st Congress, a similar amendment to deny food stamps to strikers was defeated by a narrower 183-172 vote. And two years earlier, in the 90th Congress, a ban on food stamps to strikers passed the House but was dropped in the final version by a House-Senate conference committee.

This year's vote was taken under the new House system of recorded teller votes. It means that the vote of each House member is recorded by name—similar to a rollcall. Previously there was no official record of how congressmen voted on amendments.

The House also rejected an amendment which would have blocked funds for dredging work and construction of waterway channels. AFL-CIO maritime unions were opposed to the amendment, which was defeated, 278-129.

Before sending the farm funding bill to the Senate, the House made another attempt to lower the subsidy any single grower can receive.

It approved, 214-198, an amendment by Rep. Silvio O. Conte (R-Mass.), setting a $20,000 limit.

A similar amendment last year led to a House-Senate compromise on the present $55,000 limit.

Nixon's Public Works Veto Blocks New Aid for Jobless

SCREEN ACTORS at a mass meeting in the Hollywood Palladium vote near unanimously to authorize a strike in response to employer demands for a cutback in benefits. The Screen Actors Guild announced a July 14 strike date after a tally of the first 10,000 votes cast in a nationwide mail referendum showed more than 95 percent for the strike authorization.

Meany Asks Votes To Keep Program

The AFL-CIO called on Congress to override Pres. Nixon's veto and repass an accelerated public works bill aimed at creating more than 400,000 jobs in communities with heavy unemployment.

Federation Pres. George Meany termed the vetoed bill "extremely important" to the nation's sagging economy and sharply challenged Nixon's claim that the program would take too long to get under way.

Meany cited a backlog of thousands of applications for federal funds to build waste treatment plants, health centers, water and sewer projects and other facilities "of vital and lasting worth to the entire nation."

Tens of thousands of unemployed could be put to work promptly on projects that are already blueprinted, Meany said.

Nixon's veto message dusted off the same "inflation" argument he has used over the past two years to disapprove congressional efforts to pull the nation out of recession.

This time, however, he added a new swipe at construction workers and their unions.

Ignoring the fact that construction unemployment is substantially above the national jobless rate, Nixon complained that spending more money on construction would merely reward a group of workers whose wage increases have been higher than other industries. Furthermore, the President asserted, construction pay hikes "have affected collective bargaining elsewhere, thus fueling inflation."

30,000 Out As Copper Pacts Expire

Salt Lake City—Over 30,000 copper workers refused to work without a contract and walked out at plants of four big producers across the country as their agreements expired on July 1.

Negotiations that started in April broke down because "none of the companies involved have come within reach of the critical needs of their workers despite some 10 weeks of intensive bargaining on our part," Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony of the Steelworkers told the National Nonferrous Industry Conference at the meeting here that authorized a walkout.

Conference delegates represented 26 unions that coordinated their bargaining committees.

Molony said an additional 6,000 employes of four big independents will join the strike as their contracts run out later this year.

Two-Year Program Approved:

Congress Votes Bill to Provide 150,000 Jobs in States, Cities

Congress voted final approval to a labor-supported public service employment bill aimed at putting 150,000 unemployed workers in jobs that local and state governments haven't been able to fill because of lack of money.

Pres. Nixon has promised to sign it into law—even though he vetoed a very similar measure last year. The President publicly embraced the legislation at the same time he vetoed a companion attack on the unemployment problem—an accelerated public works program.

The essential next step will be for Congress to appropriate the money authorized in the bill—at least 85 percent of which must go to reimburse city, county and state governments for the salaries paid to persons hired under the program.

The legislation authorizes $750 million the first year of the program and $1 billion the second year—providing the national unemployment rate remains above 4.5 percent.

Regardless of the national rate, an additional $250 million is authorized for each of the two years to be earmarked for communities or city neighborhoods where unemployment is at least 6 percent.

Persons hired under the new program must be paid the same salary as other public employes doing comparable work—and in any event not less than the minimum wage. The legislation directs "special consideration" in hiring for Vietnam veterans.

Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.), reporting on the conference agreement, stressed that "the intent is not to create deadend or make-work jobs" but rather to fill "vital, necessary" positions "which could not otherwise be financed because of state and local budget limitations."

The program is "transitional," Nelson stressed, only in the sense that the federal financing is tied to the unemployment rate and the initial authorization covers only a two-year period. After that time, it will be up to Congress to decide whether an extension is necessary.

A hard core of Senate conservatives refused to be swayed by the Administration's switch on the issue, but the vote for final passage was a one-sided 75-11.

Before the vote, Sen. Peter H. Dominick (R-Colo.) voiced his disenchantment with the White House switch. Earlier this year, when the bill first came before the Senate, the Administration asked Dominick to lead the fight against it.

He did so, Dominick reminded the Senate, arguing "that we should not be federally subsidizing all types of public service employment around the country," and was voted down.

Dominick told the Senate he sees little difference in the final version of the bill and finds the Administration switch "somewhat unusual."

The House sent the bill to the President with a 343-14 bipartisan endorsement.

The legislation would permit public agencies to fill an almost unlimited range of vacancies under the program—teachers and recreation workers, office clerks and fire fighters, hospital attendants and social workers.

No job, however, may pay more

First Pay Offer Marks Postal Service Birth

The new United States Postal Service marked the first day of its official existence by making its first wage offer to 650,000 union-represented postal employes since contract negotiations began last January with the former Post Office Dept.

The negotiators stayed at the bargaining table for nearly 24 hours in an effort to reach agreement by July 1, the birthday of the new service.

They "made considerable progress," Assistant Secretary of Labor William J. Usery said. An aide explained "there are just too many unresolved issues."

18-Year Olds Get Ballot In State, Local Elections

The right of 18-year-olds to vote in all federal, state and local elections—long sought by organized labor—was written into the Constitution as the required three-fourths of the states ratified the proposal.

Ratification of the 26th Amendment means that 18-year-olds will be able to vote in all elections this year, including gubernatorial contests in Louisiana and Kentucky, mayoral races in Boston, San Francisco and other cities.

The AFL-CIO has long supported the 18-year-old vote, and Federation Pres. George Meany testified for it at congressional hearings.

Under the law passed by Congress, 18-year-olds were given the right to vote in federal elections. But the Supreme Court said Congress did not have the power to establish a voting age for states and municipalities.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council pointed out that cumbersome and costly election procedures would be required if 18-year-olds were not permitted to vote in other races as well, and that, at any rate, "we believe that 18-year-olds should have the vote."

The amendment was ratified in two months and seven days, the shortest time ever for a ratification.

Fire Fighters Regain Local At Memphis

Memphis—After two years without a union, the 1,476 members of the Memphis Fire Dept. voted overwhelmingly for representation by the Fire Fighters.

The AFL-CIO affiliate polled three-fourths of the votes cast on a ballot which also included an "independent" association and a "no union" listing.

It climaxed a major organizing campaign to re-establish the union in the last major city in the United States where fire fighters were not members of the IAFF.

The campaign was successful, the union reported, despite "intense hostility" by the department administration. A court case is still pending in which the Fire Fighters are seeking the reinstatement of a union supporter who was fired after he put the union's bumper sticker on his car.

Fire Fighters Pres. W. Howard McClennan hailed the election results as opening "a new era" for Memphis.

"Memphis can no longer treat its fire fighters as second-class employes," McClennan said. "The insistence on fair treatment at the bargaining table which is an IAFF hallmark will open a new era in labor relations between the city of Memphis and its fire fighters."

The new Memphis Local 1784 of the Fire Fighters succeeds a local which disbanded in 1969 under pressure from the anti-union Fire Dept. administration.

The union, representing 85 percent of the professional fire fighters in the United States and 98 percent in Canada, was especially pleased to welcome back the Memphis fire fighters.

2 Unionists Named To Job Injury Unit

Two AFL-CIO representatives were named by Pres. Nixon to the 15-member National Commission on State Workmen's Compensation Laws which was created by the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

They are James R. O'Brien, assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Social Security, and Michael R. Peevey, research director of the California AFL-CIO.

The commission will study and evaluate state compensation programs to determine if they provide adequate, prompt and equitable benefits for on-the-job injuries or deaths.

Labor Health Center Opens in Rhode Island

Providence, R.I.—Non-profit medical and health care services were opened to union members and their families in the Providence area in the Rhode Island Group Health Association.

The pre-paid group practice plan, sponsored by the State AFL-CIO, was launched with the financial assistance of the national federation, international and local unions.

The AFL-CIO has loaned $100,000 to the project; another $50,000 loan came from the Textile Workers Union of America, and $5,000 more came from the Amalgamated Transit Union.

Through the cooperation of labor organizations, the RIGHA hopes to raise about $600,000 to pay for the construction and equipment of the family care center at the Our Lady of Fatima unit of St. Joseph's Hospital in North Providence. About $400,000 in money and services has been provided by local unions in Rhode Island.

The center opened early in June with 6,000 subscribers from 1,500 families. About 13,000 subscribers are expected to enroll in the first year of operation.

Enrollment at the outset will be limited to union members and their families, but the program will ultimately be open to all community groups.

The rate structure for subscribers has been set at $43.80 a month per family, $18.50 for an individual.

As the membership in RIGHA increases, the ambulatory care center at the Fatima hospital is expected to be replaced with a larger facility at the Our Lady of Providence unit to accommodate about 50,000 subscribers.

RIGHA is the first prepaid group practice plan operating in the state. The two chief officers of the program are Pres. Thomas F. Policastro and Sec.-Treas. Edwin C. Brown of the Rhode Island AFL-CIO.

Dr. Jonas Salk, the discoverer of antipolio vaccine, praised the group health association and its officers for their efforts to improve the delivery of health care.

In a message to the state federation, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany offered his congratulations and said "the Rhode Island AFL-CIO has not been content to merely complain about the rising costs of medical care. You are doing something about it."

Davis Tells Convention:

New Job Protections Top Musician Issue

By Jane Van Sant

Seattle—"The most critical problem facing all musicians today is the continued threat of displacement by canned music," Pres. Hal C. Davis of the musicians said in a keynote address to the AFM's 75th anniversary convention.

He pledged the full resources of the union to find "new ways to guard against unfair exploitation of recordings that displace live musicians."

The challenge of technological progress, Davis warned, is "to walk that line between recognizing and encouraging new trends, and preserving precious income and employment for our members."

Davis outlined many of the problems facing the musicians, and called for a legislative program including:

- Amendment of the federal copyright laws "so that performers will be compensated for their services whenever their recordings are used."
- Full funding of the $30 million appropriation for the National Endowment for the Arts.
- Legislation to prevent the piracy of tapes and records which now results in the loss of millions of dollars each year to professional musicians.

A diplomatic conference will be held in Geneva this fall to draft an international treaty against record piracy.

Davis was elected by acclamation to his first full term as president of the 300,000-member union. He had been named to the top position last July by the musicians' executive board, following the death of Herman Kenin.

Re-elected to office without opposition were Sec. Treas. Stanley Ballard; Vice-Pres. Victor Fuentealba; and Canadian Vice-Pres. J. Alan Wood.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the delegates that the current recession is the result of a "deliberately planned manipulation of the national economy."

He charged that the policymakers "blame inflation on inflation's chief victims" and "unemployment on those who are losing their jobs." And now, he warned, they "want to hamstring our unions and undermine the institution of collective bargaining."

The "incomes policy" suggested by Federal Reserve Board Chairman Arthur Burns to establish how much money workers could be paid for their labor, and compulsory arbitration to enforce these guidelines, would make collective bargaining a "captive of government policy," Kirkland said.

Kirkland pointed out that while the Administration is calling wages inflationary, it does not mention last year's increase in the profit rates of banks—21.9 percent at J. P. Morgan's, 19.2 percent at the First National Bank of Dallas.

The delegates paid tribute to Herman Kenin with a memorial service, during which a large portrait of the late president was unveiled.

30,000 Out in Copper As Contracts Expire

Picket lines were posted at mines, mills and factories of the industry's Big Four companies—Kennecott Copper Corp., Phelps Dodge Corp., Anaconda Mining Co. and the American Smelting & Refining Co. The independents include Miami Copper Co., Inspiration Copper Co., Magma Copper Co. and the American Metal Climax Co. plant in Carteret, N.J.

Molony said in a report to the conference delegates: "Every company offer was not only woefully inadequate but was conditioned on union acceptance of unwarranted speedup arrangements and the sacrifice of many previously negotiated, hard-won benefits which safeguard the jobs and conditions of work of our union members."

Additionally, all offers were "significantly inferior" to 1971 settlements in the aluminum industry, Molony said. He added: "The copper companies evidently deem their workers unworthy of the consideration given most other union workers. Thus they have caused negotiations to collapse."

All the unions want contracts in line with the healthy profitability of copper's Big Four. They want settlements on a par with those reached this year in the can and aluminum industries, and in line with benefits being sought by the USWA for 450,000 workers in basic steel.

Members of the union Nonferrous Industry Conference met here to act on reports of contract offers made by the big copper producers.

This year's bargaining with copper's Big Four opened Apr. 22 in Butte, Mont., where a multi-union coordinated bargaining committee of 170 members presented Anaconda with proposals adopted by all the unions at a joint National Nonferrous Industry Conference in February. Similar proposals were made later to the other firms.

The union negotiators asked a "very substantial" wage boost, major improvements in pensions and insurance plans, and cost-of-living protection.

Delegates representing 100,000 workers in copper, lead, zinc, brass, wire, nickel and titanium adopted a statement pointing out that the nonferrous metals industry "can well afford to meet" the needs of its employes and still "show a hefty return on invested capital."

Besides the Big Four, the unions made their joint proposals to two major independent copper firms whose contracts expired June 30, and four others with later expiration dates.

In copper negotiations before contract expiration, all four major firms had made offers to the unions. The latest offer by Phelps Dodge called for an 85-cent hourly wage hike over a three-year period, and a partial cost-of-living formula.

The contracts now due to expire were won three years ago by union members after a strike that lasted for nearly a year at some locations.

St. Louis New Recession Casualty, 'Substantial' Joblessness Reported

The 10th largest labor area in the country—St. Louis— was added to the Labor Dept.'s "substantial" unemployment list in June, and three other major areas, each smaller than St. Louis, were removed.

There were still 53 of the nation's 150 major labor areas showing substantial unemployment—with the exception of the previous month, the highest number to be so classified since May 1962.

The Labor Dept. defines "substantial" unemployment as at least 6 percent with the rate expected to continue two more months.

Its report attributed rising unemployment in the St. Louis area primarily to layoffs in manufacturing which have been underway for some time.

The largest cutbacks have been in ordnance, machinery, aircraft and parts, chemicals and shoes.

The St. Louis area, with a work force totaling 1,033,000, includes the city itself, and St. Louis, St. Charles, Jefferson and Franklin Counties, plus St. Clair and Madison Counties in neighboring Illinois.

The area had been listed in the "moderate" category —3 percent to 5.9 percent unemployment—since October 1961.

The areas removed from the substantial listings were Albuquerque, N.M.; Johnstown, Pa., and Charleston, W. Va.

In other major labor area shifts, New Britain, Conn., became the second mainland area to be placed in the classification of severe unemployment—12 percent or more.

Seattle was added to this category in March. Unemployment there has been running at more than 13 percent due mostly to cutbacks in the aerospace industry.

Mayaguez, Puerto Rico, which had been in the same category, was moved down to a more moderate group—9 percent to 11.9 percent joblessness.

In addition, three large cities and 24 separately classified counties were considered suffering from "persistent" unemployment: a jobless rate of more than 6 percent for more than one year and an unemployment rate at least 50 percent above the national average for several years.

The three major cities classified as "persistent" unemployment areas were Oakland, Calif.; Newark, N.J. and Cleveland, O.

There now are 777 labor areas classified as either persistent or substantial unemployment areas, including 53 of the major labor markets and 724 others.

Recess for Holiday:

Postal Negotiators Tackle Key Issues

Details of the offer were not released by the negotiators. They were described as having "worked with their sleeves rolled up and their heads down" until they agreed to recess for the July 4 holiday.

Seven unions hold exclusive rights under the law to negotiate for their members. They had been trying for months to get a firm offer on wages and other benefits from the Post Office Dept. When no offer was forthcoming by June 1 they filed refusal to bargain charges shortly before the department was reorganized as the Postal Service under new rules of procedure.

The official birth of the new service, taking over the mails from the 196-year-old U.S. Post Office Dept. was matched by the emergence of a new union of postal workers—the American Postal Workers Union, a merger of four AFL-CIO affiliates and an independent unit.

There are seven postal unions involved in the negotiations through the Council of American Postal Employes (CAPE).

Under the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970 creating the new service if an agreement is not reached by July 20 the case will be laid before an arbitrator for final determination.

APWU represents 300,000 postal employes who approved merger in May by a 96 percent referendum vote. Formerly they were members of the Postal Clerks, the Post Office & General Service Maintenance Employes, the Post Office Motor Vehicle Employes, the Special Delivery Messengers, all AFL-CIO affiliates, and the National Postal Union, now part of the affiliated group.

Other unions in the negotiating council are the Letter Carriers, the Mail Handlers division of the Laborers, and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers. All seek wage increases of about 30 percent over two years, a 35-hour week, more holiday and vacation time, better pension benefits, and other improvements over current conditions of work.

Early in June the seven unions filed unfair labor practice charges accusing management of bad faith at the bargaining table. They said postal officials made no offer whatever on wages in nearly five months of negotiations. Talks then were renewed with Usery's aid.

Under the postal reorganization plan, the charge can be refiled with the National Labor Relations Board unless agreement is reached in the meantime.

Usery said in a statement: "An all-out effort is being made by leaders of the seven unions, their spokesman Bernard Cushman, and top Postal Service negotiators. They have all pledged their cooperation . . . in concluding a mutually beneficial agreement."

Transfer of jurisdiction in unfair labor practice charges to the NLRB is one of the changes that unions and management will have to adjust to. The NLRB and the Labor Dept. said in separate statements that the NLRB will process any charges filed with it of law violations alleged to have occurred after June 30. Usery will continue to process complaints alleging misconduct on or before that date.

Questions involving union elections, trusteeships, rights of union members, reports on union constitutions and by-laws and the filing of annual financial reports, formerly covered by Presidential Executive Order 11491, will now be covered by similar provisions of the Landrum-Griffin amendments to the Labor Act, the two agencies said.

Before the July 1 changeover, postal service management raised postal rates temporarily from 6 cents to 8 cents for first-class stamps, from 10 to 11 cents for air mail, and by 142 percent over five years for newspapers and magazines; began appointing postmasters and rural letter carriers from career lists without consulting Congress; and eliminated some 2,000 middle-management jobs after offering the incumbents improved retirement benefits.

The Civil Service Commission and the Postal Service announced that come Oct. 1, the latter agency will assume responsibility for processing job applications and giving tests. Until then the CSC will continue to receive applications under the old procedures.

LETTER CARRIERS from New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania march on the U.S. Postal Service headquarters in Washington in support of a new contract for 650,000 postal workers through negotiations instead of arbitration. Pres. James H. Rademacher of the Letter Carriers, foreground, led the march of more than 500 pickets.

IUD Hits Imbalance Of Advisory Panels

Federal advisory committees too often are top-heavy with business representatives and ignore the public interest, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. testified at Senate hearings.

IUD Administrative Director Jacob Clayman urged passage of a bill by Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.) requiring that at least one-third of the membership of government advisory committees be public members—a category that includes labor and consumer representatives.

Hearings on the bill "illuminate an institution in our democracy which has become perverted—the governmental advisory committee," Clayman testified. The problem affects not only the federal government alone but most forms of government in this country, he noted.

Clayman said such committees, "properly chartered, structured and administered" are important conduits of information and opinion both for the government and the interests they represent.

The problem, he said, is that advisory committees "seldom operate solely within their charter, representation usually is not balanced, and their administration often makes paper creatures" of them.

Essentially "we have mismanaged this institution" and Congress must act to regulate the nature of advisory committees in the federal government, he asserted.

Clayman singled out three groups as examples of faulty procedure—the President's Air Quality Advisory Board, created by act of Congress; the National Industrial Pollution Control Council, created by presidential order, and one created by a federal agency—the Business Advisory Council of the Office of Management & Budget.

The air quality board, created in 1967, has 14 members of whom eight are from industry. Labor, consumers, young people, women and blacks are not represented.

Labor was represented on the original board "but labor representation was dropped" by the Nixon Administration, Clayman said. He added: "Obviously we cannot expect a board so administered and constituted to function with frankness or dispatch in consumer matters."

A report on a study of pollution from a lead smelter in the area of East Helena, Mont., made no mention of the fact that the Environmental Protection Agency "sampled the hair, urine and blood of children in the area" last fall and "nowhere in the report is there any discussion of these samples" nor a schedule for the release of data on the samples, the IUD director noted.

Clayman charged that the Pollution Control Council, comprising prominent industrialists, meets often, has issued more than two dozen reports in 12 months but is only a "propaganda mill created to placate a society made anxious" by environmental dangers.

The third agency, OMB's Business Advisory Council, not only serves as a delaying agent but recently issued a proposal for a "pilot study" of a rule relating to the Occupational Safety & Health Act at a meeting held eight days after the deadline for public comment on the rule, the witness reported.

Actors Ratify Three-Year Broadway Pact

New York—Actors Equity council members approved terms of a new three-year contract under which Broadway theater actors will get minimum wage increases totaling $45.55 a week, plus a cost-of-living provision and other improvements in benefits.

Minimums for actors, now $164.45, will rise to $185 this year, $197.50 next year and $210 in 1973 for Broadway productions. Salary minimums for Broadway actors "on the road" will be raised from $217.50 to $262, $274.50 and $287, Equity Executive Sec. Angus Duncan reported.

Negotiators for the League of New York Theaters agreed that if New York City's cost-of-living index rises more than 11 percent for the period May 1971 to May 1973, the excess will be added to minimums in the third year.

Minimums for dramatic stage managers were set at $300, $320 and $335, and for musical stage managers $360, $385 and $409.

Vacations, formerly accrued after six months, will now accrue from the first performance. At the end of the first year a two-week vacation will be due members of Broadway casts.

Included in the contract is language encouraging the hiring of minority group members by directors and dramatists.

Guild Protests Effort to Ban Viet Reports

The president of the Newspaper Guild charged that government attempts to block publication of the Pentagon Papers presented "the most serious challenge in memory" to "our constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press."

ANG Pres. Charles A. Perlik testified at House hearings before the Supreme Court's decision upholding the Washington Post and New York Times' right to publish the controversial report on the Vietnam war without prior censorship.

"The concept of prohibition against prior restraint on publications as the irreducible minimum guarantee of a free press is neither original nor new, but dates back to the old English common law," Perlik said.

Perlik told the subcommittee that once the public's right to know is abridged by government censorship of the press and denial of information to its elected representatives, "two consequences are inevitable, both of them equally disastrous to a free society:"

"We become to the extent of that abridgement, less of a representative democracy than we profess to be. And the credibility of the press, and more importantly, of the government itself, is destroyed."

Steelworkers Hope to Avert Strike Without Sacrificing Wage Goals

The Steelworkers will do "everything within our power" to avoid a strike in the steel industry at the end of July, Pres. I. W. Abel told a television interview panel. But he made it clear that he doesn't consider abandoning the union's pay claim a feasible alternative.

Appearing on NBC's Meet the Press program, Abel said he "certainly wouldn't even consider asking for anything less in steel" than the approximately 31-percent packages negotiated by the union for can and aluminum workers.

In response to a question from Lawrence Spivak, producer of Meet the Press, Abel acknowledged that "no one"—neither the union nor the industry—"can really afford" a steel strike. But he added, "you do put up with them if you are caught in them."

Steel negotiations had been scheduled to resume July 6. In a surprise move, Pres. Nixon has asked Abel and top management officials to meet with him at the White House on that date.

The contracts expire July 31. Since the brief opening of national contract discussions in May, the union has been meeting with the individual steel companies on both a company-wide and plant-by-plant basis to seek to clear up local problems.

Much of the discussion with Abel on the Meet the Press show revolved around two issues: whether steel wage increases would contribute to inflation, and whether the increases would lead to still more imports of foreign steel into the United States. In both situations, the steel union president answered in the negative.

The Steelworkers "are trying to catch up what has been lost as a result of inflationary pressures," Abel told the interviewers.

He added that he expects the money for these increases to "come out of profits," not prices.

Noting that the steel industry was operating at only 67 percent of capacity in 1970, Abel said there are "very few industries that can make fabulous profits at that rate of operations." So, he said, the problem is to get industrial production moving at a higher level, at which productivity will rise steeply, and that will "automatically" reduce the unit cost of steel.

Abel said he "very definitely" favors more strict quotas on the import of foreign steel to the United States. Pointing out that up to 18 percent of the country's steel consumption is based on imported products, the USWA president suggested that the United States should be doing what other steel-producing nations have done for a long time: "looking after their own best interests."

Minton on Group To Study Wastes

Lee W. Minton, president-emeritus of the Glass Bottle Blowers, has been named to the President's National Commission on Materials Policy, which will study waste disposal problems.

The seven-member panel, including Commerce Sec. Maurice H. Stans and Interior Sec. Rogers C. B. Morton, is to make a report to the nation on how to extract, develop and use disposable materials that can be recycled, reused or easily destroyed.

AT SEAFARERS CONVENTION, Pres. Paul Hall sharply criticizes the Nixon Administration's suspension of a requirement that at least 50 percent of grain shipped to Communist nations be carried in American vessels.

In Convention Action:

Revitalized Fleet Urged by Seafarers

More than 200 delegates at the Seafarers 15th biennial convention in Washington renewed a call for full implementation of the Merchant Marine Act of 1970 aimed at adding 300 new vessels to the American commercial fleet.

The convention, representing 90,000 workers in maritime transportation and allied fields, unanimously re-elected Pres. Paul Hall and Sec.-Treas. Al Kerr.

All incumbent vice presidents were returned to office, and one additional vice president was elected—Merle D. Adlum, president of the Inland Boatmen of the Pacific, an SIU affiliate.

Delegates also called on the federal government to take strong action to protect fishermen from interference and harassment in international waters.

One resolution declared that "in the first four months of 1971, over $1.3 million in fines was levied against U.S. tuna boats captured illegally on the high seas by Latin American nations."

This same resolution asked the government to act against such piracy by pressing claims for fines levied by the "piratical nations."

If such measures fail, delegates declared, then our tuna fleet must be protected by the U.S. Navy.

Citing recent incidents in which American lobstermen and fishermen have been harassed by Soviet fishing fleets patrolling off the East Coast, delegates called on the government to "take whatever steps are necessary to safeguard the lives, property and the right to a free pursuit of a livelihood of East Coast fishermen."

Delegates adopted nearly 50 other resolutions including one in favor of an immediate grant of contruction permits to build the trans-Alaska oil pipeline.

Resolutions adopted by the convention also called for enactment of the National Health Security program and opposed any attempts to close a Public Health Service Hospital and clinic system which serves American merchant seamen.

Shortly after the five-day convention ended, the Senate recommended that the hospitals remain open until June 30, 1973. The action followed a proposal to close PHS hospitals in eight port cities plus 30 PHS outpatient clinics.

Pres. Hall reported on the "Save Our Ships" committee newly formed by maritime unions to combat Pres. Nixon's suspension of the 50-50 grain cargo rule.

Nixon recently suspended an Executive Order requiring at least 50 percent of all grain shipped to Communist countries to be carried in U.S. ships.

Howard Schulman, counsel for the union, told the convention that the indictment of the union for its role in political activities threatens "the precious right of participating in the process of governing ourselves." He declared that the union had been indicted because of its help "in getting our friends elected," and described the indictment as "an attempt to chill us, to frighten us and to stop us from using what I think is a most fundamental right."

Chairman Helen Delich Bentley of the Federal Maritime Commission called upon labor, management and government to join together to combat the steady decline of America's maritime industry.

House Speaker Carl Albert (D-Okla.), pledged the support of Congress "in restoring the eminence of the American-flag fleet."

House Majority Leader Hale Boggs (D-La.) joined the Seafarers in denouncing Nixon's suspension of the 50-percent grain cargo rule.

"It is appalling to think that over 6 percent of the nation's work force is unemployed," he said, "yet Nixon waives this rule which would insure employment for American merchant seamen."

'Advocates' TV Series Pinpoints Fallacies of Philadelphia Plan

Serious flaws in the Philadelphia Plan, which sets racial quotas in hiring workers for federal construction projects, were pinpointed in the nationwide television program, the Advocates.

The one-hour show, aired over the Public Broadcast Service network, explored the question: Should the Philadelphia Plan be extended to all federal and federally assisted construction projects?

While proponents of the extension claimed the plan has been a partial success, black Philadelphia construction workers in filmed testimony termed the plan of little value—and in many ways detrimental to Negroes.

Because contractors had to meet racial quotas on certain projects, a number of black workers were shifted from their old jobs—thereby hurting their chances for advancement in their previous positions, one worker pointed out.

All of the workers—from their first-hand experience — opposed either continuation or extension of federally imposed quotas on hiring.

The case against the extension of the plan was presented by Prof. Howard B. Miller, of the University of Southern California. He was assisted by in-studio testimony from AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director Donald Slaiman and Executive Director Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

Advocating the plan's extension were Denver lawyer Leonard Davies, Prof. James E. Jones, Jr. of the University of Wisconsin, and Herbert Hill, national labor director of the NAACP.

Rustin termed the Philadelphia Plan "a cruel hoax" on the black people because of phony quotas which only give the appearance of job opportunities but lack job security.

There are only two ways to increase the minority representation in the construction trades, Rustin stressed. These are through apprenticeship programs for younger workers and through the upgrading of older workers as journeymen.

Slaiman pointed out that the building trades unions operated programs for the training of minority group members long before the Philadelphia Plan was imposed.

He noted that since organized labor incorporated its Apprenticeship Outreach efforts with civil rights organizations, the number of minority workers in all building trades increased from less than 2.5 percent to more than 11 percent.

The Philadelphia Plan has brought a lot of publicity and ballyhoo to the Nixon Administration but nothing of value for the blacks, Slaiman observed.

Rustin cited the shortcomings of the Philadelphia Plan by comparing its performance to the progress of programs like Outreach. Through these voluntary efforts, he noted, more than 9,000 black and other minority apprentices have been placed in skilled trades.

Further progress can not be made by displacing white workers, Rustin said in stressing that there must be enough jobs available for all.

Advocate Davies contended that the building trades unions are not moving fast enough to increase the representation of blacks in their ranks. He said that extension of the Philadelphia Plan is the only solution.

Hill admitted that the Philadelphia Plan has been only a partial success but claimed unions were trying to sabotage it.

Miller, however, questioned the claims of even partial success because the Labor Dept., which oversees the plan, could not substantiate the number of gains by black workers, he noted.

W. A. Lazzerini Dies, Headed Molders Union

Cincinnati—William A. Lazzerini, president of the Molders since 1960 and a vice president of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. died here at 65 after a seven-month illness. Union officers including new Pres. Draper Doyal attended last rites at the W. Mack Johnson funeral Home June 28.

Lazzerini was the 14th president of the 112-year-old union and recently was presented with a pin marking his 45 years of union membership.

Two weeks before his death, he resigned because of his ill health and the board named Doyal, then first vice president, to succeed him.

Survivors include Lazzerini's wife Betty, two sons and five grandchildren.

Born in Niles, Calif., Lazzerini joined San Francisco Local 164 after completing his apprentice training in 1926. He became a field organizer in 1938, was elected seventh vice president of the Molders in 1942.

After serving as chief field officer in the western states, he became director of organizing and acting editor of the Molders' Journal in 1959. The following year he was elected president.

Doyal, from Chattanooga, has been a union member for more than 30 years. He will be a candidate for a full term as president at the union convention here Aug. 2.

Major Organizing Drive Opens for VA Employes

The Government Employes and five other AFL-CIO affiliates launched one of the biggest organizing drives in labor history with a petition seeking a nationwide election to pick a bargaining representative for more than 138,000 employes of the Veterans Administration.

About 88,000 of the VA workers are already represented by the petitioning unions—the bulk of them by locals of the Government Employes.

AFGE Pres. John F. Griner is president of the six-union council that is seeking national exclusive recognition; Richard E. Murphy, assistant to the president of the Service Employes, is secretary-treasurer of the council. The other participating unions, all with members at VA installations, are the Carpenters, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Fire Fighters and the Laborers.

Grimer reported that 108,445 non-professionals and 30,370 professionals will be eligible to vote at some 260 VA hospitals, centers and offices in the United States and abroad.

The determination of the bargaining unit and the date for the election will be made by W. J. Usery, Jr., assistant secretary of labor for labor-management relations.

Health Security Termed Boon to Nation's Cities

Philadelphia—By providing for comprehensive health service benefits for everyone, National Health Security would insure sound operating budgets for city-county hospitals, an AFL-CIO spokesman told the Annual Conference of Mayors here.

Richard E. Shoemaker, assistant director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Social Security, told conference participants that since all persons would receive the benefits, there would be no welfare cases or charity beds, but rather one standard of care for everyone in city-county hospitals.

"City-county hospitals are now the important link in health care services for the poor," said Shoemaker.

"The hospitals serve as family doctor, well-baby clinic, convalescent home, and sometimes only incidentally, as an acute care facility."

Shoemaker stressed what enactment of the Kennedy-Griffiths bill could do for municipalities and their residents, emphasizing that National Health Security is the "best answer to all the health care problems of America" and that "it will not cost more than health care now costs."

The plan would do much to help solve many other problems facing cities today, Shoemaker said. Specifically, he said, it would:

- Provide health care for the poor. Health Security would provide the same set of comprehensive health care benefits to all Americans—rich and poor. The saving in Medicaid payments would be nearly $3 billion for local governments alone.
- Get health care to the poor. Health Security would provide assistance to health professionals who locate in medically deprived areas. It would provide funds to develop comprehensive health service organizations that will best serve the entire population.

"It would not do this without you," Shoemaker told the mayors. "There is a very important planning role that local governments can perform best—and there is even federal reimbursement for city planning functions."

- Give health benefits to state and local government employes. The Kennedy-Griffiths bill would remove one major problem cities face in bargaining with their employes—health insurance. Municipal employes would receive benefits, but the cities would not have to pay the employers' tax.

O'Neal Re-Elected by Actors Group

New York—The Associated Actors & Artistes of America elected Frederick O'Neal to his first full two-year term as president and returned other officers to national posts.

O'Neal assumed office in 1970 on the death of Conrad Nagel. He has been president of Actors' Equity since 1964 and is an AFL-CIO vice president.

Serving with O'Neal are Vice Presidents Angus Duncan, John L. Dales, H. O'Neil Shanks, Penny Singleton, and De Lloyd Tibbs; Treas. Harold M. Hoffman and Executive Sec. Sanford I. Wolff.

Member unions besides Actors' Equity are the Screen Actors, Screen Extras, Television & Radio Artists, Musical Artists, Variety Artists, and the Hebrew and Italian actors' unions.

LABOR'S FIGHT for progressive social change is described by Federation Pres. George Meany during a League for Industrial Democracy Institute to acquaint students with the trade union movement. Meany is flanked by LID Executive Director Tom Kahn, right, and AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis.

Public Sector Proves Fertile for Organizing

Public employes are joining the labor movement in a surge not seen since the organizing waves of the 1930s, the American Federationist reports in its June issue.

In less than a decade, union membership has risen three-fold among employes of government at all levels—federal, state and local—the AFL-CIO's magazine says in "The Surge of Public Employe Unionism."

The report by David L. Perlman, assistant editor of the AFL-CIO News, dates the current push toward union organization from Jan. 17, 1962, when President John F. Kennedy's executive order on union recognition was announced.

As a catalyst to union organizing in the federal civil service, it was comparable to the Wagner Act of 1935—the original Labor Relations Act—in the private sector, the author points out.

Seven years later, by November of 1970, more than 1.5 million federal workers were protected by exclusive union recognition agreements—58 percent of the total federal workforce, excluding a few exempt offices such as the Central Intelligence Agency.

A mere chronology of the "phenomenal" growth of union organization in the public sector would make an impressive chapter in any labor history. But it is too soon for the book to go to press, he says, because "we are only midway through the chapter."

The article asserts that ground rules for public employe bargaining are "still evolving." Some state and local laws prohibiting public workers from organizing have been struck down as unconstitutional.

Legislatures that once debated whether to allow government administrators to "meet and confer" with employe organizations are now "considering how best to deal with impasses" in collective bargaining.

"Experience has shown them that such impasses cannot be overcome by punitive anti-strike laws," the author asserts.

One development last year was the "genuinely spontaneous walkout" by 200,000 postal workers in New York and other cities. It produced "direct, top-level labor-management negotiations; provided for a "big two-step pay raise that Congress subsequently approved," and "created a whole new structure of collective bargaining covering almost all aspects of employment for 600,000 workers as part of a semi-autonomous U.S. Postal Service."

The article cautions that "no matter how reasonable a bargaining procedure may appear on paper, collective bargaining is mocked without give and take at the bargaining table."

Outside of the postal service, the number of federal employes in exclusive bargaining units has soared to 916,000—48 percent of the total non-postal workforce and, excluding supervisors, more than 50 percent of those eligible for union membership.

Government-wide, 46 AFL-CIO unions plus Metal Trades Councils hold union recognition agreements, and 87 percent of all contract-covered federal employes are in AFL-CIO affiliates

Employes at the state and local levels, the article notes, have turned increasingly to organization also. It says "governors, mayors and county officials are coming to accept the premise contained in a booklet published last year by the Council of State Governments."

The booklet says "unions are here to stay . . . Unionism is on the rise . . . it tends to be more militant than in the past, and there is no legal way, nor few practical ways, to stop it."

Meany Cites Labor's Role For Progress

Labor has always been a force for progressive social change on "the very simple theory that what's good for all of America must be good for our members," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a labor-student institute sponsored by the League for Industrial Democracy.

The two-day institute held at federation headquarters in Washington was aimed at giving students an inside look at the trade union movement.

It was attended by more than 60 students from across the nation, and according to a league spokesman, the students left the session with a "newly awakened enthusiasm for the goals and programs of the labor movement."

Meany outlined the historic labor-supported legislative battles over extension of free public schooling, the enactment of unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation and the continuing fight to raise and extend minimum wage coverage.

"Frankly," Meany said, "in order to make a better life for the members of our unions, we've got to make a better life for all of the American people.

"Under our system of government, it's not possible, in my opinion, for one segment of American society to advance for any great length of time at the expense of the rest of the society," he said.

"I'm sure you'll find that labor's record, with regard to its social consciousness and its concern for the welfare of the country as a whole is a good one."

LID Executive Director Tom Kahn explained to the youthful audience how union leaders are elected by rank-and-file members and how the decentralized nature of the labor movement provides considerable autonomy at the local level.

AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis, who helped organize the program, described labor's aim of educating the worker so that he realizes his own economic interests.

Other speakers included AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger; Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller; William DuChessi, legislative director for the Textile Workers Union, and Roy Kirkley of the Rutgers University Labor Education Center.

Construction Wage Unit Approves 19 Contracts

The Construction Industry Stabilization Committee has approved 19 new agreements that had been negotiated by AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades unions.

One of the approved agreements covers the Plumbers & Pipefitters in a nationwide pipeline contract. Another covers 20 BCTD local unions in 11 crafts that operate in 36 counties in the Dallas-Fort Worth, Tex., area.

CISC Chairman John T. Dunlop also announced the rejection of one agreement that would have raised wages for Plumbers in Morgantown, W.Va., from $6.35 to $8.36 an hour over 12 months. The case was returned to the Piping Industry Wage Stabilization Board.

The two-year nationwide pipeline contract covers Plumbers in 32 states and sets a variable wage scale based on geographic area that ranges from $4.43 to $7.27 an hour.

The Texas multi-craft agreement calls for a $1.10 wage increase over two years for workers earning less than $5 an hour under the old agreement and a $1.40 increase for those earning more than $5.

Seventeen other approved agreements extending from 12 to 26 months provide for wage increases ranging from under 6 percent to about 18 percent, Dunlop reported.

Earlier, the CISC approved 37 wage and benefits contracts negotiated by BCTD unions.

The 37 earlier agreements were released in three groupings. Six agreements provided for an average annual rate of increase of 7 percent; another group of 10 contracts averaged an 8.8 percent annual increase, and a third group of 21 contracts averaged 6.1 percent a year.

While some of the contracts allowed for wage increases of more than 10 percent a year, one of the approved agreements called for no increase in wages.

Fabric of Our Nation

THE YEARS since the end of World War II have put a tremendous stress and strain on the American concept of fair play—the concept that is wrapped up in the civil liberties and civil rights that are the foundations of America.

There were the early 1950s, the years of rightwing-fomented fears and witchhunts of the McCarthy era. Tolerance hit a new low and many of our civil liberties were soiled and chipped away. But the basic fabric was strong and supple and the nation recovered from its momentary aberration.

There were the early 1960s when the civil rights movement launched a vigorous and sustained attack on denial and delay in giving every man his full rights and dignity. Long-standing barriers to decency and democracy for black Americans fell. A new concept of non-violent civil disobedience was tested, stretching the fabric a bit but without any serious distortions.

There were the late 1960s, the years of a leftwing-triggered assault on the structures and institutions of American democracy, which touched off a defense that at times threatened the classic freedoms and the essential right of dissent.

IN THE 1970s new dangers are emerging as the Administration relies more heavily on wire tapping, injunctions and other techniques that weaken the democratic fabric of the country.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a forum on privacy recently that while labor strives to protect civil liberties and to stem the invasion of personal privacy "new breaches in the dike continue to appear."

The American labor movement, he stressed, flatly rejects the notion "that the way to fight communism is to jettison the individual liberties that are an essential part of democracy, and to adopt the very tactics which make communism completely unacceptable to those who believe in human freedom. We do not believe communism can be defeated or democracy aided by suspending the Bill of Rights and the Fourteenth Amendment. We do not believe that communism can be defeated or democracy aided by undertaking to outlaw particular views and ideas, whether by governmental fiat or vigilante action."

ON THIS Independence Day it is perhaps more necessary than on most to recall the words that are part of the fabric of our nation—the words of the Declaration of Independence that set this country on its course.

"We hold these truths to be self-evident that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness—that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

A Word Edgewise:

Leaks of Classified Materials Flow from Gored Political Oxen

By John P. Roche

BY A STRANGE coincidence, just about the time the New York Times was proofreading the Pentagon Papers the Senate Judiciary Committee approved the nomination of Otto Otepka as a member of the Subversive Activities Control Board. A number of rightwingers looked on this as a vindication of Otepka, who had been fired by those wicked liberals over at the State Dept. for bootlegging classified information to congressional committees.

However, recent events may lead the Senate Judiciary Committee, and Pres. Nixon, who nominated Otepka to the SACB, to rethink their stance. If Otepka deserves a slot on the SACB for the trivia he leaked, surely the person who conveyed the Pentagon Papers to the Times merits a spot on the Federal Communications Commission.

And, in fairness, the Times and other papers that have been oozing with virtuous editorials about freedom of information and the absurdity of the classification system should immediately support Otepka's nomination. If leaking classified materials is a blow for freedom, you really can't exclude the late Joe McCarthy's "loyal American underground" from the warrior band.

This thought is not advanced in any cynical spirit, but rather to make the point—that has been obscured in the rhetorical mist—that as usual in American politics one's views on leaking classified material tend to depend, in FDR's phrase, on "whose child has the measles." Let us therefore try to escape from an atmosphere dominated by editors reciting Milton, and government lawyers predicting the end of the bureaucratic world, and take a hard look at the real questions.

First, has the publication of these documents endangered "national security?" The answer: of course not. Anyone who has even a reasonably specialized knowledge of events in 1964 knows, and has known for years, that there were contingency plans being considered to deal with the worsening Vietnamese situation.

The documents have provided a lot of background. One can argue that their publication was imprudent, but that is an entirely different question.

Second, has the publication of these documents damaged the operation of the government? This is a tricky one, particularly since one of the worst tendencies in the State and Defense Departments was to overclassify just about everything.

I was convinced, for example, that certain men stamped their missives "Top Secret" just to attract attention, presumably figuring that nobody would bother to read a merely "Confidential" memo. Yet, at the same time, if one expects high government officials to lay their convictions, however unpopular they may be, on the line, there should be some guarantee that confidentiality will be maintained. One of the unfortunate by-products of Joe McCarthy's "loyal American underground" was that dissenters in the State Dept. kept their views to themselves.

Part of the historical bias built into the Pentagon Papers arose from the fact that such old hands as Dean Rusk and Lyndon Johnson profoundly distrusted the security system. Rusk was known to sit down and type up his "eyes only" memos to the President, and the latter openly took the view that to send any sensitive material to the State Dept. was to guarantee its publication in the next morning's paper.

NOBODY EVER SENT the minutes of the Tuesday lunches—where crucial decisions were hammered out—anywhere except to the White House files. As mentioned here before, when Pres. Johnson wanted opinions, he sidestepped the system. In November 1967, for example, he canvassed a number of advisers on a radical de-escalation of the war, but no word of it leaked out.

Publication of the documents will undoubtedly encourage bureaucrats to be more noncommittal in their memoranda and will probably stimulate Pres. Nixon to follow the Johnson-Rusk format. (Nixon's "National Security Council System," which has papers flowing up, down, and sideways, is a sitting duck for an ambitious leaker.) But we can survive on that basis.

In short, given the paranoia that has been generated, I think the full Pentagon history should be turned over to a special congressional committee. I stand pat on my thesis that there is nothing to hide.

Keyed to Cost Controls:

Health Security Fully Answers Nation's Medical Care Needs

The following is excerpted from "National Health Security: A Clear Answer" by Andrew J. Biemiller in the June 1971 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

IF WE ARE TO PROPERLY use our experience to develop a national health insurance system, then we must also examine the failures of the present system.

The private health insurance industry is one of these failures. Its record in coverage, benefits, service, cost control and quality control is pathetic.

Insurance companies have taken a "public-be-damned" attitude about cost and quality controls. Hospital and doctor bills are almost always paid without question. When medical costs go up, insurance premiums go up, because the insurance companies are also paid on a "cost-plus" basis. And when insurance premiums go up, our problems in obtaining good contracts for our members also escalate.

The "plus" for insurance companies last year amounted to more than $2 billion. Of the $14 billion insurance companies collected in premiums, they used $2 billion for advertising, executive salaries, commissions, overhead and profit. We think that $2 billion should go for health care. No corporation should make a profit out of health care.

Insurance companies have resisted quality controls. They don't want to know how many operations are unnecessary, because that might force them to lower insurance premiums.

Look at the future of the insurance companies—premiums are expected to double in five years, while the amount of the patient's health bill that will be covered will increase only slightly.

The Wall Street Journal reported recently that insurance companies have figured out a new way to control costs—they are planning to increase the cancellation of policies of subscribers who make too many claims. In other words, if you get real sick, you're financially dead.

The private insurance industry has its staunch supporters. It even has its own bill. As a matter of fact, Pres. Nixon's proposal is a financial bail-out amounting to billions of dollars for private, profit-making insurance companies.

The facts do not justify giving private insurance companies a huge windfall of federal money to continue doing an inadequate job of protecting Americans.

Patients really have very little to do with medical costs except pay them. It is the doctor, not the patient, who decides which patients need to be treated and where and for what fee. It is the doctor who decides who should enter the hospital and for what and for how long. It is the doctor who prescribes what drugs the patient should purchase and whether the price will be $5 for a brand name product or $1 for an equivalent generic drug.

If we want to control medical costs, we must begin with the doctor—not the patient.

A national financing mechanism—fair and equitable contributions by employers, employes, the self-employed and the federal government—will provide the money. Then we set up a comprehensive benefit structure, covering all physicians' and surgeons' services and all hospital services. And all of those bills will be paid directly by National Health Security on a fair, equitable basis in accordance with established schedules. Quality controls will protect the consumer and prevent unnecessary surgery and hospitalization.

People will be encouraged to take physical examinations because they will not be charged for them. Illnesses will be detected and treated early. Patients won't have to go into the hospital for treatments that can be performed just as well in a doctor's office.

Preventive medicine and early diagnosis and treatment are the basic principles of prepaid group practice. Prepaid group practice works—and works well. It is less costly to the patient; more efficient for the doctors; better in terms of health because unnecessary surgery is eliminated. The patient is treated as a whole human being—not an arm at one doctor, the chest some place else and the eyes at still another.

NATIONAL HEALTH SECURITY will provide sufficient funds to increase the number of prepaid group practice plans and expand existing ones to serve more people. Prepaid group practice plans operate on a budget—figuring the total health care needs of their patients and living within that budget.

Health Security will operate in a similar manner. An annual budget would set the limit of medical care costs. If charges are more than budgeted amounts, then payments will be pro-rated. At no time will health care be denied anyone. Health Security would live within its budget. No other proposal now before Congress has cost controls.

Some of the other proposals may cost less in terms of federal dollars, but what they don't tell you is that their health plans are going to do much less.

It doesn't matter whether the money comes straight out of our pockets or out of our tax dollars—health care is still going to cost money.

What happens when we all put our money together into a national system like National Health Security is that we can begin to control costs. We'll have the financial leverage to reform the health care delivery system.

And without cost controls and needed reforms in how health care is delivered, the cost of medical care is going to continue to soar and bring financial ruin to American families.

Jobs Program Vital:

Nixon's 4% Jobless Rate Goal Means 3.5 Million Unemployed

THE NIXON ADMINISTRATION'S stated willingness to accept a national unemployment rate of 4 percent is totally unacceptable to organized labor because 3.5 million Americans would still be out of work, AFL-CIO Economist Frank Pollara declared.

Pollara, assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Research, said the labor movement rejects the idea that a jobless force that size is "a tolerable rate of unemployment." He declined to speculate as to what would be an "irreducible minimum" unemployment level, but indicated the area of 2 percent would be much more realistic than the President's 4 percent figure.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Pollara urged implementation of a national manpower policy centered on job-creation in both the private and public sectors of the economy. He said that a "public service employment program" should be a "fundamental feature" of national manpower policy.

"Public service employment . . . is not a welfare program," the union spokesman asserted, but the creation of opportunities for productive and necessary work in libraries, educational systems, parks and other public facilities, particularly for unemployed, underemployed and disadvantaged workers, regardless of whether or not they happen to receive welfare assistance.

Pollara agreed that putting a time limit on public service employment, as the Administration proposed, would have the effect of "legislating a dead-end job," particularly now, when unemployment stands at 6.2 percent of the work force and shows few signs of substantial improvement in the immediate future.

RATHER THAN a "transmission belt" to a non-existent job in the private sector, Pollara said, public service jobs should offer a chance for permanent employment, in which "the individual could move right on up the scales in whatever department of government service is involved, or leave and take a job in the private sector."

Pollara was questioned by Don Finley of United Press International and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine.

By Press Associates, Inc.

ONE OF THE MAIN DEMANDS made by supporters of a national health insurance program is that it have adequate "cost control" requirements.

This is not merely a bookkeeping obsession. It is based on the bitter experience of the past years which have shown medical costs soaring to unattainable heights and unfortunate experience with Medicare and Medicaid. These have shown a number of doctors—not all but an unfortunately high number—willing to take advantage of the legislation to fill their own pocketbooks.

Organized labor has been particularly insistent that cost control be an important and integral part of the health security legislation now before Congress. It is in favor of the Kennedy-Griffiths bill for a number of reasons but especially for its cost control features without which the proposed legislation will become a "mockery."

"If we want to control medical costs, then it is apparent that the doctor—not the patient—is where we must begin," a labor spokesman told Congress.

And it is here that past experience has taught a harsh lesson:

- Medical care costs are increasing twice as fast as other costs borne by the public.
- Medicare cost $7.1 billion in 1970 and this covered only those over 65.
- Medicaid for the needy cost $5 billion.

In these cases, the costs attributed to doctors' fees and hospital charges were far above those that had been estimated when the programs were first begun. A tremendous boost in doctors' fees and hospital bills set in almost immediately after the programs went into effect. In some cases scandalous bills were submitted to the government necessitating an increase in premiums paid by the elderly.

The deep concern of supporters of medical security insurance is further justified by reports on the average earnings of doctors and the soaring costs of hospital care.

A recent study of the incomes of doctors in the metropolitan Washington area shows that doctors' incomes there have soared far beyond the already rising cost of living. The study showed that the average net income for physicians jumped 33 percent between 1965 and 1969 as compared with an increase of 11.3 percent for the overall boost in living costs.

PHYSICIANS' INCOME averaged $38,848 during 1969, compared with $24,419 for lawyers, $17,521 for dentists, $16,000 for architects and $13,626 for engineers.

Orthopedic and neurosurgeons were in the top group with incomes of $80,000 or more. Internists averaged $40,136 and general surgeons $49,400.

Side by side with booming doctors' fees has been an astronomical rise in hospital costs—an average of 15 percent a year. In Washington, for example, one hospital reported an average daily charge of $135 in 1970 which boomed to $147.22 during the first half of this year. Six years ago the average charge at the city's 14 private general hospitals was $70 a day. It is now $112.

Inflation of all sorts in the economy is blamed by hospital administrators for their soaring rates. Nevertheless, medical experts believe that hospitals, working together with doctors, can cut drastically into costs by a more rational system of hospital care.

"Cost control" sounds like a very dull subject. Yet, it is absolutely vital for the success of a national health security program.

Unionists are the last people in the world to question the dictum that "the workman is worthy of his hire," but they are realists, too. They have warned that the surest way to kill the urgently needed health insurance program is to permit its destruction through inadequate measures to control highly unjust and inequitable costs.

LABOR REJECTS the Administration's stated willingness to accept a 4 percent national unemployment rate, declared Frank Pollara, center, assistant director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Research, on the network radio interview Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Donald Finley, left, of United Press International and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual network.

Some Fancy Food Substitutes Selling at Exaggerated Prices

By Sidney Margolius

LIKE A SECOND HELPING of analog for breakfast? No doubt you soon will if you haven't already. If you do, it would be only fair that you know (1) what you are getting, and (2) not be fooled into paying an exaggerated price.

Analogs are foods that resemble other foods in appearance, taste and texture. Some people call them imitation foods. We prefer to call them analogs so as not to downgrade them excessively since they can be worthwhile extenders for expensive meat if not overpriced or hidden under fake names.

Most of the analogs now beginning to come on the market are vegetable-protein substitutes for meat, most often soy protein. The manufacturers have developed their technology to the point where they can take soybean derivatives, add synthetic flavorings, coloring and vitamins and make what tastes and looks like beef stroganoff, chicken a la king, bacon and other meat-like foods.

There is nothing wrong with using cheap vegetable protein to supplement meat. In fact, moderate-income families would be less dependent on the livestock industry with its tendency to control supplies to keep up prices. One manufacturer points out that an acre of land can produce 450 pounds of soy protein, but only 43 pounds of animal protein.

Thus, while vegetable protein is not as "complete" in vital amino acids as animal foods such as meat, fish, cheese and eggs, it could be used to "stretch" the costlier animal foods.

But if it is used not merely as an extender, but as a substitute, the nutritional value is more questionable. And if manufacturers get away with not revealing clearly that these are vegetable products, they can get away with charging a meat price.

As Helen Nelson, executive director of the Illinois Consumer Association, has pointed out, if adding soybean extender to hamburger, for example, makes it lower in cost, then the savings should be passed on to the consumer and should not result merely in more profit for the processor. The consumer has a right to know whether he is getting such extenders, and how much, this forthright consumer spokesman warns.

Already some manufacturers are charging a high price for the new analogs now coming into the stores. One of the most noticeable examples is Lipton's "one-pot main dish" products such as "beef stroganoff," "chicken supreme" and "chicken baronet." These have soy protein added to the meat or chicken.

In our own tests of these products, we found, for example, that the "chicken baronet" yielded about four ounces of chicken. That is what the package means when it says "lots of chicken" for "two adult-size" servings. We calculated that this much chicken and the other ingredients of the "chicken" sauce, such as soy protein, starch and nonfat dry milk, are worth about 23 cents.

The rest of the package consists of three ounces of noodles. If you deduct the value of the other ingredients from the 79-cent cost of the package you find you are paying 56 cents for the noodles, or at a rate of $2.99 a pound.

VEGETABLE ANALOGS also increasingly are being used in soup mixes and as a substitute for bacon strips or bits such as those sold under the BacOs and Stripples brand names. The Stripples, made of wheat and soy protein, were given a market test recently at a price set to be under that of bacon. There is some disagreement as to whether the product actually tastes like bacon but consumers found Stripples "acceptable," the U. S. Agriculture Dept. has reported.

One of the most preposterous prices for a vegetable-protein analog is that for the new Betty Crocker PeprOs and SausOs sold as garnishes. At 79 cents for a 3¼-ounce jar, these products have a true cost of about $4 a pound.

As you can see from these examples, consumers can get a real economic rooking, if not also reduced nutrition, if these foods are not adequately labeled, or if they are not up to normal nutritional value.

Because of the impending flood of analogs the Food & Drug Administration has proposed standards for "textured protein products." The standards would relieve the manufacturers from present requirements to label products "imitation." Instead, a processor could say, for example, "textured protein product with a hamburger-like flavor."

Unfortunately, the proposed regulations would not protect consumers from being misled if they do not also require that manufacturers clearly say vegetable protein in the product names. The regulations would require manufacturers to state on the label the names of all ingredients. But in my experience most consumers do not realize that these small-print lists really reveal the amounts of ingredients in descending order by weight.

High Price of Water:

Fruit Drink Makers To Specify Contents

THOSE LOW-COST fruit drinks that seem like such a great summer bargain are more expensive than shoppers think. Instead of paying a low price for juice, they're paying a high price for water.

Consumer writers have been pointing that fact out for a long time but their contention will be proven when new regulations go into effect that disclose the percentage of pure juice in diluted beverages.

The Food & Drug Administration has an agreement now with citrus growers and processors for new labels to show just how much orange juice is in drinks marked orange drink, orange-juice drink or orangeade.

Meanwhile, Hi-C beverages, which were attacked by the Federal Trade Commission earlier for making unfounded nutritional claims for their product, has done an about-face.

Coca-Cola, which makes Hi-C, has written to Mrs. Virginia Knauer, special assistant to the President for consumer affairs, that the firm will "offer consumer label information which will help in their purchase decisions."

The new labels on Hi-C cherry-flavored drink, citrus cooler grape drink, apple drink and orange drink will list the percentage of juice along with other contents in order of major ingredients.

The labels will show that the cherry-flavored drink contains "not less than 2 percent cherry juice;" the citrus cooler, "not less than 1 percent orange juice;" the grape drink, "not less than 10 percent grape juice;" the apple drink, "not less than 30 percent apple juice," and the orange drink, "not less than 10 percent orange juice."

The rest of the label shows water, sugar and corn syrup are the major ingredients, along with the particular kind of juice, plus fumaric and citric acids, Vitamin C and in some cases U.S. certified color.

A little arithmetic will show it's cheaper to run the tap and add the water to concentrated orange, grape and apple juices.

In other consumer action, the FTC has taken the limelight by issuing a regulation that manufacturers must be able to prove the claims they make for their products.

FTC CONSUMER Protection Director Robert Pitofsky says the FTC won't go after "puffery" that says a product will "give you sex-appeal" or "tastes like rainbows." They'll test car makers first, said the FTC, not because those ads are more deceptive "but because auto makers advertise so widely."

Congress has shown some renewed signs of life on consumer legislation. The Senate has passed a warranty and guarantee bill that will cover products costing more than $5. Guarantees will have to be written to conform to federal standards.

The bill also calls for additional powers for the FTC including preliminary injunctive powers to stop businesses from engaging in unfair practices, to assess civil penalties up to $10,000 per violation, to seek court action to gain other remedies for injured consumers such as money refunds and to issue new regulations declaring certain business practices as unfair or deceptive.

Two other consumer measures—one giving consumers the right to file class action suits in federal courts and the other establishing an independent consumer affairs agency—are languishing in congressional committees. (PAI).

Soup to Nonsense:

'Too Good to Be True' Reports Of Happy But Unlikely Tales

By Jane Goodsell

MISS DOLORES O'SCANLON received a letter from her bank informing her that her checking account was overdrawn by $29.76. According to Miss O'Scanlon's own reckoning she had $35.89 in her account, and she wrote an indignant letter to the bank telling them so. The next day she received a contrite telephone call from a second vice president. He told Miss O'Scanlon that her figures were 100 percent correct, and begged her forgiveness for the bank's inexcusable inefficiency.

Alicia Morrison invited eight guests to a 7 o'clock dinner party at her house. Dinner was served promptly at 7:30, and late arrivals were told they were too late for cocktails.

When Gus Morrison, an enthusiastic fisherman, departed for a day of fly-casting on the Umqua River he told his wife to be sure to have the frying pan sizzling hot and ready for the mess of trout he'd be bringing home for dinner. At 6 o'clock Gus arrived home with his creel brimful of speckled browns and rainbows.

Mrs. Alphonse McIntyre telephoned the plumber, Henry Bagley, to tell him that her washing machine was on the blink and was sloshing water all over the floor. Mr. Bagley assured her that he would be at her house first thing the next morning to fix it. Sure enough, at the stroke of 8, Mrs. McIntyre's doorbell rang and there, just as he had promised, was Mr. Bagley.

Peggy Greeley, a 13-year-old high school freshman, was told by her mother to make her bed and clean up her room immediately. Peggy promised to do it in a few minutes, just as soon as she had finished putting up her hair. The minute Peggy put the last roller in place, she made her bed and cleaned up her room just as she'd promised.

Votes on Welfare, Food for Strikers

The AFL-CIO termed welfare reform "long overdue" and supported its passage by the House on June 22.

COLUMN I shows the key 234-187 defeat of an amendment which would have killed the program. On labor's scorecard, the 141 Democrats and 93 Republicans who opposed the amendment were Right (R); the 104 Democrats and 83 Republicans who tried to block the program voted Wrong (W).

COLUMN II shows the 225-172 vote on June 23 which defeated a motion to deny food stamps to strikers and their families.

Labor strongly supported the position of the 181 Democrats and 44 Republicans who cast Right votes (R) against penalizing needy strikers: the 48 Democrats and 124 Republicans who voted for the amendment were Wrong (W).

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH PROGRAM for 11,000 Rubber Workers in nine B. F. Goodrich Co. plants is launched with the signing of a contract with Harvard University's School of Public Health. From left are J. Latin Unionists Seen Hope for Social Gains

Graduates of the 36th class of the American Institute of Free Labor Development were told that their efforts in training other "grassroots leaders" are essential in achieving social reform and economic growth.

John Hugh Crimmins, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, urged the 44 trade unionists from Latin America and the Caribbean to work for the "total development of their community, region and nation."

By training other labor leaders, organizing unions and improving collective bargaining, these union leaders will be helping build "those institutions which will be able to support the weight and strain of freedom," he said.

Crimmins stressed that "social reforms do not result from good intentions at the top of society," but from "organized pressures surging from the base of society."

He pointed out that higher wages mean increased purchasing power to support increased production and economic growth. And strong union organizations can influence governments to pass reforms necessary to build a new social structure.

Crimmins noted that the 1,000th graduate of AIFLD's training programs was in this class, and said that the importance of that fact lay in the "multiplier effect." Graduates have made possible field training courses for several hundred thousand others, multiplying their skills throughout Latin America and the Caribbean.

Leslie Melville of Guyana spoke for the members of the class from Caribbean nations in thanking AIFLD for giving them the tools to create "the kind of society in our respective territories that will forever afford the working man dignity and a just reward for his labor."

Atilio Oscar Alvarez of Argentina, speaking for the Latin American members of the class, underscored the need to "improve not only working conditions and living conditions of the working man but also to promote the economic development of our nations as a basic prerequisite to the social progress on our continent."

Charles B. Wood, education director of AIFLD, addressed the graduation luncheon. He emphasized the importance of worker education programs in developing understanding, ending prejudices, and building tolerance and confidence.

In All Activities:

ILO Delegates Call for Full Union-Employer Participation

Geneva—The 121-nation International Labor Organization's annual conference called for the close association of trade unions and employer groups over the "entire range" of ILO activities.

ILO's "tripartite" framework, insuring the representation of workers and employers as well as of governments, alone guarantees that the United Nations agency will continue to "make its unique contribution to securing economic equality and social justice," the conference proclaimed at its three-week session.

The so-called worker and employer delegates of the Communist countries lockstepped with the government delegates by abstaining when the conference adopted the resolution.

The Communist bloc was alone in its opposition to the reaffirmation of tripartism because, Poland's government spokesman Wlodzimierz Nadorf explained, it was "unable to have equal rights" under this structure.

The complaint was aimed at the free workers and employers who refuse to recognize the worker and employer delegates named by the Communist governments as anything but spokesmen for their rulers.

"It is no accident that it is the delegates from countries where there is no freedom of association, where the trade unions are controlled and dominated by the government, who are least enthusiastic about tripartism," Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO Department of Social Security, told the conference.

In other worker-initiated actions the conference denounced apartheid in South Africa as a "particularly inhuman and degrading form of racism," and outlined action to promote equal social security rights for migrant worker.

Because of the workers' concern with the problems raised by multi-national companies that can shift production from one country to another, the conference called on the ILO Governing Body to convene "as soon as possible" a special meeting to deal with the subject.

Edward J. Hickey, Jr., general counsel of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept., sparked an angry protest from Czechoslovak government delegate Josef Siktano. It came just before the conference adopted a committee report blacklisting Czechoslovakia for failing to abide by her ILO commitment to bar political discrimination in employment.

Hickey had pointed out that instead of acknowledging the findings of independent ILO experts, Czechoslovakia had followed the usual Communist tactic of branding the experts as "wrong."

Siktano's appeal to have Hickey ruled out of order on a technical point was rejected by conference chairman Pierre Waline of France.

Communist attempts to reshape the ILO to its aims were again rebuffed when the conference adopted a report by its committee on structure. Rudolph Faupl, who headed the AFL-CIO conference team as U.S. worker delegate, sat on this key committee.

The conference put in the record that the Communist demands for changes in the ILO constitution had made no headway and that the issues raised should not be formally raised again before the 1973 session.

On the technical items on its agenda the conference adopted a convention, or treaty, setting out new international standards for protesting workers from on-the-job hazards of benzene, a particularly dangerous chemical used in many industrial processes and products.

S. Frank Raftery, president of the Painters, and Thomas E. Murphy, Bricklayers president, helped draft the 14 articles that went into the convention.

A second convention spelling out the "facilities" to be assured inside the plant to union spokesmen in order to "enable them to carry on their functions promptly and efficiently" was also adopted. Charles F. West, Machinists vice president, served on the committee that drafted this treaty.

The two conventions become legally binding on governments upon ratification.

The impact of trade liberalization policies on employment in the industrialized countries is to be considered by the ILO when developing employment programs, according to a directive by a conference committee which included Miles Stanley, president of the West Virginia AFL-CIO.

Kirkland Calls Squeeze Tightest Since 1930s

Los Angeles—America's workers are struggling to free themselves from the tightest economic bind since the 1930s, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the Industrial Relations Research Association.

"They are being squeezed simultaneously by inflation and recession," he noted. And in an effort to correct these conditions, "it should not surprise anyone that they are applying some pressure of their own, both at the bargaining table and in the legislative arena."

Higher wage settlements are being pressed in every industry to offset the steady erosion of workers' buying power, he pointed out.

At the same time, he stressed, workers are demanding "basic changes in government economic policies because they resent being victimized by the mistakes of policy makers."

Kirkland traced the economic woes of workers to Pres. Nixon's "game plan" and the government's foreign trade and investment policies, which are encouraging the export of American jobs, technology and productive capacity.

"Since Pres. Nixon took office, one of the cherished articles of faith of classical economics has been exploded," Kirkland noted. "We have learned that an engineered recession will not necessarily halt inflation, no matter what the textbooks say."

The burden of rising prices and declining purchasing power is falling heavily on all the nation's workers—both blue-collar and white-collar alike, Kirkland said.

He recalled that two years ago the President's economic advisers said that their policies were not intended to hurt workers.

"But every move they have made has been at the expense of workers," Kirkland stressed. "And now they are saying that workers are the cause of the nation's economic difficulties."

"They blame inflation on inflation's chief victims. They blame unemployment on those who are losing their jobs. They blame high prices on those who cannot afford to pay them."

And while trying to hold down wages and restrict the buying power of workers, the Administration ignores the profit boom of the nation's big banks and other inflationary factors.

"When they talk about measures needed to suppress inflation, they never refer to bank profits, interest rates, dividends, expense accounts, rents, insurance rates, doctors' fees, hospital charges and executive stock options," Kirkland said.

Instead, "they save their ammunition for wages."

Kirkland outlined the steps needed to accelerate the economy and to prevent further deterioration of the society.

Besides a labor-backed public services jobs program, he said the nation's money supply must be expanded and interest rates reduced to spur the economy.

He also called for the funding and implementing of government programs for education, health care, community facilities and middle- and low-income housing.

The roots of the nation's foreign trade problems are in mushrooming multinational corporations, most of which are based in the United States, Kirkland said.

These companies "are conducting foreign trade by their own rules, for their own corporate benefit, without regard to the welfare of the United States and its people," he warned.

Trade Adjustment Aid Approved For 4,600 Displaced by Imports

More than 4,600 workers who lost their jobs because of foreign imports have been certified as eligible to apply for trade adjustment assistance under the Trade Expansion Act of 1962.

The certifications came from the Labor Dept. after Pres. Nixon broke tie votes of the Tariff Commission. He ruled in favor of assistance for 2,700 members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers at the RCA plant in Memphis; 800 IUE members at the Emerson TV plant in Jersey City, and 1,160 members of the Shoe Workers at plants in Haverhill, Mass., North Brookfield, Mass., and Manchester, N.H.

The two unions filed petitions with the Tariff Commission after the plants were closed because of imports of shoes and electronic parts, such as TV and radio sets and equipment. Commission members voted 2-2 and thus failed to decide whether plant closings were caused by increased imports resulting in major part from trade agreement concessions.

The unions appealed to the President, who has the authority under the law to break such ties. He ruled in all the cases that the decision of those members who voted to find injury should be the official finding of the commission.

The Memphis plant of RCA Corp. was closed in January and the Emerson plant a year ago as a result, the union said, of increased imports of monochrome and color TV receivers.

Similar rulings by the commission and the President followed closings of these shoe manufactories: the Manchester plant of Foot Flairs, Inc., where 400 workers lost their jobs in November 1969; the Haverhill plant of the Ornsteen Shoe Co., where 225 workers were laid off in October 1970; the North Brookfield plant of the Kleven Shoe Sales Co., which closed in November 1970 and laid off 460 employes; the Sinclair Shoe Co., which also shut down last November with a loss of 75 jobs in Haverhill.

Assistance to unemployed workers under the Trade Act provides for cash readjustment allowances, testing, counseling, training and job placement, and relocation if needed and desired. The cash allowance for certified workers is 65 percent of the average weekly wage to a maximum of $87 a week.

The Labor Dept. said payment to workers is "expected to be for appreciably less than the full 52-week period" allowed for layoff pay.

The Shoe Workers and the Boot & Shoe union have filed petitions for assistance on behalf of 11,500 men and women made jobless by the closing of 56 plants in the last 15 months. No petition got a favorable ruling from the Tariff Commission, they reported.

Aerospace Jobs Wiped Out by Cutback

3-Year Toll Set At Half Million In California

DESPERATE FOR WORK, 700 applicants queued up for four job openings at a San Fernando Valley utility office.

Los Angeles—A few months ago Jim Munroe was a maintenance analyst for North American Rockwell's Autonetics plant in Anaheim making $235 a week inspecting 10,000 tiny electronic parts on each computer the company operated.

Now he inspects 55 kinds of doughnuts he helps make as the owner of a small food franchise shop in nearby Costa Mesa.

But two other former North American research engineers, each earning about $300 a week, are drawing $65 a week jobless benefits, and these men—Stanley Turnbull and Harry Phillips—are, like Jim Munroe, facing the grim fact that there is no end in sight for the depression which has hit the nation's aerospace industry.

That fact of life has also hit hundreds of thousands of other workers, many of whom were recruited in recent years by the giant aerospace corporations from relatively steady jobs by such inducements as attractively printed, multi-colored brochures showing the plush living possible in a mild California climate.

Stan and Louise Lewton, for instance, had been pretty well fixed in New Baltimore, Mich., making $10,000 a year and living contentedly with their four children in an old but attractive rambling home on an acre of land.

After 15 years as a skilled tool and die maker, Lewton decided to head West, taking a job with North American which had held out the promise of paying him more than $10,000 in just a few years.

He lives in a small, rented house in Torrance, waiting for the upward rise in his fortunes, when, instead, he was laid off and he has been pounding the pavement looking for another job.

This page represents another in a series of features by the AFL-CIO News as a prelude to the conference on the nation's unemployment problem scheduled by the federation for July 12-13 in Washington.

The aerospace industry employment peaked in March 1968, when 1,431,000 men and women held jobs and the newspapers were still filled with ads beseeching more workers to join the industry.

In California, there were 616,200 people in the industry, or nearly half of the national total.

The national unemployment rate was then 3.7 percent, while California, with its highly transient population, was somewhat higher, with a jobless rate of 4.7 percent.

But then things started falling apart. Defense cutbacks were made, space programs were curtailed, gradually at first. But by the time Pres. Nixon took office in January 1969, the downhill plunge had really started, and it accelerated rapidly thereafter.

Within two years—by December 1970—national aerospace industry employment was down to 1,069,000, which meant that there were 362,000 fewer people working in the industry.

Current predictions are that by the end of this year, there will be only 943,000 workers left to produce all of this nation's aerospace products, or 488,000 fewer than there were in March 1968.

With such huge layoffs, overall unemployment naturally rose, too, and without other economic stimulation and growth in the nation's economy, the laid-off aerospace workers had no place to go.

California's jobless rate now is 7.4 percent (as of May 1971), while the national unemployment rate is 6.2 percent.

The heavy unemployment put special unemployment benefit programs at North American and McDonnell Douglas Corp., into bankruptcy, which meant that laid-off workers received jobless benefits through regular state funds, but no supplemental benefits negotiated for them by their unions.

The continuing layoffs at North American, along with the threatened bankruptcy of the entire Lockheed Corp.—not just its SUB plan—comes as the nation's two major aerospace unions start negotiating new contracts.

Both the Machinists and the Auto Workers have pledged not to let the depressed state of some aerospace firms put remaining aerospace workers in an equally depressed state while they're still on the job. But there is wide agreement that negotiations this year are going to be tough.

The massive layoffs are also producing hundreds of special studies, speeches by government officials, and conferences aimed at trying to find work for more than a third of the nation's largest manufacturing industry.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson was in Los Angeles recently to tell jobless aerospace skilled workers and engineers that their "most realistic course is for you to move into other areas of the country or the economy."

The problem, Hodgson explained, is that the country is "clearly in the midst of reordering its priorities," and the Nixon Administration is now putting "increased emphasis on such things as health, environment, housing, welfare and other programs," but not aerospace work.

All sorts of new organizations are springing up to help: Experience Unlimited, the Aerospace Technology Applications Committee, Talent Plus, Inc., and a few thousand people are being helped.

In California, Gov. Ronald Reagan has been concentrating much of his time on getting people off welfare by changing eligibility rules, but union people say almost nothing has been done to get them jobs.

What is being done has made little impact on the unemployment problem. The first group of jobless aerospace workers retrained for new careers under a $2 million federal-state project was graduated last month, but only a third of the 100 students who finished the 13-week courses have jobs.

In previous slack times people moved from one company to another, so that when commercial sales were down, military buying was up and there was some hope for work.

After World War II, the industry ran into a massive slump period, and all attempts to diversify failed. Lockheed tried building bicycles and a few other unsuccessful ideas were used at other companies, but it wasn't until the 1960s that the buildup of the industry really hit its stride, having started up again with the Korean War a decade earlier.

Jim Munroe, now wearing a full-length apron and packing doughnuts into carry-out boxes, says he has learned a lesson from his experience of changing from computers to doughnuts: "Keep your eyes open for opportunities and don't let pride get in your way."

But for the hundreds of thousands of other jobless workers in aerospace, the advice is difficult to utilize. After all, how many doughnut shops can Southern California use?

Shoe Worker Trapped in Import Disaster Area

By Eugene A. Kelly

St. Louis—For several thousand workers in the shoe and leather industries, St. Louis is a disaster area, studded with defunct factories and overflowing with veteran craftsmen who fear their skills may never be a saleable commodity again.

In the not-too-distant past, shoe workers in this area were a proud segment of working society, producing enough footwear to fill a seemingly endless demand for millions of pairs a year.

The made-in-St. Louis shoe was once so well known that it was worth perhaps $1 a pair more to discriminating shoppers than footwear produced elsewhere. Today enough shoes are imported every year from Europe, Asia and Latin America to fill the city's spectacular Gateway Arch to the top of its visitors' platform, 600 feet above the Mississippi shore.

The shoe unions—the United Shoe Workers and the Boot & Shoe Workers—saw the trickle of imports grow into a mighty flood over a 15-year span. They began pointing with alarm, but Congress wasn't listening.

Foreign-made shoes that put no more than a 5-percent dent in sales in 1955 now total some 36 percent, and seem soon to pass the 50 percent mark. Shoe exports, on the other hand, dropped from 4.6 million pairs in 1955 to about 2 million in 1970.

Shoe union leaders remember every detail of the job trickle that became a roaring torrent. First it was a flight from towns like St. Louis, Boston and those in the New England states to the "boondocks" of the rural North, where jobs were scarce and wages low. The unions followed the plants to their rural hideaways and, after fierce opposition, induced many newly hired workers to join the union.

Memberships were held at a fairly constant level while wages improved. But the advent of the subsidized plant brought new struggles, first in the South, then in the Southwest and other areas.

Sales of imported shoes began rising too, and now have reached the point where, by union estimate, 90 percent of the U.S. shoe market will by 1975 be preempted by footwear made in other lands.

The effect on U.S. jobs has been catastrophic. From 1966 through 1970, more than 250 shoe factories locked their doors and went out of domestic production.

Some employes got jobs elsewhere in the industry but the typical shoe worker, whose age averages 52, has no choice but to live on unemployment compensation. When that is gone—and many jobless workers across the country have reached that point—it's public welfare, or the charity of friends and relatives until the Social Security Act takes over.

"We believe in free trade, but it must be fair trade," says Leo Frieda, vice president of the Boot & Shoe union. Frieda reported the problems created by unregulated imports to a 1969 conference of the International Labor Organization in Belgium. The audience applauded vigorously, Frieda recalls, but the plight of jobless American shoe workers has not improved in the meantime. Other nations "feel they must export to live," Frieda says.

Scores of U.S. companies have bought plants or footwear parts in other lands, and reduced or ended production here, says USW Pres. George Fecteau.

"If these foreign units were meeting the footwear needs of the people of Asia, Africa or South America, they would at least be filling a need," he points out. But in fact they were established "to take advantage of substandard wages."

Average hourly wages for footwear workers in 1970, with fringe benefits included, were $2.90 in the United States. This compares with $1.25 in Italy, 60 cents in Japan, 65 cents in Spain, 23 cents in Taiwan.

Fecteau emphasizes: "Many foreign-made shoes do not sell at lower prices. They do not prevent price rises by exerting a competitive influence. Their whole function is to inflate profits."

In 1970, the freight-on-board value of non-rubber footwear imports into the U.S. was $550 million. The wholesale price was $890 million, a markup of 60 percent. The price to the buyer in the store was $1.88 billion, a boost of 111 percent over the wholesale price.

This month the Shoe Workers and the Boot & Shoe union will sit across the negotiating table from representatives of the Brown Shoe Co. in St. Louis. Management's major proposal is for a wage cut of 7.5 percent for all the employes who still have jobs with the company—a proposal the unions call asking workers to "shoulder the burden" of industry problems they did not create or aggravate.

A few days earlier, St. Louis newspapers reported that Brown Shoe "announced sizable gains in sales and earnings along with the acquisition of a toy and sporting goods firm" with sales of $10 million a year.

Brown Shoe's net sales for the six months ended May 1 were $236 million, up 13 percent over the year-ago figure. Brown profits were $9.8 million, up 17 percent. Earnings per share were $1.41, up 17.5 percent over last year's payout to shareholders. Company Pres. W. L. H. Griffin reported "significant efficiencies and operating economies" and "new methods of operation" which "contributed to the good performance of our footwear group."

Regional Director Russell Taylor of the Shoe Workers remembers when 50,000 employes had jobs in the St. Louis shoe industry. Runaway plants cut that to 16,000 and, since imports began eating sharply into employment some five years ago, the total has dwindled to about 1,200. The two unions still have about 30,000 members in four states where they once had twice that many, Taylor says.

"We had 2,500 members in 1965," reports Glyn John of Boot & Shoe Joint Council 25. "Today we have less than 1,000, with maybe 600 or 700 still working."

Asks Wider Use:

Senate Bars Closing Of Marine Hospitals

The Senate has passed a resolution asking that the eight remaining Public Health Service hospitals and 30 outpatient clinics be kept in operation at least until June 30, 1973.

Ways should be sought to put the hospitals and clinics to wider use, not abandon them, the Senate urged.

The Administration has been seeking to close these facilities which provide medical services for American merchant seamen.

They were established in 1798 for this specific purpose, but today they also serve members of the U.S. Coast Guard and other federal employes and sometimes act as emergency facilities for the communities in which they are located.

The proposed closing of the remaining facilities brought vigorous opposition from the AFL-CIO and its Maritime Trades Dept., as well as many members of Congress.

"The importance of health care delivery in urban and rural areas is so great that the Administration should fund and staff these facilities," the Senate resolution said.

"The hospitals and clinics of the Public Health Service should be considered an integral part of the national health care delivery system."

The Senate resolution also recommended a study to be conducted before the deadline, by Congress and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, to decide which facilities should be continued, which should be converted to community use and which, if any, should be closed.

A similar resolution was before the House Subcommittee on Health & Welfare.

The eight remaining hospitals are located in Baltimore, Boston, Galveston, Tex., New Orleans, Norfolk, Va., San Francisco, Seattle and New York.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and 29 other senators introduced the resolution on PHS facilities "in order to give the Senate an opportunity to review the Administration's plans."

"It is unfortunate that the Congress must emphasize its right to review Administration actions of this magnitude," Kennedy said.

"The general counsel of the General Accounting Office has indicated that the proposed changes are contrary to the intent of current legislation. Nevertheless, it was clear . . . these plans went a long way before Congress was informed or consulted."

Kennedy said he did not see how the PHS facilities could operate until even the end of the current calendar year with drastic spending cutbacks for the program still in effect in the Fiscal 1972 budget.

"Every concrete indication I see indicates the Administration intends to proceed with their plans, with or without congressional approval," he said.

Government spokesmen had denied to the Senate Health subcommittee that the Administration planned to close the hospitals.

But O. William Moody, administrator of the Maritime Trades Dept., reminded the Senate panel that he had heard similar assurances in 1969 during hearings on PHS hospitals in Detroit and Savannah, Ga. —which have since been shut down.

Moody charged that a "hostile bureaucracy" within HEW was determined to subvert the intentions of Congress to maintain the PHS facilities.

$2.50 Wage Floor Urged by ILGWU

By setting a realistic minimum wage, Congress can assist those whose bargaining power is weak and whose wages, therefore, lag behind general advances, the Ladies' Garment Workers told the Senate Labor subcommittee.

Vice Pres. Wilbur Daniels of the ILGWU urged increasing the national minimum wage to $2.50 an hour in three steps over two years.

He told the subcommittee that "there is little doubt that improvements in working standards are in the national interest. "The added income generated by the proposed increases in the minimum wage constitute a significant weapon in the war against poverty," Daniels said.

"Once adopted, many workers and their dependents will be able to purchase more food and other necessities of life they presently lack. It spells a reduction to their misery and deprivation."

Congress Clears Bill For State, Local Jobs

than $12,000 a year, and not more than one-third of the jobs may be professional. Congress, however, exempted teachers from the limit on professionals.

Federal funds—when appropriated—may also be used to rehire employes who had been laid off because of lack of funds. This has happened in some areas as mayors, governors and county managers found their treasuries bare and were forced to cut back on services.

The House-Senate conference report clearly spelled out that the jobs were not to be a form of dole.

It mandated that there be no distinction between employes hired under the program and other public employes.

Many of the new workers, it said, would be expected to move up the career ranks of the public service. Others might choose to re-enter private industry as employment opportunities open up. But there would be no "leaf-raking" jobs. And unions representing public workers would have an opportunity to comment on the implementation of the program.

In another important area—federal funds for education—the White House also indicated it would go along with a congressional decision it earlier had resisted.

Congress voted $5 billion for education aid programs—some $445 million more than the Administration's budget request and more than half-a-billion dollars above last year's appropriations.

The final sum was still considerably short of the amount labor and education groups had sought for school and college aid. But it adds an important $65 million to the basic program of compensatory education for disadvantaged children and improves other programs.

One disappointment to congressional liberals was the dropping in the final version of a Senate provision providing $60 million for school districts losing tax revenue because of exempt public housing projects.

The prompt action on the appropriations bill was welcome news to school districts which, in past years, have usually gone into the new school year with only a guess as to the amount of federal funds that would be available.

Last year Congress took a big step to reduce delays by deciding to handle education aid funds in a separate bill rather than as part of an omibus Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare appropriation.

More than 700,000 persons receiving benefits under the railroad retirement system will obtain a 10 percent increase, retroactive to Jan. 1, under legislation cleared by Congress and approved by the President.

The increase matches social security benefit improvements and will show up on most railroad retirement checks mailed out on Sept. 1. Another 280,000 more recent retirees already received increases under an automatic provision of existing law.

The increases, along with a 15 percent boost granted last year, stay in effect until June 30, 1973. A special commission to make recommendations on long-range financing of the railroad retirement system is due to report on June 30, 1972. This would give Congress a full year to consider and act on the recommendations.

Goslee Is Appointed Acting NLRB Counsel

Eugene G. Goslee, National Labor Relations Board solicitor and career NLRB employe, was named by Pres. Nixon to serve as acting general counsel of the board. He succeeds Arnold Ordman, whose term in office expired June 25.

A White House announcement said Goslee will hold the office "until it is filled under the provisions of the law." The general counsel issues complaints of labor law violations and processes them to completion before the board and the courts.

Labor Protests Restrictions on Federal Group

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller strongly criticized a proposed Executive Order affecting 10,000 federal employes in the foreign service as "nothing but a sham for labor-management relations."

In a letter to Robert E. Hampton, chairman of the Federal Labor Relations Council, Biemiller joined Government Employes Pres. John F. Griner in asking for public hearings on the proposal so organized labor will have a chance to express its views in more detail. Hampton also is chairman of the U.S. Civil Service Commission.

Biemiller said the proposed order drafted by the State Dept. is deficient because it:

- Provides no basic protections for employes such as third-party review of unit determination.
- Leaves to the benevolence of the Board of Foreign Service such matters as representation elections, unfair labor practices, and impasses in negotiations.
- Substitutes administrative discretion for binding arbitration as the terminal point of grievance procedures.

"The fact that the proposed Executive Order does not provide for these basic protections raises serious questions in my mind about the purpose and effect of the proposed order," Biemiller's letter said.

The proposal would affect foreign service employes in the State Dept., the U.S. Information Agency and the Agency for International Development.

Nixon's Veto of Public Works Bill Blocks New Aid for Nation's Jobless

Chairman John A. Blatnik (D-Minn.), sponsor of the vetoed bill, denounced the President's veto as "callous." And House Speaker Carl Albert told newsmen that "there is no more important bill than this" to put people back to work.

Senate Republicans, however, hold the key to the chances of overriding the veto.

While a number of House Republicans defied the Administration to vote for the legislation, all but three Senate Republicans voted against the accelerated public works provision.

Their argument at the time was a procedural one—a protest against House rules on conference reports. But the issue will be clearcut when the Senate seeks to muster a two-thirds majority to override the President. Senate Republican Leader Hugh Scott (Pa.) served notice he will work vigorously and aggressively to uphold the veto.

The vetoed bill also included extension of the Appalachian Regional Development Act and regional commissions for other areas of the nation. But Nixon said he supports those programs and hopes Congress will pass separate legislation—but only as a stopgap until his "special revenue-sharing" proposals can be enacted.

In the same veto message, Nixon relented on his previous opposition to a public service jobs bill—the other half of labor's program to create employment.

While he vetoed such a bill last year, Nixon embraced the legislation that emerged from a House-Senate conference committee and promised to sign it into law.

The veto of the public works bill unveiled the new role of Treasury Sec. John M. Connally as the economic area strong man in the Nixon Cabinet.

It was Connally who first told newsmen the bill would be vetoed and the White House at the same time announced that henceforth the former conservative Democratic governor of Texas will be the "chief economic spokesman" for the President.

At a White House news conference, Connally announced that the President will not ask Congress to cut taxes to spur the economy nor will he sharply increase government spending to combat unemployment.

As the Administration sees it, Connally said, the country is on the "right" economic path already.

But he backed away from the earlier Administration prediction that unemployment will drop down to 4.5 percent by mid-1972.

He suggested that this figure—substantially above the jobless rate when Nixon took office—could be considered as a "goal" but he "wouldn't peg it" as an estimate of what will actually happen.

Western Union Strike Brings Renewed Talks

Negotiators for Western Union and 20,000 striking telegraph workers returned to the negotiating table July 1 in a joint effort to resolve a walkout that has closed most telegraph offices across the country since June 1.

Pres. E. L. Hageman of the Telegraph Workers said his union will make a good-faith effort to resolve differences that caused a walkout by 17,000 UTW members. Also out are 3,000 members of the Communications Workers in New York and New Jersey.

Union pickets will continue to march, Hageman said, until an acceptable agreement is reached. Then the terms will be sent to a secret ballot referendum of members for approval or rejection.

The dispute is over the size of a wage increase, and contract language regulating the contracting-out of members' work.

5.5 Million Workers on Jobless Rolls

10-Year High Set Despite Dip in Rate

By Tom Castor

The ranks of unemployed American workers were swollen by 1.1 million during June, pushing the total number of jobless to 5.5 million—the highest figure in 10 years, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Because of the timing of the census sampling, the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate dropped sharply from the May high of 6.2 percent to 5.6 percent in June.

But both the Bureau of Labor Statistics and AFL-CIO economists stressed that the improvement was largely illusionary.

The BLS—to the reported sharp displeasure of the White House—qualified its announcement of the unemployment rate by declaring that the decline "may be somewhat overstated because of seasonal adjustment procedures and because more young workers than usual were still in school during the survey week."

Because of the early date of the survey—the week of June 6-12—the out-of-school rush had barely started and the labor force increased only 2 million instead of the anticipated 3 million. The number of unemployed also was less than would have been expected in the June tally since students who began looking for work later in the month were not counted.

The monthly survey is always held during the week in which the 12th day of the month falls. Thus the June survey fell on the earliest week possible.

Seasonal adjustment factors, which are based on the experience of the past eight years, assumed that the influx of students already had taken place.

The BLS previously reported that 4 million young people in the 16-24 age group would be in the labor force this month. These additional job seekers will be reflected in later statistics.

The AFL-CIO emphasized that the June unemployment rate does not reflect any strengthening of the economy.

"The actual drop of 500,000 in the number of people with jobs discloses an actual weakening in most parts of the economy," the federation said.

"This situation points to the need

Frontlash Signs Up Voters in Schools

Thousands of California high school students graduated this year as registered voters under a program sponsored by Frontlash, the labor-backed youth political participation project, and the California Federation of Teachers.

In 14 key cities, students and teachers obtained appointments as deputy registrars and conducted in-school signups of 18-year-olds.

Similar registration drives have been held in colleges, and community programs are also under way to reach the majority of the 18 to 21-age group—those not attending schools or colleges.

Calls on President To Order Rollback

The AFL-CIO called on Pres. Nixon to roll back the latest increase in the prime interest rate because "the bankers should not be allowed to profit at the expense of the rest of America."

Federation Pres. George Meany, terming the increase by dozens of banks across the country as "unconscionable," said it would discourage the needed economic expansion, "abort the recent increase in residential construction" and add to inflationary pressures.

The only group in America "that would benefit is the one group that has already profited from inflation and unemployment—the banks and other money lenders," Meany asserted.

The President, he added, has "too long ignored" his standby authority to move against interest rate increases. "If the President persists in his failure or refusal to use this authority, we urge the Congress to act."

The prime interest rate—the rate charged by banks on loans to their best and largest customers—was increased from 5.5 percent to 6 percent.

Other interest rates, including consumer loans, are higher than the prime rate and now will rise still further.

The move to a higher prime rate started with a group of small banks at the beginning of July. The pace picked up July 6 when the fourth largest bank in the country — Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co. in New York—joined in the interest rate boost and virtually all banks followed suit in the next few days.

The New York bank said its move came because of "the sharp

House Votes 'Cure' For MD Shortage

The House voted overwhelming approval to a pair of labor-supported bills aimed at overcoming the nation's shortage of doctors, nurses and other health professionals.

The legislation would enable medical, nursing and dental schools to expand their facilities, accept more students, reduce tuition and speed up the education process.

Special incentives would encourage schools to enroll students from minority groups and poor families.

The student loan program would be expanded and graduates who practice in areas with shortages of doctors would not have to repay most of the money they borrowed to complete their education.

Senate hearings on companion legislation already have been held and the Administration has indicated its general approval of the measures even though the amount

Nixon Asks 'Constructive' Pact:

Steel Talks Resume As Deadline Nears

The Steelworkers got back to the "main table" in collective bargaining with nine major Big Steel companies after a White House meeting at which both sides were admonished by Pres. Nixon to arrive at a "constructive settlement" of 1971 contract negotiations without stopping production.

The union wants an acceptable settlement by Aug. 1 without a strike of the 450,000 workers it represents in basic steel. That's when existing contracts expire.

The union won earlier this year, in contracts with the aluminum and can industries, settlements averaging 31 percent, plus cost-of-living protection.

Negotiations are being conducted in Washington by 10 teams of union and management representatives—nine representing the individual companies and one for "summit" negotiations. The union group includes about 300 bargaining committeemen and resource technicians.

In another set of contract talks, copper workers representing the USWA and 25 other unions were called back to the negotiating table by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service in Denver, San Francisco and Tucson. The service hoped to get negotiations back on the track after a July 1 walkout by 30,000 workers at locations of four big copper producers and four independents. The Big Four are Kennecott, Phelps Dodge, Anaconda and American Smelting & Refining Co. Anaconda resumed talks voluntarily in Helena, Mont.

Full Social Justice for Minorities Tied to Labor-Civil Rights Alliance

The AFL-CIO pledged to continue its fight on behalf of blacks and other minorities "until America has achieved racial, social and economic justice for all its citizens."

In a message to the 62nd annual convention of the NAACP, Pres. George Meany said "labor's oldest alliance remains the strongest, despite the efforts of demagogues to sow dissension in our ranks."

"Thanks largely to that alliance, America has made greater strides toward equality in the past 10 years than in all its previous history," Meany said.

"Together, in countless legislative battles, we have succeeded in sweeping away most of the legal sanctions that buttressed and perpetuated discrimination," he said.

"We look back with pride and deep satisfaction on the landmark victories achieved in the name of racial and social justice over the past decade through the united efforts of the labor movement and the civil rights movement."

Meany emphasized that the task is far from finished. In winning major battles to establish the principle of equality, only a foundation has been laid.

"But building is under way," he said. "And right now, to help implement the intent of Congress, our coalition is seeking to arm the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission with the power to issue cease-and-desist orders wherever racial discrimination exists, on the job or in the union hall."

"We propose to employ all the tools of the law, by expanding the EEOC's authority to help us in this task, just as we proposed—and demanded—the inclusion of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1965 to speed compliance with long-standing AFL-CIO policies forbidding discrimination."

Meany reported to the NAACP

CHARTER OF AFFILIATION with the AFL-CIO is presented by Federation Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, left, to officers of the new American Postal Workers Union, formed by merger of five postal unions. They are, in order, with their former titles, Sec.-Treas. Owen H. Schoon of the Postal Clerks, Pres. David Silvergleid of the National Postal Union, Philip Dooley, Clerks' executive aide, Pres. Monroe Crable, Maintenance Employes, Pres. Francis S. Filbey of the Clerks, Pres. Michael Cullen of the Special Delivery Messengers and Pres. Chester W. Parrish, Motor Vehicle Employes. Filbey is APWU president, Silvergleid, executive vice president and Schoon, secretary-treasurer.

Absentee-Owned Company Towns Created by Corporate Mergers

A rise in the tempo of business takeovers by multicompany corporations makes it "imperative" that steps be taken now to strengthen laws regulating such mergers, a former chief economist for the Federal Trade Commission writes in the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

The public generally is unaware that a series of mergers can "transform a community into an absentee-owned company town," with economic life-or-death decisions made by managers "half a continent away," says Dr. Willard F. Mueller, professor of economics at the University of Wisconsin, in the June issue of the AFL-CIO magazine.

Corporations headquartered in New York held 46 percent of the assets of the top 200 U.S. manufacturing firms in 1968. And 85 percent of all assets were concentrated in that state and five others—Michigan, California, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Illinois.

The "big losers" were the remaining 44 states, the article emphasizes.

When large corporations acquire a local business, top management personnel is "quite often transferred to the acquiring firm's headquarters." After that, decisions affecting the local community are no longer made by persons living in that community, Dr. Mueller says.

Other effects include a drying-up of services previously performed by local attorneys, accountants, banks, and advertising agencies.

"Any town in America that has been dominated by such an absentee-owned industry knows well the problem it creates," the author points out—a lack of concern for the quality of the environment, and the needs of local schools, taxation or roads are "hard to impress on a corporate board room half a continent away."

Unions have felt the impact on their collective bargaining, Mueller notes, adding:

"Often labor negotiators are forced to bargain with management personnel not empowered to make decisions. Or worse, these decisions may be made by management in terms of broad, nationwide personnel policies which have little or no bearing on the community industry, which may be totally foreign to all other operations and previous experiences of the conglomerate."

Another byproduct is that "local management and labor, accustomed to bargaining on the profits of the company and the productivity of the labor force, suddenly find the bargaining dominated by a conglomerate balance sheet which considers products, plants and losses the local people will never see or know anything about."

The economist cites several "horrible examples" of the effects on a community of absentee control. Among them are two areas that have been absentee owned for many decades —Gary, Ind. and Alloy, W. Va.

Gary, he says, is a prize example for "millions of people" who have driven past "this dismal community just east of Chicago, whose unfortunate inhabitants live amid ubiquitous urban decay under a perpetual shroud of polluted skies."

Gary's absentee owners, Mueller charges, have "permitted it to become one of the most blighted communities in the nation."

Americans should "ponder the Gary experience," the author advises, because "it is probably impossible" for large cities to solve their many problems "unless key business decision makers have a personal stake in what happens to a community."

The "worst example of industrial pollution originates in an absentee-owned plant off the beaten path in Alloy," the article relates—the home of a Union Carbide ferroalloys plant described as pouring out 70,000 tons of smoke particles a year—slightly more than the total emitted in all of New York City.

"Nor has Union Carbide demonstrated greater concern for community welfare in other West Virginia communities where it is the major employer." Mueller quotes a union officer in a Union Carbide town as saying "we resent the fact that Union Carbide is using our members as pawns" in resisting government cleanup efforts.

It is still too early to tell "whether the great merger tide of the 1960s has ebbed permanently, or whether it will rise again with the return" of more favorable economic conditions, the author says.

It is therefore imperative, he says, "that steps be taken now to strengthen our laws and enforcement procedures for coping with such a resurgence of merger activity."

Volunteers Build Home For Fellow Unionist

Kansas City—When fire destroyed the home of Joe Culbertson, a Kansas City bus driver and union member for 25 years, his fellow trade unionists came forward with helping—and skilled—hands.

The fire, which struck May 6, resulted in the death of one of the seven Culbertson children. Two other children suffered serious burns and were hospitalized. All the family personal effects were destroyed.

Friends and neighbors opened their homes to the stricken family, but this meant they had to split up.

Culbertson mentioned to his union president, Leroy E. Kent of Amalgamated Transit Division 1287, that he had purchased a prefabricated house, but would have a difficult time erecting it.

Kent passed the word on to the Carpenters District Council and more than 30 carpenters volunteered their services.

On the day set, instructors, journeymen and apprentices of the Builders Training Center began putting up the dwelling at 8 a.m. They were finished by sundown.

A week later, members of Local 124 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers completely wired the home. The plumbing also was installed by union volunteers.

During the house-raising, the women's auxiliary of the Amalgamated Transit Union served food to the volunteers.

Jobless Rolls Rise 1.1 Million in June for immediate job-creating measures to boost economic stability."

"How can we have a 10-year record in unemployment and at the same time throw our hats in the air because of a drop in the rate?" asked Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.), chairman of Congress' Joint Economic Committee.

Assistant BLS Commissioner Harold Goldstein told Proxmire's committee that the June figures showed some improvement.

But, he cautioned, "how much of the total is real and how much is the result of statistical factors, we can't say at this time."

Total employment during June increased by 770,000 to 79.5 million. But the seasonal adjustment factor translated this into a decline of 520,000 to 78.4 million.

Although 5.5 million persons were actually unemployed, on a seasonal basis, unemployment dropped by 530,000 to 4.7 million.

The number of persons in the civilian labor force rose by about 2 million, but after seasonal adjustment, it was down 1 million to 83.1 million, its lowest level since last summer.

On a quarterly average basis, total employment and unemployment, seasonally adjusted, have shown relatively little change since the fall of 1970, the BLS said.

"The overall jobless rate, at 6 percent in the second quarter, was essentially unchanged from the 5.9 percent rate which prevailed in both the last quarter of 1970 and the first quarter of 1971. Labor force and employment have risen only slightly during this period."

The BLS said the average workweek has remained steady since last fall, though in the manufacturing sector it rose in the first and second quarters of the year.

The early June sampling showed teenage unemployment down from 17.3 percent to 15.8 percent. The jobless rate for 20-24-year-olds fell from 11.1 percent in May to 9.9 percent in June.

The jobless rate for Negroes dropped from 10.5 percent to 9.4 percent. The decline took place exclusively among women aged 20 years and over, where the rate fell from 10.6 percent to 7.9 percent.

Long-term unemployment continued to grow, however, with the average duration of joblessness increasing from 11.5 to 12.7 weeks, seasonally adjusted.

On an actual basis, the average duration of unemployment increased from 7.6 weeks in June 1970 to 10.3 weeks last month.

And in actual figures, there were 560,000 workers unemployed 27 weeks or more, an increase of 228,000 over the year.

The average workweek for all rank-and-file workers on private payrolls rose by four-tenths of 1 hour in June, slightly more than seasonally expected.

After seasonal adjustment, weekly hours were up one-tenth of 1 hour to 37.1 hours.

Factory overtime rose two-tenths of 1 hour over the month to 3 hours in June, seasonally adjusted. This brought the level to its highest mark since August 1970.

Average hourly earnings were up 1 cent to $3.42, an increase of 21 cents, or 6.5 percent over year-ago figures.

Average weekly earnings reflected these gains and were up $1.74 from May to $127.57. Over the year, weekly earnings were up $7.52, or 6.3 percent, compared to a 4.4 percent increase in the Consumer Price Index for the 12 months ended in May.

Nash Named Counsel for Labor Board

Peter G. Nash, 34, has been nominated by Pres. Nixon to be general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board.

Nash is Labor Dept. solicitor, a post he has held for a year. When confirmed by the Senate he will succeed Arnold Ordman, whose term expired June 25. Meanwhile Eugene G. Goslee, NLRB solicitor, is serving as acting general counsel.

The general counsel issues complaints of labor law violations and processes them to completion before the board and the courts.

A former president of the Rochester Junior Chamber of Commerce, Nash has taught and lectured on labor law.

Early in the Nixon Administration, he entered the Labor Dept. as associate solicitor for labor relations and civil rights.

WALDO, nickname for the Machinists' sophisticated Univac III computer, is introduced to Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) by IAM Pres. Floyd Smith. The computer's assignment includes preparation of voter registration lists for the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education.

If Bargaining Fails:

'Selective' Strike Set For Three Railroads

The United Transportation Union resumed negotiations with national railroads after setting a date for a selective strike on three roads in the event no agreement is reached.

A strike date of 6 a.m. July 16 was set up by UTU Pres. Charles Luna for members of his union on the Southern, Union Pacific and Chicago & North Western roads.

The UTU, representing more than 265,000 train and engine crew members, has been free to call selective strikes since June 7, when the U.S. Supreme Court let stand a lower court decision that unions may call strikes against a few carriers to bring pressure for a national agreement. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled such strikes legal, provided "reasonable" advance notice is given.

The National Railway Labor Conference, which speaks for some 170 railroads, responded to the strike notice with an announcement that all the roads will put work rules changes into effect at the same time nationwide.

The changes, affecting the jobs and working conditions of many UTU members, are not acceptable to the UTU unless agreement is reached through negotiation, the union said.

Luna said all provisions of the Railway Labor Act have been complied with by UTU, and Pres. Nixon has been notified of the union's intent to strike three carriers if no agreement can be negotiated. Negotiations in the dispute have been going on for more than a year.

Other railroad unions also are negotiating new contract terms. Four railroad shopcraft unions—the Machinists, Boilermakers, Railway Carmen and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—are going through the mediation process with employers. Two others are negotiating separately — the Sheet Metal Workers and the Firemen & Oilers.

The Signalmen will resume contract talks July 14 for 13,000 members who maintain signal systems and other devices for the safe movement of freight and passenger trains.

They want a skill inequity adjustment to bring wages of craftsmen up to comparable standards, and away-from-home expenses for signalmen required to live in camp cars and trailers during their work week.

The union said in a statement that "the deplorable, unsafe, unsanitary, totally inadequate conditions of camp cars . . . have existed for many years. They must be removed and employes permitted to live in hotels and motels with actual expenses for meals and lodging paid for by the employer . . . as in other industries."

COPPER WORKERS display solidarity on a Magma, Utah, picket line at the entrance to a copper smelter operated by the Kennecott Copper Corp. The strike of more than 30,000 members of the Steelworkers and 25 other unions began July 1 after an all-union coalition rejected an offer of copper's Big Four employers as "totally inadequate."

Steel Talks Resumed At Industrywide Level

representatives for his first direct involvement in labor-management negotiations since the rail labor contract disputes of 1970-71. His theme was that the best interests of labor, management and the nation would be served by agreement on contract terms that would help the United States steel industry become more competitive in world markets.

The Steelworkers were represented by Pres. I. W. Abel, Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke, Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony, General Counsel Bernard Kleiman and Elliott Bredhoff, the union's special legal counsel.

George P. Shultz, director of the Office of Management & Budget, told reporters at a news briefing later that Nixon had not told the negotiators how much to settle for or how to conduct their negotiations.

He expressed the hope that the negotiators will get down to "hard bargaining" in an atmosphere congenial to a settlement without a shutdown. The self-interest of the parties directly involved should coincide with the national interest and lead to a constructive settlement, Shultz quoted Nixon as saying.

Shultz refused to be specific on details of a "constructive" settlement except that it should be one that would "help the industry become more competitive" in world steel markets.

Foreign steel is likely to total about 16 million tons, or 17 percent of probable 1971 domestic consumption, industry and government statisticians have reported.

Shultz said Nixon hopes the negotiators will "come to grips" with the "cost problems" of the American steel industry. There was no dialogue between Nixon and his audience, but there was general applause when the President finished his 30-minute talk, according to Shultz.

The President reaffirmed his belief "in the workability and strength of the private collective bargaining system." Shultz described increased productivity as the key to success in current negotiations.

Abel told NBC's Meet the Press program on television June 27 that union negotiators will "do everything within our power" to avoid a steel strike. But that does not include abandoning the union's pay goals as a feasible alternative, he emphasized.

Umpire Named For Disputes In Construction

Appointment of E. Irving Manger as impartial umpire in jurisdictional disputes cases was announced by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the National Constructors Association.

Manger has been a labor relations officer for the Corps of Engineers, head of the Davis-Bacon Act wage determination office of the Labor Dept., and liaison officer for the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee with the Labor Dept.

Manger was chosen for what was announced as "the Solomon-like job of deciding if a union or a contractor covered" by a labor-management agreement in industrial plant construction has broken the rules agreed to, and of imposing financial penalties.

The jurisdictional agreement was one of two which NCA and the unions put into effect Apr. 1 to solve disputes over work assignments. The second agreement sets up standard work rules on job sites.

NLRB Examiner Hits Company For 10-Year Delay in Backpay

A New Orleans clothing manufacturer has been ordered to give $53,000 in backpay to 33 members of the Clothing Workers whose claims it has been fighting for more than 10 years.

Trial examiner Lowell Goerlich reported to the National Labor Relations Board that the J. H. Rutter-Rex Manufacturing Co., maker of shirts and pants, should be compelled to make the employes and former employes whole for pay losses it caused them when it triggered a year-long strike that ended Apr. 6, 1955.

The finding was the third in a series of pay hearings that will end only when Rutter-Rex pays the amounts due. Any hope of the 33 wronged workers for early payment of their lost pay was dashed when an NLRB aide said he expects the owner to file another appeal.

In the latest case, the company challenged backpay for all but two of the 33 claimants—one died, and another moved to California and has only $21 coming.

Goerlich ruled that the backpay formula used by the NLRB general counsel is fair and reasonable. Citing previous Supreme Court and Appeals Court rulings in previous Rex cases, he rejected company claims that the supplemental backpay claims should be dismissed because of "unjustified delay" by the board and the NLRB general counsel.

Rex's failure to ask the courts to speed up NLRB hearings seems to indicate that the company "accepted the delay and pursued a course best fitted to its antiunion needs," the examiner reasoned.

The backpay order calls for payment of $1,286 to the estate of Louise Jackson, who died while her claim was being contested. Eighteen others are due sums ranging from $1,000 to $9,957. Fourteen are due to get less than $1,000.

Backpay for most of the workers dates from June 25, 1961, to April or May 1963. One claim runs to 1968, and four to 1970.

Six claimants were not offered reinstatement until 1970 despite a Supreme Court order issued Dec. 15, 1969. Of the six, one was a woman denied re-employment because she respected a union picket line at the Louisiana Garment Manufacturing Co. Inc., where she found work after being turned down by Rex.

The examiner said the law does not require "that a discriminatee violate a lawful picket line" at the temporary employer's shop to mitigate another employer's backpay liability "arising from a discriminatory discharge." To do otherwise would interfere with the right to strike "which the Act protects," Goerlich wrote.

The NLRB first ruled in 1956 that Rex management caused the strike by unfair practices. It ordered reinstatement of 175 or more strikers with full backpay, plus interest at 6 percent. Rex refused to comply, and the 15-year legal fight began. It followed this sequence while the workers waited for their lost pay:

- Aug. 19, 1957, NLRB order enforced by the 5th U.S. Court of Appeals, New Orleans.
- Nov. 16, 1961, backpay hearings ordered.
- Jan. 23, 1963, preliminary backpay findings.
- June 20, 1964, supplemental backpay findings.
- June 30, 1966, NLRB backpay order.
- July 23, 1968, order enforced in part by 5th Circuit Court; reversed by Supreme Court Dec. 15, 1969.
- Apr. 6, 1970, Appeals Court enforces NLRB order.
- Nov. 3, 1970, backpay specifications published.
- February and March 1971, backpay hearings held.
- June 27, 1971, examiner backpay decision.

Labor Board Bars Rule Against Union Insignia

The National Labor Relations Board ruled that Southern Bell Telephone Co. illegally interfered with an employe's rights under the labor law when it told him to stop wearing a union badge while at work in the plant of a customer.

The customer, Fabric Services, Inc., of Orangeburg, S.C., also was guilty of illegal interference for refusing to allow the repairman to work in its plant while wearing the badge, the NLRB found.

A board panel affirmed a trial examiner's finding that the two companies committed unfair labor practices in their treatment of Gerald O. Smoak, veteran member and former officer of the Communications Workers.

Southern Bell sent Smoak to the Fabric Services plant to repair telephone equipment in May 1970. On the day of the incident, Smoak was the only Bell employe scheduled to work in the plant.

He arrived at the plant wearing a pocket protector with the legend: "CWA. It Doesn't Cost. It Pays. Join CWA-AFL-CIO."

The company's personnel director refused to let Smoak work in the plant while wearing the union insignia. Smoak reported the incident to his supervisor at Southern Bell, who instructed him to remove the pocket protector "if that was what Fabric Services wanted."

Smoak took off the union message, returned to the customer's premises and finished his job. The union then filed charges that his rights had been invaded.

NLRB Trial Examiner Arthur Leff upheld the union, and the board affirmed his ruling. Leff pointed out that "the right of employes to wear union insignia at work is a form of union activity safeguarded" by the law unless there are special circumstances affecting employe discipline or plant production.

The examiner wrote: "Neither of the employers . . . makes any claim that Smoak's pocket protector . . . was likely to detract from work performance or employe discipline. There is no contention and no evidence" of any interruptions, or of any organizing activity by Smoak, or that he came into direct contact with any Fabric Services employe, he said.

Fabric Services claimed that, since it was not Smoak's employer, it could not be found to have violated the law. The NLRB rejected this defense, ruling that its action "constituted a direct interference with and restraint of Smoak's protected right to wear union insignia at work." Similarly, Southern Bell committed the same offense by ordering Smoak to stop wearing the pocket guard only while in Fabric Services' plant, the board found. It ordered the two companies to stop interfering with employes' rights protected by the federal labor law.

The New Electorate

ON AUG. 26, 1920, the 19th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution was officially proclaimed as adopted. It said that the rights of citizens of the U.S. to vote "shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any state on account of sex."

The amendment was the first major national change to extend the American electorate. Now, over 50 years later, the electorate has been further broadened and extended so that 18-year-olds can vote in all federal, state and local elections. That's the import of the 26th Amendment officially adopted last week.

THE HISTORY OF ELECTIONS since 1920 indicates that legally providing for a greater number of voters did not automatically increase the percentage actually voting, nor did it affect very much the results and trends of elections.

The right to vote carries with it the right not to vote. There are no penalties for failure to vote; there is only the decision to default on a right that men have held to be one of the most important manifestations of freedom.

But the adoption of the 26th Amendment brings new hope and optimism that an increasingly greater number of young persons will participate in the democratic process of reaching decisions at the polls after rational discussion, a look at the records and an analysis of the various candidates.

Political scientists have noted repeatedly, when the legal voting age was still 21, that young persons as a definable group voted in lower proportions than older age groups. In the past decade, however, as young people became more actively involved in political campaigns and decision-making processes, there has been the continuing promise of a wide and meaningful participation in democracy.

IN THE 1968 presidential election only 61 percent of the estimated voting age population of 120 million went to the polls. It was the second presidential election in a row in which there was a drop in the percentage of persons voting—the turnout was 62 percent in 1964, 63.8 percent in 1960 and 59.9 percent in 1956.

These are shamefully low percentages, especially when compared to voter turnouts in other democratic nations. It is something that the new young voters, those between 18 and 21 can help change both by their own involvement and by stimulating other segments of the electorate to get out on election day.

The AFL-CIO has voiced loud and strong support for legislation lowering the voting age in all elections to 18. We believe that the greatest possible number of voters will result in a healthy sound democratic decision, reached peacefully and rationally at the polls.

With intensive registration drives and campaigns to alert young people to their newly won right to vote, the 1972 election can become a great testimonial to the vigor of a nation dedicated to government of the people, by the people and for the people.

A Word Edgewise:

Democratic Left's Strong Roots Imbedded in Labor Movement

By John P. Roche

THE ANTI-TOTALITARIAN, democratic left is alive, in—of all places—Berkeley, Calif. One of the tragedies of recent years has been that the "Hanoi hawks" have pre-empted both the peace and the student radical movements. Thus virtually the only opposition to such capers as the "People's Peace Treaty" has come from the right end of the political spectrum.

In fact, the democratic left has strong roots in our society, but, oddly enough, among trade-unionists rather than intellectuals. Self-styled "men of principle" never tire of denouncing the AFL-CIO for "sterile anti-communism" because George Meany will not extend the hand of fellowship to the head of the Soviet trade union movement. Meany and his constituents, while they do little moral posturing, find it repugnant to their principles to legitimate a "trade union" led by a secret policeman.

The trade union movement, by its very nature, tends to be ideologically inarticulate. It has no chief ideologue who rushes out to clarify basic positions; it has no journals of cultural and political opinion. Besides, its leaders find the obscurantism of the intellectuals tedious. With respect to the situation in Vietnam, they ask a simple question: "What will happen to you if you go to Hanoi and try to start a free trade union movement?" The answer: "You'll be shot."

By contrast, in South Vietnam there is a free union movement with more than 500,000 members. Since unionists have strong principled views about regimes that shoot their comrades, that closes the question.

Unfortunately what the union leaders take for granted—the immoral, totalitarian character of the North Vietnamese regime—has largely been overlooked, or deliberately downplayed, by the professional liberals. (And is, of course, accepted as a model, historically progressive system by the "Hanoi hawks," those in the United States who are rooting for a Hanoi victory, not for peace.)

A number of my anti-war students were, for example, really shaken when I read them a statement from the Jan. 12, 1971, issue of "Hanoi Moi" that a people's court in Hanoi had imprisoned the leader of a pop band, Phan Thang Toan, for 15 years for playing a "melancholy, heart-rending" song which encouraged a "dissolute, depraved, and orgy-like way of life."

There are young people, however, who make this key distinction, one that is literally a matter of life and death, in assessing our role in Vietnam. They are centered in the democratic socialistic movement, notably in the Young People's Socialist League of which I am an alumnus (and which must be distinguished from the Socialist Youth League and a number of other groups with "socialist" in their titles).

IN BERKELEY they took the offensive at the time of the Laos incursion by introducing a resolution to the Student Senate at the university.

"Whereas," it began, "Communist forces throughout the world, including those in Southeast Asia, are the enemies of the people, and in particular enemies of the working class, destroying such democratic and socialist institutions as free political associations and trade unions . . .

"And these Communist forces have committed aggression against the people of South Vietnam and against citizens of the United States in South Vietnam . . . and the nations of Cambodia and Laos are too weak to prevent these crimes from being committed (while) the United States has the power to aid the people of South Vietnam in their valiant efforts to protect themselves . . .

"Be it resolved by the (University Student) Senate that we encourage the President of the United States . . . to take all political and military action necessary to stem the tide of anti-democratic and anti-socialist aggression on the part of Communist forces in Southeast Asia. . . ."

The resolution went on to condemn any war crimes and to call for reforms in Saigon, but it set out the alternatives in cold stark terms. Needless to say, it did not pass. What is extraordinary is the fact that it was defeated only by a vote of 13 to 8. A good omen: the beginning of wisdom is to know who is going to shoot you if he gets the chance. From there you can go on to Plato and the classics.

The Yardstick:

Life in Migrant Labor Camps Viewed as a Form of Peonage

The following article is by Msgr. George G. Higgins, director, Division of Urban Life, U.S. Catholic Conference. It is one of his Yardstick columns subtitled Catholic Tests of a Social Order.

THE WORD "PEON," which comes to us unchanged in spelling from the Spanish language, has taken on different meanings in different parts of the world. (1) In India, according to Webster's Collegiate Dictionary, it means a foot soldier, or a native policeman, or an attendant of one kind or another. (2) In Latin America, it means a landless member of the working class who is forced to serve virtually in bondage or servitude to his creditors. (3) In certain southwestern states in our own country—states which were formerly a part of Mexico—it refers to a person bound to service for owing a debt or a prison convict leased to a labor contractor.

The second of these definitions is probably the most common of the three. Strictly speaking, there are no peons in the United States in that particular sense of the word. In other words, there are no members of the working class in this country, whether in agriculture or any other industry, who are held in a state of compulsory servitude to a master.

On the other hand, it would not be an exaggeration to say that, even at this late date, the farm labor system in some parts of the United States closely resembles peonage, at least in certain major respects.

Within recent weeks, for example, it came to light that social workers and other public service representatives were systematically being denied access to a number of farm labor camps in the otherwise enlightened state of New Jersey. The migrant farm workers living in these camps are not peons in the dictionary sense of the word. That is to say, they are not being held in bondage to their employers and are legally (though not economically) free to quit their jobs and pull up stakes on a moment's notice.

On the other hand, they are virtual peons in the sense that their employers claim the right to decide unilaterally who may or may not have access to the miserable labor camps in which the migrants are housed. Fortunately, the state of New Jersey has recently taken steps aimed at correcting this intolerable situation.

In the Yakima Valley in the state of Washington, clear across the country from New Jersey, the plight of migratory farm workers is even more intolerable in some of the labor camps owned and operated by the Del Monte Corp., one of the largest agricultural combines in the United States. Del Monte officials in Toppenish, Yakima County, have barred two local priests and two seminarians from giving religious instruction to Mexican-American children in six of the corporation's 19 migrant camps.

When Bishop Cornelius Powers of Yakima wrote to Del Monte to ask why religious instruction was being denied these disadvantaged children, a top official of the corporation laid it right on the line. He said, in effect, that the company was afraid that the priests and seminarians in question might be working on behalf of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

This same local farm manager stated the company's policy even more bluntly in a conversation with Father Francis Duffy, one of the priests who had been denied access to the camps. When asked by Father Duffy if the farm workers themselves had no say in the matter, the farm manager replied: "No say at all."

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer reports that priests are not the only non-political or public service representatives who have been repeatedly denied access to Del Monte labor camp residents. Nutrition aides from the state Dept. of Agriculture Extension Service have also been denied entry, according to Mary Patrick, director of the extension in Yakima.

"We tried to explain," Miss Patrick informed the Seattle PI, "that we are just offering a public service, but they are . . . afraid we'd be connected with the union. We are not tied in with the union. Even one of our agents who used to work for Del Monte couldn't get us in."

COMMUNITY HEALTH aides were also barred from Del Monte's camps until very recently. At the present time the doctors and health aides from the federally funded Migrant Family Health Center in Toppenish may go into the camps, but only if they make special arrangements with Del Monte officials in advance.

The irony of the whole thing is that while Del Monte officials rationalize their policy on the specious grounds that their workers don't want Cesar Chavez's union to represent them and must therefore be protected from outside agitators (including priests and seminarians), the workers themselves on one of Del Monte's ranches voted overwhelmingly last summer, by secret ballot, to become a part of UFWOC.

In the light of the foregoing facts, it is simply incredible, to this writer at least, that the many West Coast growers' associations which, as a part of their strategy to keep their workers from joining UFWOC, constantly talk about the value of freedom and the basic rights of farm workers, have yet to utter so much as a syllable in criticism of Del Monte's indefensible practice of forbidding even the clergy to enter its labor camps.

I would have expected these growers' associations to condemn this practice as a clear violation of a basic human right. In any event, if the growers themselves, acting through their own organizations, are unwilling or unable to correct abuses of this type in the agricultural industry, government agencies will have to do it for them. The state of New Jersey, as indicated above, has already taken the lead in this regard. It seems to me that the state of Washington ought to follow suit—and the sooner the better.

More Inspectors Needed:

Full Job Safety Enforcement Imperiled by Insufficient Funds

FULL AND VIGOROUS enforcement of the new federal job law could be curtailed by insufficient funds and a weak Administration policy, AFL-CIO occupational safety specialist George H. R. Taylor warned.

Taylor, executive secretary of the Federation's Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, predicted a growing number of requests for special safety inspections "as more and more plant safety committees become aware of how to use this law."

"If that doesn't cause the Administration to take a look at the policy of not asking for enough personnel to do an orderly job, then they have misread" the reason for the growing number of complaints, Taylor asserted. He pointed out that the Administration's funding requests will add fewer than 400 inspectors by the end of Fiscal 1972, while "at least 1,000 inspectors should be in the field" by that time.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System, Taylor said the funds needed to recruit, train and put an effective force of inspectors into the plants where they're needed "is really minor," compared with "other line items and other program items being requested by federal departments."

Taylor said that the labor movement will not only continue its push for full funding of the Occupational Safety & Health Act, but has already started to "gear-up . . . from the shop level on up" to use the rights and protections given unions under the law "to help improve the workplaces." He said that since "it is very unlikely, during the Nixon Administration, that we are going to have enough fuel to keep the furnaces of this act burning very brightly," the unions are prepared to accept the responsibility of being the "unofficial enforcers" of the new job safety law.

WHAT'S WRONG with the American economy?

How can we have inflation and rising unemployment at the same time?

Who really owns and controls America?

How can the free enterprise system exist with the fantastic growth of monopolies and conglomerates?

With multinational corporations making inroads throughout the world economic spectrum how can single countries control them?

If you are agitated by these economic questions Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.) shares your concern. He has a proposal which gives some hope for providing a basis for some answers.

He has introduced a Senate resolution to establish a special committee to investigate economic and financial concentration. It would be made up of 17 members of the Senate, two each from major standing committees and a chairman from the majority party.

The special committee would employ a professional staff to make a full and complete study and investigation of the concentration of economic power over the production and distribution of goods and services in this country with emphasis in these two areas:

1. The causes of such concentration and control and their effect on competition, inflation, the level of prices and pricing policies of industry, employment, profits, consumption and the use of resources.

2. The effect of existing federal and state laws and policies on concentration and control, including taxation, patents, purchasing and investment.

The committee would make its final report to the Senate with recommendations for proposed legislation and regulations by Jan. 31, 1973—ready for action by the incoming President.

METCALF IS SEEKING a sweeping analysis of the economy, what makes it tick or fail to tick. If such a study is made within the time limit set, then the Metcalf proposal must be passed quickly. The initial decision is up to the Senate Judiciary Committee.

All of this is reminiscent of the Temporary National Economic Committee which was set up in the late 1930s and made what has been accepted as the most intense and extensive study of the U.S. economy and concentration of power ever undertaken. Some of its initial recommendations resulted in new laws and legislation but World War II negated further follow through.

"No one knows who owns America," says Metcalf, who believes that his proposed study should have a "number one priority" in the Senate. "It is time to determine who does own America and who controls it and to reshape our institutions so that they will be responsive to the needs of our time."

He cites the Penn Central bankruptcy as an example where Congress is "being asked to take good taxpayers' money to bail out Penn Central without even the suggestion of adequate security and management control, and without any real knowledge of the corporate monster which the financial managers have put together."

Metcalf quotes from a 1969 Federal Trade Commission study which, he feels, summarizes the breadth of the situation:

"In unprecedented fashion, the current merger movement is centralizing and consolidating corporate control and decision-making among a relatively few vast companies. By the end of 1968, the 200 largest industrial corporations controlled over 60 percent of the total assets held by manufacturing corporations."

The FTC study concluded:

"These developments pose a serious threat to America's democratic and social institutions by creating a degree of centralized private decision-making that is incompatible with a free enterprise system, a system relying upon market forces to discipline private economic power."

LACK OF FUNDS may frustrate vigorous enforcement of the new Occupational Safety & Health law and trigger labor-management "abrasions," said George Taylor, center, executive director of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were James F. Welsh, left, of the Washington Evening Star, and Robert Barr of the Fairchild Publications.

American Folklore Festival Salutes Labor's Craftsmen

The annual folklore festival of the Smithsonian Institution gave special recognition this year to the skills and culture of America's union workers.

During the five-day exhibition on the Mall—the stretch of greenery from the Capitol Building to the Reflecting Pool at the Lincoln Memorial—hundreds of thousands of visitors came to see the members of organized labor ply their trades.

There was the union butcher and baker, bottle maker, iron worker and musician—each doing his thing.

Lavor Taylor, a sheep shearer for 56 years and a veteran member of Meat Cutters Local 301 in Ephraim, Utah, demonstrated his skills and told of his trek through the western states every spring, shearing up to 120 sheep a day.

OLD UNION CRAFTSMANSHIP was further portrayed by union butchers Hy Perry, who has been making sausage for decades, and Max Cullen, a meat cutter since 1915.

Val Hamer, a bottle maker for 62 years, exhibited the almost lost art of glass bottle blowing as it had been performed for centuries.

Years of experience were also kneaded into the cakes and rolls produced by the Bakery & Confectionery Workers and gobbled up by visitors.

YOUNG CRAFTSMEN from all parts of the nation, members of the Iron Workers union, worked as a skilled team erecting and razing a two-story steel structure several times a day.

And from an open-air stage sponsored by the Musicians, folksingers and union song balladiers attracted large crowds at their performances that ran from morning into the evening.

A unique feature of the festival was the impromptu discussion panels at which the union craftsmen told in their own words what their union cards meant to them in working conditions, security—and solidarity.

Convention Approves Plan:

Union Briefing Set For New Musicians

By Jane Van Sant

Seattle—New members of the Musicians will be encouraged to become active union members, not just cardholders, under a mandatory orientation program adopted at the AFM's 75th anniversary convention here.

Convention delegates were given a preview of an audio-visual program developed by the international union as part of the orientation designed to help new members "better understand their rights and obligations."

Under the bylaw amendment approved by the delegates, new members will be obligated to complete the orientation program within six months of admittance to the union.

Musicians Pres. Hal C. Davis reported to the convention that the merger of former segregated locals in 38 cities has now been completed.

The last remaining mergers were completed this year, and the goal of eliminating "dual unionism based on the invidious consideration of race has been achieved." In two cases, Davis reported, local union charters had to be revoked "to achieve the essential result."

Davis announced that James C. Petrillo, president-emeritus of the Musicians, will continue to head the union's civil rights department "and assist all merged locals in meeting any problems that may arise in the enforcement of our basic policy of fair and equal treatment for all members." E. V. Lewis, assistant to Davis, will also work on the civil rights enforcement program.

Delegates also voted to expand the union's ban on discrimination in employment opportunities to include sex and age, as well as the existing prohibition against bias because of religion, race, color and national origin.

The convention voted an enthusiastic endorsement of the labor-supported National Health Security bill as the best program to make medical care available to everyone and to improve the system of providing health care. It urged Congress to act promptly on the legislation.

The delegates also adopted a resolution urging all locals to establish a medical benefit plan for their members.

The convention authorized establishment of both the president's office and the secretary-treasurer's office in one facility in the New York metropolitan area. For many years these offices have been separate: the president's office located in New York City and the office of the secretary-treasurer in Newark, N.J.

All five incumbent executive board members were re-elected. There were 14 candidates on the convention ballots. The returning board members are J. Martin Emerson of Washington, D.C.; A. A. Tomei of Philadelphia; David Winstein of New Orleans; John Tranchitella of Los Angeles, and Max Arons of New York. Earlier, the convention unanimously returned the union's general officers, including Davis and Sec-Treas. Stanley Ballard.

John Martin, secretary-treasurer of the British Musicians Union told the delegates that they share two problems: the need for full acceptance of trade unions, and lack of respect for live performance. He agreed with Davis' quip that listening to canned music is like "kissing a girl on the telephone."

He complimented the convention on the decision to estabilsh an orientation program, calling it "counter-indoctrination" to combat the forces working against unionism.

The convention also heard Azeekel (Kelly) Pacis, president of the Musicians' Guild of the Philippines.

INTERMISSION during 75th anniversary convention of Musicians gives Pres. Hal C. Davis a chance to sit in on the drums—and he makes the most of it.

Pension Hikes Pressed For Hazardous Service

Improved federal retirement benefits for fire fighters, air controllers and other groups of employes performing hazardous duties was given strong support by AFL-CIO unions at hearings held by a House Post Office & Civil Service subcommittee.

John A. McCart, operations director of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council told the subcommittee that the percentage formula for computing hazardous retirement annuities was first fixed at 2 percent when the Civil Service Retirement Act was enacted in 1948.

"As Congress recognized the necessity of updating the act, the formula for calculating pensions of federal workers generally has improved," said McCart. But, he added, "the method of computing pensions for those hazardous jobs has remained static for more than two decades.

"The council advocates that Congress approve a change from 2 to 2.5 percent in the present method of determining annuities for those who retire under the hazardous retirement provisions of the act."

McCart noted that the 91st Congress had approved a bill including federal fire fighters among those eligible for hazardous retirement and that the measure was vetoed by Pres. Nixon.

"Not much has changed . . . except that additional fire personnel have been killed in action, additional fire fighters are suffering disabilities caused by their long hours of arduous work, which is shortening their lives," McCart testified.

Fire fighters employed by municipalities may retire after 20 years of service at age 50 and receive one-half their salary at the time of retirement he told the subcommittee.

McCart also spoke in support of a bill introduced by Rep. Morris K. Udall (D-Ariz.) which would permit air controllers to count 1.4 years for retirement purposes for each full year he serves.

"Thus, after 21.5 years of actual service, the employe would have fully acquired the equivalent of 30 years needed for retirement generally," he said, adding that the age requirement in an Administration proposal was "unrealistic."

The Udall proposal would give an air controller vesting rights after 10 years in the event he was required to transfer to a less onerous job.

McCart spoke on behalf of other employes involved in hazardous work, including employes aboard ocean-going vessels, helicopter and aircraft instructors, nurses and paramedical personnel, employes working with explosive, toxic or atomic substances and law enforcement officers.

The AFL-CIO Government Employes Council is composed of 34 unions representing more than 1 million federal employes.

Job Training Pact Signed By Rail Clerks

Chicago—The Job Corps announced that the Railway & Airline Clerks have signed a one-year contract to train 240 women as clerks in railroad offices.

The contract, said by the Corps to be the first of its kind with a labor union in the six-year history of the agency, provides for the spending of $275,500 in federal funds to initiate, conduct and manage the new program, and to provide job placement service for enrollees.

Assistant Labor Sec. Malcolm R. Lovell, Jr., said this is the first program designed to "train and directly place disadvantaged young women from poverty-stricken families into jobs covered by a major union."

Through a subcontract with Philco-Ford, which operates the Chicago Residential Manpower Center, and another planned for the Women's Job Corps Center in Los Angles, the union will train 60 pupils in each of two six-month training periods at each center. After training, the enrollees will be placed in permanent jobs under union contracts and be eligible for membership in BRAC.

Current union-management agreements call for starting wages of about $600 a month—considerably higher than the prevailing rate for starting jobs in the general clerical field, Lovell said. The training program will be extended to other Job Corps centers later this year he reported.

Reduced Air Fares Urged for Elderly

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to enact into law a pending bill that would provide reduced airline fares for persons aged 65 and over.

Travel difficulties are "intensifying the many problems faced by low-income groups such as the elderly," Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller wrote Chairman Howard W. Cannon (D-Nev.) of the Senate Subcommittee on Aviation.

Noting that young people, clergymen, armed services personnel and others can travel at reduced fares, Biemiller said lower fares will make it possible for many older persons to visit families and friends, especially at times when the strain of other modes of travel would impose a hardship on the elderly.

Meany Assails Banks On Prime Rate Boost

rise in short-term borrowing rates and in the cost of funds to the bank over recent weeks." Interest rates have been rising this spring but banks have generally reported that the demands for loans have been a bit sluggish.

The prime rate zoomed to a historic high of 8.5 percent in the summer of 1969, dropped to 7.5 by the fall of 1970 and then started a fairly sharp and rapid descent to 5.25 percent in February-March of this year. It moved up to 5.5 percent in April where it remained through the end of June.

The Federal Reserve Board discount rate also dropped from 6 percent in November 1970 to its current 4.75 percent. Some bankers expected the discount rise to follow the prime rate boost.

Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.), chairman of the House Banking Committee, denounced the latest rate hike and also called on the President to use his credit-control authority to roll back the increase.

He said the higher rate was "totally unnecessary and inconsistent with the economic conditions of the nation."

The New York Times story on the prime rate increase noted that "many bankers will concede that loan demand alone does not justify a higher prime rate," although they claim loan demand is only part of the story. The banks contend that the higher interest rates—according to the Monthly Economic Letter of the First National City Bank in New York—"are a reflection of an effort by the money managers to cut back the rate of expansion in the supply of money to a more moderate pace."

Meany's comment pointed out that the prime rate hike would not only boost costs and prices from the farmer and the manufacturer to the retail store and consumer but that "it would aggravate the financial burdens of the cities, other local government units and the states."

Labor Studies Chief Named at Roosevelt

Chicago — Duane Beeler, who had served the former Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen as a general chairman for 20 years, has been appointed acting director of the Roosevelt University Labor Education Division.

Beeler joined the Roosevelt faculty in 1960 and has been assistant director of the labor education division since 1966. He also has taught at the University of Chicago.

convention that 9,328 black youths are enrolled in organized labor's Outreach program in 83 cities. Outreach is aimed at providing building trades skills to minority and disadvantaged youth.

A year ago, there were 6,000 black youths enrolled as apprentices in 63 cities.

"We in labor are very proud of these young workers," Meany said.

"Their dropout rate is far lower than that of the school system. Their performance level is high. They are emerging as first-class craftsmen, first-class trade unionists and first-class citizens.

"Labor's commitment to them is eloquently demonstrated by the figures: Outreach has expanded by more than 50 percent in a year of deep depression and high unemployment throughout the construction industry," Meany declared.

He said the Urban League, the Joint Apprenticeship Program of the A. Philip Randolph Institute Education Fund-Workers Defense League and the Negro Trade Union Leadership Councils of Philadelphia and Detroit work hand in hand "with our building trades councils and unions" in the Outreach program.

Meany described the program as "the fairest, most promising and most fulfilling program yet devised to break down the barriers to full occupational, economic and social equality. It must be developed and expanded."

He said that in Cleveland and New York, apprentice graduates are receiving journeymen cards after completing the Outreach program, and that Outreach is now seeking out minority journeymen who are outside unions.

Meany emphasized, however, that none of these programs can reach full potential in the present climate of recession, inflation and economic stagnation.

He charged that the Nixon Administration is dismantling the war on poverty and stalling on implementing existing civil rights legislation.

"Its economic game plan is pushing the country, and especially its minority citizens backwards.

"The AFL-CIO will be fighting hard in the months to come for new economic policies, new health and education policies, new housing construction policies and new employment policies to get America moving again."

Would Reverse NLRB:

GOP Chairman's Bill Aims Blow at Labor

Sen. Robert J. Dole of Kansas, chairman of the Republican National Committee, has introduced a bill amending the National Labor Relations Act that would hamstring unions and strengthen anti-labor employers.

It would legalize "Boulwarism"—the take-it-or-leave-it substitute for collective bargaining condemned by both the National Labor Relations Board and the Supreme Court.

In a broad range of other areas, it would revoke labor board and court decisions upholding union positions. And it would freeze into law those decisions that have gone against unions.

Following are key provisions of the Dole bill:

- Unions would be prohibited from bargaining to improve pensions and benefits for retired workers. The NLRB has held that unions can bargain for retired workers, a federal appellate court ruled to the contrary, and the issue is expected to be decided by the Supreme Court.

- Employers would not be required to furnish information to unions for use in collective bargaining, such as data on incentive rates and time studies. The NLRB and the courts have said that such information must be furnished unless compiling it would be excessively burdensome in relation to its value in negotiations.

- An employer's withdrawal of an offer made at the bargaining table could no longer be considered a sign of bad-faith in negotiations.

- The labor board would be barred from imposing any monetary penalty other than back pay. The effect of this would be to overturn an appellate court decision upholding the power of the NLRB to order an employer to make good losses to workers and their union resulting from his "frivolous" refusal to bargain.

- Employers would no longer be required to bargain with a union before contracting out work normally done by union members. This would reverse a Supreme Court decision requiring bargaining on the issue.

- After the expiration date of a contract, an employer would be free to change the conditions of employment unilaterally without further bargaining. At present, he may act on his own only after bargaining to an impasse.

As for the "Boulwarism" issue, Dole told the Senate that recent NLRB decisions are unfair to employers.

"Suppose an employer puts his best possible offer on the table at the beginning of negotiations," Dole said. "Suppose he decides he does not want to play games, does not want to spend a lot of time jockeying back and forth, and wants to get on with the operation of his business."

In such cases, Dole complained, the NLRB "has found this practice to constitute 'an adamant refusal and an uncompromising attitude.'" of money involved is substantially above the President's proposals.

His bill, Dole told the Senate, would make it clear that such an employer would not be compelled to change his tactics.

The AFL-CIO strongly supported the legislation in testimony before both House and Senate committees. AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller termed the program of "vital importance at this time because the next few years are likely to be a preliminary tooling-up period to prepare for a national health program."

The total amount authorized by the bills is $3.5 billion with $2.8 billion to help train more doctors and other medical professionals, and $170 million to train nurses.

This is about four times the amount that has been appropriated for existing, smaller-scaled programs over the past three years.

The long-range goal of the two bills is to increase the number of practicing health professionals by about one-third during the decade.

The House passed the medical professions bill in a 343-3 rollcall vote and then gave voice vote approval to the companion measure for nurses' training.

A major feature of the House bill is a $872 million authorization for grants over the next three fiscal years to health profession schools based on the number of students enrolled and the number of graduates. There would be incentives for graduating students from medical schools in three years instead of the present four.

The bill also authorizes $135 million for direct student loans in addition to $48 million in guarantees on private loans.

It offers inducements to attract students from minority groups and to turn out more physicians committed to practice in urban slums and sparsely populated rural areas.

The bill would increase the limit on student loans from $2,500 to $3,500, and add a provision that forgives a loan in two instances: If a person is willing to practice in areas of critical shortage or if a person fails to complete his schooling and is in exceptionally needy circumstances. It provides forgiveness of 75 percent—up to $15,000—if the graduate practices for three years in a shortage area.

Federal subsidies to educational institutions would be based on enrollment:

For schools of medicine, osteopathy and dentistry, $2,500 is provided for each full-time student in the first, second or third year, and $1,000 is provided for each student representing an increase in enrollment, plus $4,000 per graduate.

Schools of optometry, pharmacy and podiatry would receive $800 per student.

In addition, the bill authorizes $412 million over the three-year period for special project grants for schools of medicine, dentistry and other professions.

Special projects can be used to provide money to schools which are in serious financial condition.

The bill includes a program recommended by the Adminsiration called Health Manpower Education Initiative Awards totaling $270 million for continuing education of physicians and for the training of other personnel to improve the supply and distribution of health care manpower.

CWA Presses For Accord As Deadline Nears

The Communications Workers are "still trying to get an agreement" with Bell Telephone System management before a July 14 strike deadline, but time is running out for settlement, CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne warned.

Management's failure to talk about anything but minor contract issues has dimmed the prospects for a peaceful agreement, Beirne said.

He added: "We will go on trying but, short of an acceptable new move by the company, there will be a nationwide walkout at 6 a.m. Eastern Daylight Time" July 14.

The union represents nearly 500,000 Bell employes whose contracts are due to expire by the deadline.

In a summary of negotiations to date, Beirne noted that "the union has given the system more than adequate notice of both our goals and our positive intentions."

More than a year ago, he said, "we publicly warned that Bell workers would no longer subsidize Bell profits and practices at the expense of their own good and welfare."

The union "explicitly warned the companies that our members are caught in a bind on wages and must catch up this year—substantially. At every step of the way, we pointed out that we would do everything we could to reach agreement short of a strike."

Pattern negotiations have been conducted in New York City, headquarters of CWA's nationwide Western Electric installers' unit, and in Washington, D.C., at the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co.

Bommarito Hits Contracting of Safety Classes

The Labor Dept. is bypassing the trade union movement's educational and training facilities in its administration of the Occupational Safety & Health Act of 1970, Rubber Workers Pres. Peter Bommarito charged.

Bommarito, head of the Industrial Union Department's Safety & Health Committee, said that a contract for orientation and training awarded the Boeing company of Seattle by the Labor Dept. was over the "many objections from the IUD and a number of interested unions."

It had been the union's understanding, Bommarito said, that "training would be conducted by the unions in cooperation with the government. There is no need and no desirability of a corporate 'middle man' in this health and safety educational project."

Under terms of the contract Boeing will undertake to set up 52 one-day orientation sessions across the country with 50 to 100 persons per session to explain the act and its applications.

Construction Trades Panel Backs Improvements in Vocational Courses

The goal of improved vocational education programs in the nation's school systems, leading to careers in the construction trades, was unanimously endorsed by a federal panel of labor, industry and public representatives.

The Construction Industry Collective Bargaining Commission recommended that the efforts focus on vocational training for all youths in junior high school classes.

It also called for increased federal, state and local government support, along with private backing, for the "World of Construction Program."

That program was developed by Ohio State University with the cooperation of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and its affiliates.

The commission urged strong and active policies of building trades unions and contractor associations aimed at improving vocational education with the objective of meeting future needs of the construction industry.

It suggested certification of approved courses so that students completing them could receive credits for entry in apprenticeship.

Cooperative work-study programs would also be encouraged through the development of vocational industrial clubs for youths, with union locals and contractor associations playing a key role.

These clubs, the commission noted, would stress the importance of craftsmanship, enthusiasm for learning and the dignity of work that is needed for personal growth in actual working conditions.

The commission also emphasized the need to restore pride in the building crafts and promote the status of skilled labor. It said the almost exclusive concern given the college-bound high school student today has downplayed the importance of vocational programs.

It's goal, the commission said, is a concerted effort by labor and management, educators and government to redress this imbalance in educational programs.

Labor representatives serving on the commission's subcommittee on vocational education were Pres. S. Frank Raftery of the Painters, Pres. Thomas F. Murphy of the Bricklayers and Peter T. Schoemann, who is on leave as president of the Plumbers & Pipefitters. Ten additional labor representatives served on the vocational education subcommittee's task force.

Meany to Appear On Meet the Press

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany will appear on the Meet the Press television news interview Sunday, July 11th, the day before the opening of the AFL-CIO Conference on Jobs.

The program is carried by the NBC network and will be seen in the Washington, D.C., area on Channel 4 at 1 p.m.

IBEW Strikes 18 Plants of General Cable

More than 4,000 employes of General Cable Corp. are on strike at 18 company locations because management "failed to be responsive to the needs of its employes in the face of a disastrously spiraling inflation," Pres. Charles H. Pillard of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers announced.

The strike started July 1 in 11 states. Pillard termed the company's offer of 20 cents, 15 and 15 in negotiations for a new three-year agreement "miserly."

Company plants are in Colusa and Lindsay, Calif., Bayonne and Perth Amboy, N.J., St. Louis, Baltimore and Elkton, Md.; Memphis, Westbury, N.Y., Monticello, Ill., Bonham, Texas, Brandon, Miss., Abbeyville, S.C. and Kingman, Ariz.

Also striking are office clerical workers in three cities.

'Fed Up' Unionists Demand Congress Act on Job Need

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMIC problems are pinned on Nixon Administration blunders by Federation Pres. George Meany in keynoting the AFL-CIO Conference on Jobs attended by 600 delegates and congressional leaders.

Nixon Policies Hit For Gross Errors

By David L. Perlman

An aroused labor movement called on Congress to repair the damage the Nixon Administration has inflicted on the economy and put America back on the road to full employment.

Six hundred delegates to the AFL-CIO Conference on Jobs explored the problems and solutions with top congressional leaders in an atmosphere of urgency—and of anger.

"We are here because we are just plain fed up," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in his keynote to the two-day conference. The state of the economy is "lousy."

He pinned the blame squarely on Pres. Nixon and his economic strategists for gross blunders that have thrown millions out of work—"human beings," not mere statistics.

"The present state of economic disaster," Meany emphasized, "dates back to Jan. 20, 1969—the day Pres. Nixon took office."

And as for the President's new "chief economic spokesman," Meany observed that Treasury Sec. John Connally may know "quite a bit about the oil companies and their needs," but he clearly "doesn't understand the problems of American workers."

Because the White House has abdicated its responsibilities, Meany stressed that labor is "looking to Congress to get this nation moving again" with programs to put America back to work, create new jobs, and preserve existing jobs and industries.

Before the conference delegates headed for home, Meany charged them to start now to help COPE mount labor's greatest political effort ever, so that the 1972 elections will bring both an administration and a Congress receptive to the nation's needs.

During the jobs conference, congressional leaders gave a prompt response to Meany's call for action on Capitol Hill to overcome White House apathy.

"We shall measure up," House Speaker Carl Albert pledged.

Albert told the delegates that, with unemployment approaching "breadline proportions" and an unabated inflation, congressional leaders will work to develop "imaginative programs in concert with labor which has played such a pivital role in the recent progress of this nation."

Wages, Pensions Involved:

Inadequate Bell System Offer Triggers Strike by 500,000

By Eugene A. Kelly

More than 500,000 telephone workers struck the Bell System in 55,000 U.S. communities when their unions' strike deadline came and went without an acceptable contract offer from any Bell company.

The strike, by members of the Communications Workers, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and two unaffiliated unions in Connecticut and Pennsylvania, is over wages, pensions, retroactivity, local grievances, union security and other bread-and-butter issues.

Nearly half a million CWA members put up picket lines. So did 11,000 IBEW members employed by the New Jersey Bell Telephone Co. whose contract also had expired. The IBEW struck after rejecting a "puny" company offer.

Talks are continuing at other IBEW locations of Bell and the Western Electric Co., its manufacturing arm. The union indicated that contract expirations in the coming weeks will add 150,000 workers to the picket lines unless a settlement is reached.

CWA officers met officials of the parent American Telephone & Telegraph Co. in intensive sessions prior to the strike deadline in the offices of Director J. Curtis Counts of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

But CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne said that all company offers before the strike were "totally inadequate" and an IBEW spokesman said a so-called "last-minute improvement" in management's proposals presented merely a "stall" to confuse union members.

Nevertheless, Beirne said, intensive discussions aimed at bringing an early end to the strike—"both formal and informal"—are still continuing.

"We want to find an area of agreement that will bring this strike to a successful conclusion," the CWA president said.

"We said many times that we wanted an agreement, not a strike."

Beirne told newsmen that CWA did "everything possible to avoid a strike. But it finally came down to a very simple proposition: the Communications Workers want the communications industry to move forward with the rest of the country."

The Bell System "not only re-

States Miss Deadline On Jobless Benefits

The AFL-CIO reminded Pres. Nixon that the deadline he set for states to improve unemployment benefits is now up, and urged him to propose federal legislation to raise benefit standards.

"There is no excuse for any further delay," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany wrote Nixon.

Meany's letter was sent to the President on the second anniversary of a Nixon message on unemployment compensation that called on the states to raise the ceiling on benefits so that at least 80 percent of the jobless would receive half their lost wages.

Nixon in 1969 asked the states to meet this standard within two years to avert the need for federal action.

But most states have not acted, and Meany posed this question to the President:

"In view of the record of inaction by the states, the plight of millions of unemployed and the need for restoring purchasing power in the economy, may we expect that you will now ask the Congress for federal action, as you clearly implied in your message two years ago today?"

During the Eisenhower Administration, a similar futile appeal to Bid to Overturn Veto Falls Short in Senate

A Senate attempt to override Pres. Nixon's veto of a job-creating $2 billion accelerated public works bill fell five votes short of the needed two-thirds majority as most Republicans lined up dutifully behind the Administration.

A 57-36 majority sought to repass the labor-supported bill over the President's veto. Six Republicans joined 51 Democrats in voting to override. Opposed were 35 Republicans and Virginia Sen. Harry F. Byrd, Jr.

Earlier in the week, the President sought to take the sting out of his rejection of the public works bill by signing into law the Nelson-Daniels public service employment bill, even though he had vetoed similar legislation last year.

Both measures had been high on labor's priority list as effective weapons to create jobs for the unemployed while at the same time enabling local governments to finance urgently needed services and public facilities.

The public service measure must still be funded, and the AFL-CIO has urged the Administration to promptly request the $1 billion authorized for the first year.

Congressional and union leaders have also expressed concern at indications that the Labor Dept. may seek to administer the law in a manner closer to the President's "special revenue-sharing" plan, which would channel funds through governors and big city mayors, rather than under the congressional formula of direct federal-to-city grants.

Failure of the Senate to override the public works veto also had the effect of killing two other major programs included in the legislation

Export of Jobs Threatening Econo

Public Works Termed Cheaper Than Welfare

It would be far cheaper for the United States to put its unemployed millions to work on building hospitals, nursing homes or water and sewage treatment plants than it is to pay $1.5 billion a month for unemployment and welfare benefits, the AFL-CIO Conference on Jobs was told.

Rep. John A. Blatnik (D-Minn.), chairman of the House Public Works Committee, told a conference panel that the public works bill "was the most important single piece of legislation in the 92nd Congress" and vowed a continued fight for it despite Pres. Nixon's veto.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. S. Frank Raftery, president of the Painters, told the conference that the major needs of the American economy—jobs to end the recession and rebuilding U.S. cities—would be met by the public works bill. The Nixon veto, Raftery said, proves that the treatment needed by the U.S. economy "won't be found in any of the policies practiced by the Administration."

Raftery and Blatnik stressed that the public works bill would not create "dead-end, leaf-raking jobs" but would make a direct contribution to what Raftery called "the large backlog of unmet needs" for such public facilities as urban mass transportation, sanitation, education, health care and public safety.

"Right now we are spending close to $1 billion a month on welfare-public assistance and well over half a billion a month on unemployment benefits," Blatnik said, so it adds up to $18 billion a year, "not to put people to work on the essential business of our society, but to keep them from starving in the streets."

"And yet, Nixon insists it would be 'inflationary' to divert $2 billion from that non-productive spending stream and put it to work over the next two years for the building of America," Blatnik said

Besides bad economics by the Administration, which he characterized as a combination of "stumbling, fumbling and wishful thinking," Blatnik said the public works veto also ignored the pyschological impact of getting people off the public dole and into a project they could be proud of.

Conference speakers sharply challenged Nixon's claim in the veto message that "the impact of the bill would focus primarily on the construction industry which already has experienced rapid cost inflation."

Raftery said Nixon was trying to make "a political scapegoat" of construction workers and pointed out that wage costs are a declining factor in construction when contrasted with increases in interest rates and land costs.

When Nixon "accused construction workers of causing the 5 percent inflation of 1969 and the 6 percent inflation of 1970, he has found a scapegoat for the true culprits—his banker, contractor and big business friends," Raftery said.

Raftery also refuted the Administration's contention that the public works bill would take too long to get off the ground. That argument, he said, is based on the experience in 1962 when another anti-recession public works bill was passed.

But now, Raftery said, federal offices have a large backlog of applications from communities for projects on which the background work has already been done and only funding is needed. Blatnik predicted that most of the projects could be started within 90 days.

Similarly, Blatnik pointed out that the 1971 bill provided 80 percent federal financing—or even 100 percent in the case of an impoverished area such as an Indian reservation. And this helps the program get moving much better than the 1962 formula of matching funds from the community, he said, since the cities are even less able to come up with their share of funds.

PUBLIC SERVICE JOBS program must be properly funded and administered, conference participants stressed. William Bechtel, staff director of the Senate Employment subcommittee, speaks at a workshop chaired by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Matthew Guinan.

Flood of Imports Endangers Hard-Won Living Standards

Stop the export of American jobs before the entire industrial base of the nation's economy is destroyed, delegates to the AFL-CIO Jobs Conference demanded.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. I. W. Abel, addressing the opening general session of the conference, set the grim theme that would be stressed again and again during the two days of sessions:

"All of us in this room have been witness to how a rising flood of imports has washed thousands and thousands of jobs down the drain.

"Almost no part of the American work force has escaped the effects," the Steelworkers' president said.

"We simply cannot continue to export American jobs and American expertise and maintain our living standards under the rules of the game of international trade as they are played today. It's as simple and as frightening as that."

By far the largest of the five simultaneous panel sessions was devoted to trade problems.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Paul Jennings, who presided, stressed the importance of all unions actively pushing for the trade bill that the AFL-CIO and labor's allies in Congress are now drafting.

It's the only means of halting the destruction of American jobs by a rising torrent of low-wage imports, he declared.

And on the conference's final day, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, the president of the Clothing Workers, took the floor to tell his fellow delegates:

"We are suffering, just like the electronics and shoe and other industries, from a growing flood of imports from nations where wage levels are as low as 9 cents an hour.

"We cannot compete with 9 cents an hour—and we don't want to try to compete. It took us years to overcome sweatshop conditions in this country, and we don't intend to allow the sweatshop to return on the back of low-wage imports."

"Every American worker has a stake" in the legislative program outlined by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in May, Jennings said in the keynote address to the trade panel.

Two members of Congress agreed with the need for action now to stem the flood of foreign imports: "Every other country in the world is protecting jobs of its workers except the U.S," said Rep. Jackson E. Betts (R-Ohio). Rep. James A. Burke (D-Mass.) urged labor to "stand up and fight" for reform in import policies without further delay.

Betts urged that trade-implementing decisions be taken out of the hands of the White House and the State Dept. and be put under the control of Congress. He recommended also that spokesmen for labor and industry should sit in on all international talks involving foreign trade.

FOREIGN TRADE POLICIES are reviewed by Rep. James A. Burke (D-Mass.), AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Paul Jennings and Rep. Jackson E. Betts. (R-Ohio).

Proposals on trade legislation are being drafted and will be ready for introduction within a short time, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said.

The problem of jobs is felt by "virtually every kind of American worker today," Jennings told the delegates. All have felt the impact caused by imports, and the runaway to foreign shores of multinational companies.

"The AFL-CIO has developed a program to deal with this problem, to bring our policies up to date and to deal with the world as it is," Jennings declared.

"This is a vital program: to regulate imports where necessary, to close tariff loopholes, to enforce our laws against foreign dumping, to make the investment and trade actions of the big corporations responsible to the whole of society, to limit the export of technology, to promote fair trade, so the workers of other countries will move up to our level, not that we are pulled down to theirs."

Jennings asked the delegates "if we do not sell our labor as individuals, and if we do not sell our products as a nation, how in the name of common sense will we have the money to buy?"

Delegates from affected unions described the results of current foreign trade policies of the nation:

- The U.S. government has helped promote a Mexican-border program that has cost thousands of U.S. jobs and has boosted the value of goods from Mexican plants from $7 million in 1966 to an anticipated $350 million this year.
- In the shoe industry, the U.S. has exported 65,000 jobs between 1960 and 1969, and imports are now more than a third of all U.S. shoe sales.
- The volume of imported men's suits tripled between 1968 and 1970. In the first three months of this year, imports were up 25 percent over last year. Women's dress imports have zoomed from 20,000 dresses in 1959 to 11 million in 1970.
- The U.S. has lost entire industries and the thousands of jobs that accompanied them overseas—in typewriters, bicycles, watches, radios, tape recorders, baseball gloves, and many others.

Burke, the Boston congressman, summed it up at the close: "What we are trying to do is restore some sense of balance to our trade picture. We are trying to substitute orderly growth for runaway flooding."

His only regret, Burke said, is the time it will take for the public and Congress to realize this growth will be bought at a high price—in additional jobs lost, whole communities disrupted and possibly destroyed.

"Anything we can do here today to shorten this time lag will be the most important contribution this conference can make," he said.

AFT Focuses On Non-Public School Staffs

The Teachers union will set-up a separate department and staff in September to concentrate on organizing the nation's 110,000 private and parish school teachers.

AFT Pres. David Selden told delegates to the union's first conference for teachers outside the public school system that the union will also establish a non-public-school Teachers Advisory Council to work with the union's staff on the program.

Some 50 delegates took part in the conference. Speakers included Mrs. Mary Ellen Riordan, president of the Detroit Federation of Teachers; the Rev. Albert Koob, president of the National Catholic Education Association; AFT Sec.-Treas. Robert Porter; and Selden.

Panels discussed the right of teachers to organize, ways of winning recognition for collective bargaining purposes, basic negotiating methods and local union structure.

While the AFT has "traditionally been a firm supporter of the concept of separation of church and state," Selden stressed that the union has repeatedly gone on record in favor of health and welfare services to children regardless of the school they attend.

To Absorb Defense Cuts:

Commitment to Social Needs Held Key to Reconversion

A realistic commitment to America's pressing social needs could reconvert the country's economy to one that would take up the slack of lost defense jobs and provide full employment, the AFL-CIO Jobs Conference was told:

"There are those who say the American economy needs war because it cannot provide enough jobs in time of peace," said AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Floyd E. Smith.

"The fact is, however, that we can do anything we wish with the great engine of production that we possess. The priorities of peace are pressing in on us today. For too long we've neglected the needs of our land and our people."

The Machinists president's sentiments were echoed in the remarks of other major speakers on reconversion, including Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan, who is secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.).

Although today's reconversion problem is mild compared to that presented by returning World War II veterans, Smith noted that there will be 2.6 million fewer defense jobs in Fiscal 1972.

Many of these workers already are statistics, Smith said—part of the 5.5 million American jobless who also include 350,000 returning Vietnam veterans unable to find jobs.

These jobless workers could be used to help solve problems of poverty, urban blight, health care and the environment, Smith said.

"What we need," he declared, "is a President with a program that will match the talents of America's work force against the needs of the American people.

"What we need is a government committed to a policy of full employment, and that will not be satisfied with a 6-percent, 5-percent, or even a 4-percent rate of unemployment."

He reiterated AFL-CIO Executive Council recommendations on reconversion, including offsetting reductions in defense spending, dollar for dollar, with increases in housing, education, health, day-care centers, mass transit, parks, pollution "and a general nationwide effort to cleanse and enrich our total environment."

Recommendations advocating release of $12 billion in appropriated public works funds and putting the unemployed to work in public service also were cited by Smith.

Although there is no backlog of consumer demand today as there was in 1946, Keenan noted a similarity in both periods: the country is as unprepared now as it was then to handle the winding down of a defense-oriented economy.

"The Administration failed to plan for these cuts in defense, so the problem of reconversion has been compounded and aggravated," Keenan said during a discussion session on reconversion featuring Sen. Jackson.

"A policy of national economic recovery is the key to reconversion and employment of Vietnam veterans, college graduates without jobs and laid-off blue-collar workers," said the Washington Democrat.

"Unfortunately for the nation, Mr. Nixon learned his economics as Vice President during the 1950s when we had three recessions in eight years."

To get the economy moving again, Jackson proposes an Economic Disaster Relief Act which would provide special assistance for hard-hit areas. It would establish a $2 billion economic recovery fund for special grants to states and local governments, businesses, families and individuals for housing relocation, unemployment assistance and job retraining.

He has also introduced a bill that would create 500,000 conservation jobs in an Environmental Service Corps patterned after the Civilian Conservation Corps of the Depression era.

Jackson's state has been severely wracked by unemployment, most of it in the Seattle and Puget Sound area where more than 100,000 are jobless—due chiefly to cutbacks in the aerospace industry.

Tom Edwards, president of Machinists District 751 in Seattle, noted in a paper submitted to the conference that the high level of skills possessed by these workers can be turned to other uses.

"Former aerospace employes need jobs, not training—and they need work now," he stressed.

"Federal assistance in re-employing the valuable natural resource that these engineers and technicans constitute, must take into account . . . the devastating effect . . . of failing to assist them."

EFFECTIVE RECONVERSION of the nation's defense industry is necessary to full employment, Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) declared at panel chaired by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan, right.

Watchdog Role Asked For Public Service Act

Organized labor must act as a watchdog to insure full funding and proper implementation of the new $2.25 billion public service jobs program, participants in the AFL-CIO Jobs Conference stressed.

The measure is aimed at combating unemployment by providing 200,000 jobs with city, county and state governments over the next two years in such fields as health, teaching, child care, public safety, conservation and environment.

And with 85 percent of the money earmarked by Congress for wages and benefits, a conference report emphasized that "public service unions should get involved at the planning stage in helping local officials to determine manpower priorities."

The report prepared by Vice Pres. Matthew Guinan urged the AFL-CIO to establish an informal committee made up of public service union representatives to oversee preparation of Labor Dept. guidelines and regulations. It also called on the Human Resources Development Institute and the federation's Dept. of Research to assist affiliates in carrying out the purpose of the new law.

The conference report stressed that the law is only the first step toward a permanent public service jobs program and a full employment economy.

This view was presented in a plenary session opening the conference by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Jerry Wurf, who warned that "we still need to get the program funded at the full level authorized in the bill."

Wurf, president of the State, County & Municipal Employes, said organized labor must assure "that what we have won in the legislation is not stolen away in administrative regulations."

These also were the sentiments of Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.). Nelson was detained by a Senate rollcall vote and his speech was delivered by William Bechtel, staff director of the Senate Labor Subcommittee on Employment, Manpower & Poverty. Nelson is chairman of the subcommittee.

Bechtel and Austin Sullivan, legislative specialist of the House Education & Labor Committee, answered questions on implementation of the law.

"Properly funded and imaginatively administered, the Emergency Employment Act can begin channeling capable people into good jobs this summer," Nelson said in the speech.

"I would hope that by Christmas, we could have at least 100,000 people at work in worthwhile jobs, rather than just long lines of the unemployed."

He said that if the Administration's desire for such a bill is genuine, it will request the full $2.25 billion authorized by the bill.

"If they do not, it will once again raise grave questions as to how dedicated the Administration is to its announced goal of reducing unemployment.

"And I can assure you," Nelson said, "that it will guarantee a fight in the Senate."

Bechtel and Sullivan discussed apparent plans by the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration to operate the new program in a manner consistent with the President's revenue sharing plans instead of as spelled out by Congress. They warned that the Labor Dept. hopes to limit funding of the programs to the states and the largest cities contrary to Congressional intent.

Wurf warned the Nixon Administration not to tamper with the law, noting that mayors and public service unions are united in support of the act, and "are watching the administrative operation of this program very closely."

"We are going to fight any attempt inside the White House or in the Labor Dept. to make this program anything other than what the Congress intended it to be," Wurf said.

IF STATES don't improve unemployment compensation, "the federal government will have to show them how," House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills warned. At right is AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Peter Bommarito, who chaired the panel.

Jobless Aid Termed 'First-Line Defense'

Adequate unemployment compensation backed by federal standards was termed the first line of defense for jobless workers at the AFL-CIO Jobs Conference.

Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), chairman of the powerful House Ways & Means Committee, noted that presidental urgings have failed to prod most states into raising their benefit ceilings so that the great majority of unemployed workers will be able to collect half of their lost wages.

Federation Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge stressed the importance of unions establishing Community Services programs to aid their unemployed members through the cooperation of the AFL-CIO.

Many public assistance services can be obtained for the jobless worker if he knows where to go, Suffridge noted. He listed food stamps, surplus commodities, debt counselling and money management, credit extension and various emergency aids, as food, shelter, clothing and others.

Federation Vice Pres. Peter Bommarito, chairman of the workshop on immediate aid for the unemployed, called for greater public awareness on the plight of the jobless worker. Too little concern is shown by many people unless they are directly affected, he said.

Mills told the delegates he is proud that his state of Arkansas is one of the few that has, and "we hope that other states will follow the lead."

But, Mills stressed, "this matter of adequacy of benefits is too important to be left to hope alone."

He described the 1970 amendments to the Employment Security Act as delivering a measure of relief toward needed improvements. While protection is being extended to an additional 5 million workers, Mills noted that there are still 11.9 million persons in the labor force excluded from coverage. These include farm workers, state and local public employes and those in domestic service.

Mills stressed the need for states to upgrade their unemployment insurance programs and voiced his "general" agreement with the goal that maximum benefits should be high enough to permit 80 percent of unemployed workers to receive at least one-half of their normal pay.

He recalled that Pres. Nixon in 1969 challenged the states to improve their unemployment protection if they wanted to avoid federal standards.

Now the ball has passed to the trade union movement, Mills indicated.

"You who represent organized labor must continue to give us and the state legislatures the benefit of your experience and your views," Mills emphasized, "because . . . your members are on the firing line . . . when recession or depression occurs."

The serious unemployment situation is putting the jobless insurance system to test, he said.

Approximately 6.5 million workers received $3.8 billion in benefit payments during 1970 through state compensation programs, Mills reported. These beneficiaries averaged $50 a week for 12 weeks and more than half of them were entitled to the maximum benefits paid by their states.

"Unfortunately," Mills stressed, "approximately 1.3 million, or 24 percent of all beneficiaries, were still unemployed" when their coverage ran out.

The conference also focused on welfare assistance available for the unemployed through government, community and voluntary agencies.

Unions can help workers greatly, Bommarito pointed out, by negotiating supplementary unemployment benefits in their contracts.

Workshop panelists also agreed to press labor's legislative drive in the Senate to improve House-passed welfare legislation.

Hubert Padgett Dies, Railroad Union Officer

Padgett was assistant to the president of the union before his retirement last year.

A Call to Action

THE STATE OF AMERICA'S economy is just plain lousy. Look at the dimensions of the problem:

—Five million workers are unemployed.

—Hundreds of thousands have exhausted their unemployment compensation.

—The cost of living is going up at an annual rate of about 6 percent.

—In three years, a half-million American jobs have been lost because of outmoded foreign trade policies.

—The number of people who live in poverty has grown to over 25 million.

—The unemployment rate among returning GIs is over 13 percent. The unemployment rate among blacks is 10 percent; among teenagers it is 17 percent. Among construction workers unemployment is over 10 percent.

We are here because we are just plain fed up. We are here because we are concerned about jobs, about the shortage of jobs, about the various ways jobs are being made to disappear.

We are here because wages buy less, because buying power is being wiped out by inflation.

We are here because of the impact of these things on American workers and their families, and the danger they pose to American society.

We want to put America back to work, reverse the destructive forces undermining the social stability of this nation, remind the government of its obligation, its responsibility, its duty.

WE WANT ACTION. We insist on action. And, I must say, in the light of experience, we see little prospect of constructive action from this Administration.

So we are looking to Congress for programs to get this nation moving again. This Congress and its predecessor have been constructive. They haven't done as much as they should; they haven't overriden as many ill-considered presidential vetoes as they should—but the Congress has been a great deal more constructive than the executive branch.

Mr. Nixon said he had the answers to the problems the country faced. He told the American people—and he convinced enough of them to get elected—that he knew a way to bring the war to a conclusion, and that he knew a way to halt inflation without causing unemployment.

He is making good on his first promise. He has reduced the number of American casualties; he is bringing American boys home. The war is winding down, and we give Mr. Nixon credit for that.

But on the second promise he hasn't delivered at all. He has not solved the problem of inflation. He has piled recession on top of inflation; and he has dumped the double burden squarely on the shoulders of the American people.

A Word Edgewise:

Kennedy's Liberal '61 Credo Index of U.S. Demoralization

By John P. Roche

IT WAS JAN. 20, 1961. The elements seemed to have conspired against the new President with an incredible snowstorm, but the day broke clear and cold and those of us who had worked our backs off for years to get John F. Kennedy into the White House gathered joyously for his inaugural address. The young man and the old general sitting next to him seemed somehow to symbolize a new era in American politics—and John Kennedy made the point explicit.

"Let the word go forth from this time and place, to friend and foe alike, that the torch has been passed to a new generation of Americans—born in this century, tempered by war, disciplined by a hard and bitter peace, proud of our ancient heritage—and unwilling to witness or permit the slow undoing of those human rights to which this nation has always been committed, and to which we are committed today at home and around the world.

". . . Let every nation know, whether it wishes us well or ill, that we shall pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe to assure the survival and the success of liberty."

Wild-eyed, messianic anti-communism? Of course not. An eager offer to play "world policeman?" Nonsense. On the contrary, this was a carefully measured statement of the liberal credo in international affairs. A hard, clear-cut strategic position combined with prudential flexibility.

As he put it in an address at the University of Washington, Nov. 16, 1961—in a formulation that I helped draft—"we must face problems which do not lend themselves to easy or quick or permanent solutions. And we must face the fact that the United States is neither omnipotent nor omniscient—that we are only 6 percent of the world's population . . . and that therefore there cannot be an American solution to every world problem."

This posture of active, liberal internationalism was applauded by the leading newspapers and commentators. The organized liberal community, convinced that American power during the '50s had been (in my words) "dying the death of a thousand cuts," looked forward to a revival of democratic internationalism.

In 1962, I was elected national chairman of Americans for Democratic Action (ADA) precisely because I reflected this liberal mood—over the objections, it might be added, of a handful of delegates who thought I was too dedicated a "cold warrior."

THIS MAY SEEM like ancient history, but it is relevant to current events in at least three ways.

First, on a personal level, it sets the baseline for evaluating the actions of those like myself who have been accused of "selling out" liberalism and other esoteric offenses. We may have been right, we may have been wrong, but we were the spokesmen for liberalism. We stood pat on Berlin in 1961, Cuba in 1962, and on Vietnam in the late '60s. And, by God, I still stand pat on John Kennedy's world view, even at the risk of being called a "war criminal" by some of my one-time associates.

Second, unless one understands this dominant Kennedy mood, he cannot possibly put Vietnam in perspective. Looking back from 1971, people keep asking, "How could we have gotten mixed up in Southeast Asia?" But from the perspective of 1963, the relevant question was "how could we not get involved?"

The premises about American power and world obligation that were the givens in the equation (see the New York Times editorials, for example) made American action inevitable. As "investigative" reporter Neil Sheehan put it in August 1964, "The fall of Southeast Asia because of an American defeat in Vietnam would amount to a strategic disaster of the first magnitude."

Finally, recalling Kennedy's position 10 years later provides a terrible index of national demoralization. It may be too late, but before the Democrats in Congress force Pres. Nixon to risk the survival in freedom of 16 million South Vietnamese as a trade for 300 or 400 American POWs, they might go back and reread John Kennedy's inaugural. Maybe I am a "fossil in the crystal of frozen time" (to borrow a phrase from Arthur Koestler), but I still believe that Kennedy's words were a prophetic analysis of our proper role in the world.

Albert Hits Nixon Approach:

Government Jobs Programs Fairest, Most Efficient Policy

The following is excerpted from an address by House Speaker Carl Albert to the AFL-CIO Conference on Jobs on July 12, 1971 in Washington.

THE DELIBERATE anti-inflation policy of the Nixon Administration has emerged as the true villain. Relying on the assurances of classically-trained economists that a sacrifice of jobs would bring deflation, the President has tightened the screws and seems helpless in the backwash of uncontrolled inflation and unemployment.

We have 5.5 million unemployed Americans as the price of these policies without benefit to the rest of us, and have bartered gainful employment for a sick economy. Industry—now operating below 75 percent of capacity—will simply not be able to gear up in the absence of consumer demand, and those who do have jobs will not discontinue putting their money into savings until they have confidence in the future. With interest rates now starting to move up again toward 1970's disastrous highs, it is not surprising that optimistic White House forecasts are greeted with almost universal pessimism.

The President's conversion to Keynesian theory, while long overdue, is not the less welcome. But along with the implementation of a full-employment budget, the severity of the situation demands that additional stops be pulled out. Perhaps it is time to look upon the free marketplace as an anachronism, a term we may use with nostalgia, but one which is hardly relevant in our desperate need to fit people to jobs in a fast-moving technological society.

A brief glance at the historic change in our work force may help to put our problem into perspective. In the early days of the Republic more than 70 percent of our people were farmers. Today that figure is nearer 6 percent.

While manual and service workers continue to provide the backbone of our economy, the number of white-collar workers has increased fourfold in this century alone. Professionals and technicians are the fastest growing of our occupational categories while remaining numerically small. Since 1956 the proportion of women has risen from 14.4 percent to 28.3 percent of the workforce, and teenagers now comprise 8.8 percent.

While we wrestle with complex questions of long-range needs, it has become obvious that jobs now are imperative as a bridge to the future. The natural flux of the marketplace has not provided every American with meaningful work, nor has it met industry's own requirements in terms of experience and expertise. In times as complex as these we have to jettison the worthless ballast of outdated economic theory.

Government as the employer of last resort in an emergency situation is clearly the fairest and most efficient answer. Unemployment is a national problem and places heavy burdens on us all—not only the jobless but also the taxpayers who must meet increasing welfare and other public assistance costs.

The Public Service Employment bill, one of our major legislative initiatives in Congress this year—vetoed by the President in 1970—is now about to become law, with labor's crucial and timely support. This concept must be looked upon as a necessary public investment in the welfare of the nation. A variety of benefits to the public can be envisioned by wise application of its provisions. The subsidization of teaching aides in crowded classrooms, the employment of qualified individuals in clinics and health facilities, the potential of additional manpower and skills being applied to our mounting pollution problem are realistic possibilities. Private enterprise alone has not been able to meet the need, and we in Congress are not hesitant to move into the gap.

Consequently the President's recent veto of the accelerated public works bill is inexplicable. Although we knew it would not solve our total unemployment problem, we deemed it a worthwhile $2-billion investment toward that goal and a complement to the public-service program.

IT IS NOT A HOAX to put the nation's jobless to work on public works projects—the hoax was in the cynical attempt to substitute a manpower reform bill for a job-oriented approach. Training is an important facet of our future initiatives, but first there must be jobs to train people for. The President knows this. He is reading the same monthly reports we are. There is little credibility in the Administration's emphasis on the need to put welfare recipients to work so long as there is no urgency over the plight of the millions who are available and ready to work but can't find any.

In addition to emergency employment bills, the persistence of inflation necessitates some kind of incomes policy. Though we have made wage-price controls available to the President for the past two years, he refuses to apply their sanctions. Clamping controls on one industry is an unfair and ineffective way to halt the rising cost of living. If the building trades are not the hardest-hit occupation under this Administration's inept economic policies, I am not reading the charts correctly.

The President seems incapable of viewing inflation as a broad-based phenomenon and continues to point the finger at labor alone. If controls are needed, they are needed on prices and profits across the board as well as wages. We have to educate the public and in so doing get the Administration away from labor's throat. Wooing Middle America will not pull us out of the doldrums, as housewives are discovering every day with rising prices and the unemployment blight spreads upward into the homes of the educated and the managerial class. The Nixon Administration has tightened the ratchet and caught the country in a vise at a time when we desperately need expansion.

'Revenue Sharing' No Answer:

Reform Urged in State-Local Taxing and Spending Systems

STATE AND LOCAL governments should modernize their taxing and spending systems, rather than press for the kind of "no-strings-attached revenue sharing" proposed by the Nixon Administration, AFL-CIO Economist Arnold Cantor declared.

Actually, "the federal government has been sharing its revenues with the states and localities ever since the Articles of Confederation," Cantor said. He noted that in 1971 alone, some $30 billion will flow to state and local governments in categorical grant-in-aid systems under substantive legislation enacted by Congress that require programs to meet federal standards of performance.

The revenue sharing proposed by the Administration really doesn't add any help to the state and local governments, Cantor declared. "It's a change of delivery systems for federal aid," he added. He made the statements on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual radio.

The labor economist said that "the federal government should spend its money in accordance with needs established by Congress." He pointed out that there are 81,000 local taxing and spending units in the United States, and they are in no position to judge national needs.

Cantor agreed that state and local governments are trying to increase the efficiency and effectiveness of their own tax structures, "but they are really up against very overwhelming odds." Noting that "local government units grew up by historic or geographic accident," he said they are often "not responsive to needs."

HEAVY DEPENDENCE on "very unfair, regressive sales taxes" is a major flaw in state revenue-raising systems, he said, and often-abused property taxes "underpin 85 percent of city revenues." He said that although income taxes based on ability to pay would be more fair and efficient, they produce "only 15 percent of the total tax revenue raised by state and local governments."

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

AS INTERPRETATION of the trend of the economy has been taken away from the technicians in favor of political briefings on unemployment and the cost of living, the Nixon 1972 line has become increasingly clear:

The President's "game plan" is working; "prosperity is just around the corner;" critics are motivated by obvious political considerations.

Two recent press conferences by top Nixon officials make the point clear.

As the month of June ended Texas Democrat John B. Connally, Jr., who entered the Nixon Administration some months ago, was named the President's "chief economic spokesman."

Connally, in his first major briefing to the press, made it unmistakably clear that the President is going to put the best possible interpretation on every scrap of economic information that he can put his hands on. Connally insisted that "there is not any question" but that housing is "improving," that "industrial production is up," that there "has been a slowing in the rate of inflation," that there has been a "fiscal stimulus" to the economy and that unemployment is up chiefly because of "the winding down of the war."

A few days later Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson, at his own White House press conference on the unemployment figures for June, cited a seasonally adjusted drop in the unemployment rate from 6.2 percent to 5.6 percent as proof that unemployment is winding down as the Administration has been predicting.

HODGSON ADMITTED that the drop was only for one month and that it was largely due to failure of young people to look for jobs in as great a number as they normally do this time of year. Nevertheless, he insisted that the drop was "significant" and that the June figures were a "downward turning point."

Satisfactory as the June statistics may be from the Administration viewpoint, both the Connally and Hodgson press conferences brought out an extremely disturbing fact, the rate of unemployment which the Administration will consider satisfactory in the future.

Connally said that of course the Administration was not satisfied with the May jobless rate of 6.2 percent. But when he was questioned on what an acceptable rate would be, he described a 4 percent rate as a "myth" which had never been achieved in this country "save in wartime." He clearly indicated that a 4.5 percent rate was a more "realistic" rate.

Hodgson, in his press conference on the jobless figures, didn't want to get into a quarrel with Connally, but did concede that the Administration was thinking in terms of between 4.5 and 5 percent by next summer.

With a work force of some 80 million a 4.5 percent rate would mean 3.6 million unemployed, a 5 percent rate, 4 million. This is far from "full employment," even conceding the inevitability of a certain amount of frictional unemployment that cannot be avoided.

In addition, labor economists have noted that despite the "seasonaly adjusted" 5.6 percent rate of June, there were 5.5 million persons actually unemployed, about 1.1 million more than in May. They have further stressed that these figures do not take into account those who have part-time jobs when they would like to be working full-time or those who have given up job hunting in discouragement.

While the Administration is determined to see the economic picture in as rosy a fashion as possible, it is equally determined to cling to its economic theories which thus far have chiefly served to benefit the bankers and money-lenders.

Nixon has taken no steps to utilize the stand-by powers given him by Congress to regulate interest rates. Only recently a number of the country's major banks upped their prime rates from 5.5 percent to 6 percent without a word of protest, much less action, from the President.

MODERNIZED TAXING and spending systems would do more to ease the financial plight of local governments than Pres. Nixon's no-strings revenue-sharing plans, AFL-CIO Economist Arnold Cantor, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Alex Uhl, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

UNION SUPPORT OF DAY CARE legislation now pending will help determine what quality of day care services the nation's children get, according to speakers at an institute sponsored by AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services.

Higher Pay Floor Vital, Meany Tells TV Panel

An increase in the minimum wage to at least $2 an hour would increase purchasing power and help produce jobs throughout the economy, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a national television audience.

Appearing on the NBC program "Meet the Press," the federation president declared that there are millions of persons "who should be in the economy as consumers" but who cannot "play their part" because of low wages.

To a question of whether increasing the wage floor would result in the loss of jobs, Meany said the same argument has been used ever since the first minimum wage law was passed in 1938 and at every increase since and that "no one has ever been able to come up with any statistical proof that this ever happened."

The questioning by four reporters—Neil Gilbride, Associated Press; James J. Kilpatrick, Washington Star syndicate; Philip Shabecoff, New York Times; Irving R. Levine, NBC—ranged over a number of current problems and actions. In his answers Meany made these points:

- The AFL-CIO does not advocate across-the-board wage and price controls but "if I was in his (the President's) position, I would impose controls at this time," to control inflation. The current price situation is running contrary to all the economic rules reflecting in part an inflationary psychology.
- The Philadelphia Plan approach as applied by the Dept. of Labor to St. Louis is "completely stupid," and is a plan that "sounds good politically but under no circumstances is it going to solve the problem" of jobs for minorities in the construction industry.
- Despite Administration interpretations about the easing of unemployment, there were more people jobless in June than a month earlier and unemployment in 1971 is higher than in 1970.
- The President should roll back interest rates, do something about available credit and should not have vetoed the public works bill. Current policies are hurting small business and especially the housing industry.
- There is a very grave question involved in the export of American capital and American jobs and that if the trend continues the United States will turn into a service nation, "we are not going to be able to produce anything."
- "If we are going to compete with the rest of the world on the basis of who can pay the least wages . . . to use human misery as an ingredient in competition" we will live to forget the dynamic American economy.
- Trade union leaders have exerted a moderating effect on wage negotiations and that leadership "is based on something much sounder" than the size of negotiated increases.

Air Line Pilots Fill Four Key Staff Positions

The Air Line Pilots have announced four key appointments to the union's headquarters staff: Norman A. Weintraub as research director, Arthur T. Van Wart as director of employment agreements, James F. Gartland as director of governmental affairs, and C. V. Glines as executive editor of Air Line Pilot magazine.

Weintraub was formerly assistant research director of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and earlier was with the Allied Industrial Workers as assistant education and research director.

Van Wart will direct contract negotiations with 41 airlines employing 31,000 ALPA pilots and 22 carriers employing 12,000 ALPA stewards and stewardesses.

Gartland formerly was on the staff of Sen. Harold E. Hughes (D-Iowa) after 12 years as administrative assistant to former Sen. Thomas J. Dodd (D-Conn.).

Glines previously was executive editor of Air Cargo magazine. He also held editorial posts with the U.S. Air Force and the Dept. of Defense.

Day Care Bill Passage Tied To Union Drive

The quality of day care centers for the children of working mothers will be determined in large part on how strongly trade unionists support federal legislation creating such a program.

That was the consensus of a one-day institute in Washington, sponsored by the AFL-CIO's Dept of Community Services and attended by a number of representatives of international and local unions concerned with the day care program.

Community Services Director Leo Perlis described the institute as "the kick-off for deeper involvement of labor in child care."

AFL-CIO Legislative Representative Kenneth Young described the current legislative status of the Child Development Act and warned unionists that they must make their voices heard.

Unless trade unionists begin writing their congressmen describing their own day care needs and problems, Young said, there is a chance for passage of legislation that would benefit private business more than the nation's children.

Chain-type operations are planning to enter the "nursery-care business," he cautioned, adding that these generally have provided poor service.

Union representatives participating in the institute also heard descriptions of union-operated day care centers sponsored by the Clothing Workers and Teachers

Theodore Taylor, director of the Day Care & Child Development Council, Inc., said that unions had to get behind child care legislation, if it is to be passed.

The AFL-CIO has testified in support of the proposed Child Development Act aimed at establishing federal day care systems for children from birth to age 14.

Randolph Library Gets TWU Grant

New York—The Transport Workers have contributed $5,000 for the construction of the A. Philip Randolph Library & Research Center at Edward C. Waters College in Jacksonville, Fla.

The library will house the books, documents and papers of the AFL-CIO vice president along with other historical material which details the role of Negroes in the labor movement.

Pres. Frederick O'Neal of the Actors & Artistes and B. F. McLaurin of the Sleeping Car Porters are the coordinators of the Randolph library fund.

Administration Condemned:

Guild Hits Threats To Press Freedom

Boston—The Nixon Administration's attempt to suppress the Pentagon Papers was assailed by the top officers of the Newspaper Guild at the opening of its 38th annual convention here.

James B. Woods, the union's international chairman, told the 200 convention delegates that Guild members should "fight shoulder-to-shoulder with management and not toe-to-toe, as we usually do, against government assaults on press freedom."

"This issue of rights under the First Amendment must take on priority for us all," he declared. The Guild and management "have an equal stake in freedom of the press and an equal responsibility in its utilization," he said. "Let us make clear that the Guild must and will carry on the fight."

Guild Pres. Charles A. Perlik, Jr., reviewing recent Guild action against suppression of the Pentagon Papers and attempts to force the Columbia Broadcasting System to produce non-broadcast material for a Pentagon documentary, said that "at no time before in its history has the Guild been called upon so urgently to come to the aid of beleaguered elements of the media being buffeted by the forces of restraint."

An executive board resolution voices concern at continued government attempts to pressure the press in connection with the Pentagon papers and calls on "responsible officials at all levels of government to honor the First Amendment in deed as well as word."

Perlik, in his report to the convention, also urged the delegates to approve a joint recommendation of two special finance committees designed to end a growing general fund deficit and provide the ANG with additional funds for organizing and other purposes.

The recommendation would increase the general fund's allocation of per capita taxes from 60 to 70 percent as soon as the defense fund, which receives the other 40 percent, reaches $2 million.

The defense fund is expected to attain that figure by the fall, ending more than three and one-half years of assessments triggered by the prolonged Los Angeles Herald-Examiner strike. But Perlik recommended that regardless of whether the $2 million constitutional floor is reached, the per capita reapportionment should be made no later than next Jan. 1.

Perlik also urged affirmative action on ANG executive board proposals to translate the demands of special Guild conferences on minority hiring and human rights into bargaining achievements. He said the bargaining table is "the best place to deliver" the Guild's equal opportunity message.

"No other group can have a greater impact on breaking down traditional taboos and prejudices unless it be the employers themselves," he said, "and, sadly, too many of them don't seem interested or willing."

Also scheduled to go before the convention is an executive board proposal to change the union's name from the American Newspaper Guild to The Newspaper Guild to reflect the union's international composition. It has 4,000 Canadian members.

The convention will also nominate candidates for international office, with contests to be settled by a subsequent membership referendum.

Railroad Rules Dispute Rolling to Showdown

A contract dispute on major U.S. railroads headed for a showdown as the United Transportation Union scheduled selective strikes of its members on two railroads and management threatened retaliation if the strikes take place.

The retaliation would consist of firings, layoffs and downgradings of thousands of railroad workers who would be affected if major roads impose their own work rules. Spokesmen for two management groups—the National Railway Labor Conference and the Association of American Railroads—described their plan as a means of pressuring the UTU to give in on a long dispute over work rules.

The union, which represents more than 265,000 train and engine crew members, was preparing to strike the Union Pacific and the Southern railroads as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

The Chicago & North Western, originally included in the union's strike call, filed suit for a temporary restraining order preventing a walkout. Union lawyers are appealing.

The UTU has been free to call selective strikes in the work rules dispute since June 7, when the U.S. Supreme Court let stand a lower court decision that unions may call strikes against a few carriers, instead of being required to strike them all and thus creating a national emergency impelling Congress to act.

For more than a year the UTU has sought to negotiate new contracts with some 170 railroads without sacrificing the jobs and conditions of thousands of members who would be affected by drastic rules changes.

During the lengthy effort there was a one-day strike—by UTU and three other unions which later settled; court injunctions and a back-to-work law imposed by Congress; a recommendation from a presidential emergency board and an interim wage increase for the year 1970 which left the rules dispute and other wage changes to further bargaining.

The UTU was the only one of the four unions which struck for a day last Dec. 10 that was seriously affected by the proposed rules changes. It resisted changes demanded by the employers in exchange for wage increases.

UTU Pres. Charles Luna said the changes would wipe out most of the wage gains recommended by the emergency board and put into effect, in part, by Congress. The rules changes involve such things as the merger of seniority lists, interdivisional runs, road and yard jurisdiction, interchange operations and switching limits.

...any Hits Nixon 'Economic Disaster'

...ger, Sense of Urgency Mark AFL-CIO Focus on Loss of Jobs

Five AFL-CIO vice presidents sounded the five themes of the conference in opening day addresses—the need for immediate action on trade, reconversion to a peacetime economy, public works, public service employment and immediate aid for the unemployed.

Other federation vice presidents presided at panel discussions on these themes at which prominent congressmen and senators joined with delegates from virtually all affiliated unions to discuss the nuts and bolts of legislative action—and the grass roots support needed to push programs to enactment over White House vetoes and veto threats.

From floor microphones as well as from the podium, local and national union leaders spoke bitterly of plants closed as runaway employers moved operations to underdeveloped nations where labor can be exploited for pennies an hour.

Vice Pres. I. W. Abel ripped into the tariff and tax loopholes that have encouraged international runaways, profited multi-national companies—and created permanent, not just recession-caused, unemployment.

"Almost no part of the American work force has escaped the effects," the Steelworkers president said.

"We simply cannot continue to export American jobs and expertise and maintain our living standards under the rules of the game of international trade as they are played today. It's as simple and as frightening as that."

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Paul Jennings, who presided at the separate discussion panel on trade issues, stressed the importance of a united labor effort behind the legislation that is now in the final drafting stage.

The legislation is needed, Meany told the delegates, because nearly every other country has barriers against American imports, while the United States remains "the most open country in the world on trade."

Meany suggested that "a good approach on the question of trade is that any country that locks the door on us, we lock the door on them."

The strong feeling of the conference participants on the loss of jobs to low-wage areas of the world overflowed the three-hour discussion panel and was expressed repeatedly during the final general session at which AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland presided.

Delegates from small unions as well as larger unions spoke of the tragedy of plant closings on workers who are abruptly thrown out on the streets.

There was anger at the exploiters of low-wage workers, not at the foreign workers who are exploited for the profit of the employers. A delegate spoke from the floor to urge unions to step up their support of AFL-CIO assistance to the free trade union movement in Latin America and throughout the world—so that the basis of world trade will not be competition to pay the lowest wages and benefits.

An earlier generation of American workers knew what sweatshop conditions were like, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky reminded the delegates.

The Clothing Workers president, speaking with deep emotion, told the conference his union "cannot compete with 9 cents an hour" wage rates and doesn't intend to compete. "It took us years to overcome sweatshop conditions in this country, and we don't intend to allow the sweatshop to return on the back of low-wage imports."

There was sharp anger, too, at the Nixon Administration's apparent assumption that workers must be left to bear the brunt of defense layoffs as the Vietnam war winds down—and at the lack of planning for reconversion or shifting of national priorities to unmet needs at home.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Floyd E. Smith, the president of the Machinists, made it clear that the trade union movement firmly rejects the reasoning of "those who say the American economy needs war because it cannot provide enough jobs in time of peace."

Put America's "great engine of production" to work on the "neglected needs of our land and our people," he urged.

Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan, presiding at the panel discussion, said the Administration's lack of planning has "compounded and aggravated" the problems of reconversion.

And Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.), whose state has borne a heavy burden in defense and aerospace cutbacks, told the delegates:

"Unfortunately for the nation, Mr. Nixon learned his economics as Vice President during the 1950s when we had three recessions in eight years."

Pres. Nixon's veto of the public works bill was sharply denounced by Meany in his keynote address, by Vice Pres. S. Frank Raftery, and by House Public Works Committee Chairman John A. Blatnik (D-Minn.), author of the vetoed bill.

Raftery, president of the Painters, told the general session of the conference that Nixon's veto message "viciously" sought to make a "political scapegoat" of construction workers and repeats "the same tired and misguided arguments that helped bring this once-healthy economy into the stranglehold of recession."

Blatnik pledged that congressional efforts to enact a public works jobs bill are not ended despite the veto. He termed the vetoed bill "the most important single piece of legislation" that Congress had passed.

The companion measure for public service employment that has become law was hailed as a major step forward.

But speakers warned that labor and Congress must be alert to prevent the embryo program from being starved for lack of funds or twisted by its administrators into a distortion of congressional intent.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Jerry Wurf, president of the State, County & Municipal Employes, took note of reports that the Labor Dept. plans to reshape the legislation into a variant of its special revenue-sharing plan.

"We are going to fight" any such attempt, he told the delegates. Labor is determined "to assure that what we have won in the legislation is not stolen away in administrative regulations."

A panel group headed by Vice Pres. Matthew Guinan, president of the Transport Workers, recommended that an AFL-CIO inter-union committee be set up to oversee the program and make its views known in the preparation of Labor Dept. guidelines.

On the theme of immediate aid to the unemployed, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge stressed that millions of jobless "need more than speeches, resolutions and good intentions."

The president-emeritus of the Retail Clerks stressed the immediate need for food, clothing, shelter, medical care, improved unemployment compensation and a decent welfare program.

At the discussion panel chaired by Vice Pres. Peter Bommarito, president of the Rubber Workers, there was at least a strong hint of influential congressional support for labor's longstanding goal of federal minimum standards for unemployment compensation.

House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) acknowledged that the great majority of states have not been moved by repeated presidential urgings to raise their jobless benefit ceilings.

Indicating that he is ready to take a fresh look at the need for federal standards, Mills told the delegates that "this matter of adequacy of benefits is too important to be left to hope alone."

HOUSE SPEAKER Carl Albert, who described Pres. Nixon's veto of the accelerated public works bill as "inexplicable," confers with Federation Pres. George Meany.

States Miss Deadline On Jobless Benefits

the states had been made. And Meany noted that the AFL-CIO warned Nixon two years ago that "without federal mandatory standards, the states which had repeatedly refused to meet their responsibility, would fail again."

Meany told the President that "unfortunately, we were justified in our prediction."

He noted that in the past two years, only four jurisdictions—Arkansas, Hawaii, Utah and the Virgin Islands—have met the proposed standards.

Only five states—Colorado, Connecticut, Wisconsin, New Hampshire and Maryland—come anywhere close to the goal.

Specifically, the President's 1969 proposal urged the states to set a maximum benefit of two-thirds of the average wage in the state so that benefits of 50 percent of actual wages could be paid to at least 80 percent of the unemployed workers.

Meany read the text of his letter to participants in the AFL-CIO Conference on Jobs, noting that "I will await the reply with a great deal of interest."

With 5.5 million workers unemployed in June, Meany noted in his communication to the President that the average duration of joblessness had risen from 8.2 weeks in July 1969 to 12.7 weeks in June 1971.

"The increase in the number of long term unemployed—jobless 15 weeks or longer—has been dramatic," Meany said: "400,000 in July 1969, compared to 1.73 million last month.

"Your message, quite correctly, called unemployment insurance an economic stabilizer," Meany said. "It is obviously the first line of protection for the unemployed.

"But to serve both functions, it must be based upon an adequate benefit structure."

The federation president emphasized that 35 years of bitter experience prove that only federal standards will raise benefits to an adequate level.

"The dismal record of the states in the past two years in ignoring your call for improving benefits underscores this point," Meany said.

HEW Sets Up Institute on Job Safety

The Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare has established the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health that is provided by the job safety law Congress enacted last year. The law went into effect Apr. 28.

The new institute is headed by Dr. Marcus M. Key, director of the Bureau of Occupational Safety & Health since 1969. It is assigned under the Health Services & Mental Health Administration, HEW Sec. Elliot L. Richardson noted in making the announcement.

Although the institute has no physical facilities of its own, it is based at the HEW headquarters in Rockville, Md., and will make use of existing HEW laboratories and facilities in Cincinnati, Salt Lake City and Morgantown, W.Va., the department reported.

Under provisions of the job safety law, the institute will conduct research, experiments and demonstrations related to occupational safety and health. It will also work toward the development of on-the-job health standards, publish data on occupational illness and conduct inspections of plants and worksites.

Senate Majority Not Enough:

Public Works Killed As Veto Is Sustained

—extension of the Appalachian Regional Development Act and continuation of similar regional programs in other areas of the nation.

Both these measures are expected to be speeded to passage in a new bill—possibly with the inclusion of some variant of an accelerated public works program.

One freshman GOP senator who switched to buck the Administration on the veto—Lowell P. Weicker, Jr., of Connecticut—told the Senate that his state's 10 percent unemployment rate had convinced him that the legislation is necessary.

"I will not associate myself with any economic game plan that has as one of its ingredients a level of 10 percent unemployment," he declared.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany sharply assailed the veto in his concluding remarks to the AFL-CIO Conference on Jobs. The legislation, he said, could have provided 150,000 "badly needed jobs—immediately."

In other congressional developments:

- Congress passed and the President approved a compromise $5.15 billion aid to education appropriations bill that was given priority treatment in order to get federal funds to schools and colleges before the fall term starts.

It exceeded the President's budget request by $375 million, although it was substantially short of what education and union groups had urged. And it was the first year since Nixon took office that he did not veto an education funding bill.

- The House Rules Committee cleared a bill strengthening the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission by giving it enforcement powers similar to that of the National Labor Relations Board.

The bill, which is supported by the AFL-CIO and leading civil rights organizations, would also eliminate duplication of anti-discrimination jurisdiction by shifting functions of the Office of Federal Contract Compliance and the Justice Dept. to the EEOC. It would also expand coverage to some 23 million additional workers.

- The House killed a move to cite the CBS network for contempt because of its refusal to turn over unused film from a controversial television program on the Pentagon to the scrutiny of the House Commerce Committee.

Opponents of the contempt citation warned that it would tamper with freedom of the press and the contempt citation motion was sent back to committee for burial by a 226-181 vote.

Rollcall Vote on Effort To Overide Nixon Veto

A 57-36 majority of the Senate voted on July 14 to override Pres. Nixon's veto of the accelerated public works bill. But the attempt to override failed because it fell short of the required two-thirds majority.

Labor strongly supported the position of the senators who voted to override.

Here We Go Again

500,000 Strike Bell, Negotiations Continue

fused to move forward; it proposes to move backward," he said.

Beirne declared that his members are "sick and tired of subsidizing the telephone company . . . through low wages." Citing a number of inequities in pensions, wages, union security, health care, local issues and retroactivity, he added: "I know of no other major corporation that would have the gall to offer a wage increase of 9.5 cents an hour in this day and age."

The offer was Bell's proposal on starting rates for some traffic employes on the bottom step of the wage ladder, Beirne said.

The CWA president charged management with sex discrimination against women craft employes, who he said are paid about 62 percent of the rate paid to top male craftsmen.

The companies' pension proposals during 1971 negotiations would penalize workers who want to retire before age 65 after a long lifetime of service, the CWA leader charged. He said Bell recruits many workers at an early age—17 or 18.

Pension funds are paid for from revenues contributed by telephone users but "Bell management still is acting as though that is a private fund and it is gratuitously giving us a pension," Beirne commented. He outlined these other flaws in company proposals:

On union security, Bell has offered "nothing that even remotely resembles the mildest form of union security," ignoring the fact that the union is required by law to bargain for all employes in the bargaining unit represented by CWA.

On health care, Bell proposes to pay 80 percent of "usual, reasonable and customary costs," starting in 1972. CWA wants the company to pay 100 percent of the cost of being ill immediately.

On local items, there has been little or no activity on a vast backlog of unsettled local issues involving work practices.

On retroactivity, Bell has not proposed to make new benefits retroactive to contract expiration dates though it alone is responsible for the slow pace of negotiations.

CWA members across the nation voted in May and June by a 71 percent margin to authorize a strike. Contracts between CWA and the Bell companies started expiring Apr. 30, and were extended on a day-to-day basis until the July 14 strike.

IBEW represents plant, repair, installation, accounting employes and some telephone operators. CWA members work as switchboard operators, installers, clerks, linemen, cable splicers, repairmen, engineers, laboratory technicians, directory salesmen, equipment production workers, secretaries and in other capacities.

Picket L[illegible] Hold Solid[illegible] Copper Strik[illegible]

Helena, Mont.—Picket lines [illegible] unions representing 39,000 copper workers remain solid and morale is high, the unions reported as a strike against copper's Big Four and smaller independent companies entered its third week.

Little progress in negotiations was reported in talks called by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. In Washington, Mediation Service Director J. Curtis Counts recessed a meeting between unions and the Phelps Dodge Corp., one of the Big Four, pending a future call.

A strike of 26 unions which had coordinated their bargaining began July 1 after contracts expired without any satisfactory offers from Phelps Dodge and other industry leaders—Kennecott Copper Corp., Anaconda Mining Co. and the American Smelting & Refining Co.

The Steelworkers, biggest of the striking unions, reported that its 20,000 members in copper became eligible to apply for strike assistance at the close of the second week of the strike. USWA local unions are allocated $10 a week per dues-paying member for those in need.

All applications are screened by local strike assistance committees.

Contract negotiations began Apr. 22 in Butte, Mont., where a coordinated union committee presented proposals drafted by all the unions in February. The unions asked each company in turn for "very substantial" wage boosts, major improvements in pensions and insurance plans, and cost-of-living protection with no limit.

3-Year Pact Gives Screen Actors Bigger Cut of Movie-TV Revenues

Hollywood—The Screen Actors Guild approved and sent to membership referendum a precedent-setting new agreement that will give its 23,000 members a bigger share of the revenues of motion picture and television films.

On the eve of a strike deadline, negotiators agreed on a package of improved benefits, including wage increases ranging from 42.7 percent to 56.5 percent over a three-year contract term.

The offer is being submitted to members in a mail referendum here and abroad, Pres. Charlton Heston said, with the unanimous endorsement of the union's board.

Under it, for the first time, actors will share in pay formulas when feature pictures or TV programs are released for use on cassettes for home viewing.

Of equal importance, in SAG's opinion, is contract language providing a new method of computing payment for actors in "prime time" TV network reruns.

Instead of basing an actor's residual fees solely on a set of minimums, as is the present practice, the new agreement provides that fees for reruns will include 50 percent of new higher minimums as a base for continuing payments, plus a percentage of actual salary as the yardstick for payment in the future.

The new formula method "tailors residual payments" to the salary of the actor, instead of paying all actors at one rate. That "turns a corner" for screen actors, their union said.

All television productions dating back to 1952 are included in the new payment methods under the proposed settlement.

The new pact raises the ceiling on employer contributions to the SAG pension fund. Other improvements include a raise of 15 percent in wage minimums and foreign film residual payments, plus a strong preference-of-employment clause encouraging wider use of professional actors. The clause has heavy penalties for violations.

SAG Executive Sec. John L. Dales announced that a special membership meeting has been called for July 20 at the Hollywood Palladium. The contract proposal will be discussed with the understanding that its acceptance or rejection must await the secret ballot referendum vote.

Mail, Phone Workers Win Major Gains in Bargaining

Bell System Offer Sent To Members

By Eugene A. Kelly

The Communications Workers won a 33.5 percent package of benefits from the Bell Telephone System after six days on the picket line and sent the company's offer to a nationwide referendum of nearly 500,000 members.

The proposed settlement over a three-year term "does not provide everything we sought" but it is the biggest package the union has ever won from the Bell System, CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne said in announcing that members of 32 CWA bargaining committees recommended approval.

The Bell System, owned and managed by the giant American Telephone & Telegraph Co., made similar offers to the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and two unaffiliated unions in Connecticut and Pennsylvania. But disagreement over local issues was delaying settlement as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

The IBEW has 11,000 members on strike against the New Jersey Bell Telephone Co., and 6,500 at San Francisco. Contracts covering an additional 120,000 employes of the Western Electric Co.—a Bell affiliate—and Illinois Bell are due to expire by Aug. 17.

The IBEW said it will submit Bell System offers, when all details have been ironed out, to its Western Electric System Council and the telephone council for New Jersey Bell and Illinois Bell. That union represents employes in 16 plants, according to IBEW Pres. Charles H. Pillard.

CONTRACT AGREEMENTS covering more than 1 million workers bring settlements in the Bell Telephone System and the U.S. Postal Service. At left, CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne announces the phone agreement at a news conference. The new postal contract is signed by Pres. Francis S. Filbey of the American Postal Workers Union, while Letter Carriers Pres. James H. Postal Crafts Hammer Out $1,710 Hike

Collective bargaining passed its first big test in the new United States Postal Service as union and management negotiators emerged from a marathon bargaining session with a two-year contract.

The agreement, hammered into final shape during 36 hours of virtually non-stop negotiations, covers all seven postal crafts—more than 650,000 workers.

It boosts annual wages by $1,250 over the contract period—in five steps of $250 each.

It gives all workers with at least six months of service an immediate $300 bonus in addition to the rise in the pay scales, with proportionate amounts for those with less than six months on the job.

A cost of living clause will add up to $160 more to the contract package in the second year.

The pay package, including the anticipated cost-of-living addition, totals $1,710.

And postal workers are guaranteed job security under a provision which assures that there will be no layoffs during the duration of the contract—as a result of technological changes or for any other reason.

Assistant Sec. of Labor W. J. Usery, Jr., who kept the parties at the bargaining table until the deadlock was broken, said the historic first agreement came about because both sides sought to avoid the alternative of arbitration.

Magma Agreement Reached:

Copper Strikers Set Vote On Contract Breakthrough

Salt Lake City—A Steelworker-led coalition of unions on strike against eight big copper companies reached preliminary contract agreement with one firm and called 400 delegates to meet here July 24 to vote on the settlement and any others that may be achieved by that date.

The development was the first break in the strike of more than 35,000 copper workers who walked out July 1 when industry negotiators refused to match contract benefits won in the aluminum and can industries.

The first offer to settle came from the Magma Copper Co. in negotiations at Tucson with seven unions representing 3,000 of the strikers.

A similar proposal by the Anaconda Mining Co. was being studied by other members of the union coalition in Helena, Mont. If it is found acceptable it too will be voted on at the July 24 meeting of all the unions.

Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony of the Steelworkers, largest union in the coordinated bargaining team and chairman of the National Nonferrous Coordinating Committee, said Magma union negotiators will recommend acceptance of the company's offer.

Elsewhere on the USWA bargaining scene, Pres. I. W. Abel called the union's Basic Steel Industry Conference to a meeting in Washington July 30 to hear a report on the status of negotiations for new contracts with nine major steel firms.

Basic steel contracts expire Aug. 1. USWA local unions have been notified to poll their members on strike authorization, with the vote count to be completed by July 26.

Both actions—convening an industry conference and taking a strike authorization vote—are customary in steel union negotiations, the USWA said.

In another development, the Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. announced it will begin to close down its operations July 25. The firm's coke plants in Monessen, Pa., and Steubenville, O., will be closed first because the company has been unable to reach agreement with the union on a contract extension, a spokesman said. The firm has been meeting separately with the USWA.

Unemployment Soars Above 10% In Nation's Poorest Neighborhoods

By Tom Castor

Severe unemployment continued to plague the nation's beleaguered inner cities as the seasonally adjusted jobless rate in America's poorest neighborhoods jumped from 9 to 10.1 percent during the second quarter of the year.

The actual unemployment rate was only three-tenths of a point lower than the adjusted figure at 9.8 percent. The unadjusted figure had skyrocketed to 9.6 percent during the first quarter.

The 10.1 percent adjusted jobless rate for the poverty neighborhoods of the nation's 100 largest metropolitan areas was up from 7.1 percent a year ago and 5.7 percent in the second quarter of 1969. The jobless rate for the inner cities stood at 4.9 percent in the first quarter of 1969.

Unemployment for the nation as a whole averaged 6 percent during the April-June period.

The rate for the poor neighborhoods is now nearly twice the rate for other urban neighborhoods of the same metropolitan areas where joblessness averaged 5.8 percent during the same period.

The number of unemployed persons in the inner city ghettos rose both on an actual and seasonally adjusted basis with more than 600,000 persons out of work.

Employment declined from 5.8 million in the first quarter to 5.5 million, on an actual basis, with the BLS noting that 16 percent of those counted as working were employed only part-time.

The civilian labor force in the areas dropped by an unadjusted

First Rail Pact Cracks Roads' Solid Front

Chicago—The United Transportation Union won a tentative agreement from the Chicago & North Western Railway on a new 42-month contract that may point the way toward settlements with major railroads in the deadlocked work rules dispute.

The agreement covers wages, fringe benefits and work rules. It was reached after a U.S. District Court judge enjoined the UTU from calling a strike and got both sides to renew negotiations. Earlier the C & NW had withdrawn from the carriers' conference with a charge that the conference had

NLRB Opens Resort Hotels To Organizers

Resort hotels may not bar union organizers from access to employes who live in closed compounds guarded day and night by private police, the National Labor Relations Board ruled.

In the third of a series of decisions on charges brought by the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, a three-member NLRB panel headed by Chairman Edward B. Miller ordered New Pines, Inc., to permit union representatives to visit hotel employes during their free time at the South Fallsburgh, N.Y., resort hotel, and to stop questioning employes coercively about their union affiliation or activities.

A board trial examiner concluded last November that the hotel management did not violate the law when it refused to give union organizers access to its premises to "distribute literature and solicit membership among employes." The examiner ruled also that questioning of a busboy by the New Pines general manager was a minor matter, and recommended dismissal of all charges.

The NLRB reversed the examiner. It ruled that the union, despite numerous attempts starting in 1969 to handbill employes and talk to them off the premises, "had no effective method of communicating with the hotel's resident employes."

They wrote: "Lacking physical access to the premises, the union could not distribute literature or speak to these employes at their residence, nor could it approach them as they traveled" from their room to work stations in the hotel grounds.

The right of unions to free speech and reasonable access was spelled out by the Supreme Court in a 1967 case. The NLRB has applied it in two other hotel cases —Grossinger's, Inc., and Kutsher's Hotel.

COLORADO'S LABOR HISTORY goes further back than the founding of the Colorado Labor Advocate nearly 50 years ago. AFL-CIO's Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, who addressed the newspaper's anniversary dinner, meets Mike Livoda, a survivor of the 1914 "Ludlow Massacre" when an armed militia attacked striking miners and their families living in a tent camp. Livoda presented Kirkland with a copy of a history of the episode.

Labor Publications Held Major Asset of Unions

Denver—The nation's labor publications are among the trade union movement's "strongest assets" in building a better life for all Americans, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland declared.

Kirkland came to Denver to address the 50th anniversary dinner of the Colorado Labor Advocate—one of the oldest of more than 300 union publications that the labor movement relies on to communicate with its members and their families.

The newspaper was born during a successful campaign to elect a governor pledged to disband "the infamous Colorado Rangers, who had earned a reputation for brutality against strikers," Kirkland noted.

And, he stressed, in the 1972 campaign, the Colorado Labor Advocate has "the same vital role to play that it has played so many times before, and so has the rest of the labor press." He predicted that the outcome would see the "game planners" of the Nixon Administration "go the way of the Colorado Rangers."

Kirkland told the anniversary gathering that the labor movement needs "every one" of its publications, "and we need more of them." (Excerpts, Page 4.)

There is a need, he said, for international union publications to bring every worker in touch with the national scene "as it affects his work and his fellow workers."

The union member needs to know what's going on in his shop and local union, at city hall and in the state legislature as well as in Washington, Kirkland said, and "no one publication can give him everything he needs to know."

Because "the daily press falls down badly" in covering the 98 percent of labor news that does not involve major conflict, "we have to rely on our own newsmen and our own newspapers."

A special guest at the anniversary celebration was Frank Palmer, founder and first editor of the Advocate, who came from Michigan for the event.

Kirkland noted the tremendous changes and accomplishments since the newspaper's birth, but stressed that the word "satisfaction" is not in labor's dictionary.

He spoke of the nation's need for jobs, for health care, for improved education—and of the labor movement's commitment to these goals.

"Maybe," said Kirkland, "when the United States has created the healthiest, best educated and most creative and productive society humanly attainable—maybe then the labor movement will be satisfied."

But not until then, he emphasized.

Meany Urges Step-Up In NAB Jobs Program

The depressing impact of a sagging economy on job opportunities must be overcome by increased cooperation of organized labor and management in the JOBS project of the National Alliance of Businessmen, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

The training program should be expanded in both the job entry level and in the upgrading of workers' skills, Meany said in a message prepared for the NAB national conference.

Meany's statement was delivered by P.L. Siemiller, former president of the Machinists and now the NAB's vice president for labor relations.

Meany pledged the continuing cooperation of the trade union movement in the NAB efforts.

"There are thousands of people who need the type of help that the JOBS program can provide," he stressed. "With full employment and human dignity as our goals, let us get on with the job that must be done. It is a job we can do together."

Noting that the current "economic mess" makes the task of expanding job opportunities more difficult, Meany called on 600 NAB representatives attending the conference to redouble their efforts to aid the unemployed.

"But," he added, "we must be realists. No job training program is going to turn the economy around by itself. We need an expanding economy which creates new job opportunities in the private sector, coupled with an effective public service employment program."

Meany noted that the JOBS program takes a practical approach to the employment problem and that the federation is pleased to cooperate.

"The reasons are simple," he stressed. "We believe in training people for jobs that exist. And that is exactly what JOBS does."

While progress is being made because a number of employers are making more meaningful jobs available, Meany said others are not participating in the program on the excuse that their unions will not permit it.

"We don't like being used as an excuse," Meany said, stressing that if such rare situations exist they can be rectified.

"That is exactly why Roy Siemiller works full time with the NAB. And that is one reason why our Human Resources Development Institute is working with you."

Meany also urged the NAB to step up its efforts in finding jobs for returning veterans and pledged that the AFL-CIO will expand its own efforts through the HRDI jobs-for-veterans program.

Strike Suspended:

Phone Settlement Put to Members

The CWA called all its striking members back to work in the Bell System and Western Electric on July 21. Some local unions called the proposed settlement "not enough," but were advised to resume work and vote their feelings in the secret ballot referendum.

CWA members in 55,000 U.S. communities will receive in the mails a detailed description of the company offer, and a ballot which must be returned by Aug. 10.

Both CWA and IBEW members struck after rejecting "inadequate" company offers on wages, retroactivity, cost-of-living protection and pensions. CWA negotiators called off that union's strike and recommended acceptance of a new offer because they were "convinced the prolongation of the strike, or the beginning of another strike in August would not produce sufficient improvements to warrant the sacrifice called for," according to Beirne.

The contract includes a major advance in union security. It provides for maintenance of membership and requires that all future employes, after 30 days on the job, must either join the union or pay it an "agency shop" fee equal to union dues.

CWA said the contract will increase wages over the three years by an average of $36.48 a week—29.5 percent above present wages. An additional 4 percent will go for improvements in pensions, health insurance, supplementary medical insurance, vacations, holidays, work schedules, night-work differentials, union security and leaves of absence for union work.

Basic wage increases for workers at the top of their progression schedule will range from $16.50 to $29 a week the first year; from $5 a week to $7.50 the second year, and from $5.50 to $8 the third year.

In addition, Bell and Western Electric employes will be protected against rising costs by an "uncapped" escalator clause adding an expected total of $11.50 a week.

Total payroll costs per hour of work will increase over three years from the present cost—$4.63 to $6.18, the CWA estimated. The estimate does not include the living-cost factor.

CWA won for the first time a "big cities" allowance tailored to higher costs in more than two dozen major cities. The allowance will range from $5 to $9 a week. Applied to the new basic wage schedule, it will produce $38 a week the first year for Metropolitan New York employes, Beirne said.

He listed these other improvements:

- Progression schedules will be reduced by one year for all workers.
- The pension formula is improved from a flat 1 percent of the highest five-year average wages, times years of service, to 1 percent for each year before age 55 and 1.5 percent for each year of service after age 55.

Under the new formula, a member retiring at 65 with 30 years' service and $130 a week earnings would get a pension of $198 a month, an increase of 15 percent over the old formula.

- The optional retirement age for men will be identical with the present retirement age for women —age 50 with 25 years of service, or age 55 after 20 years of company service.
- Survivor benefits will be provided for a surviving spouse under the new pension provisions. All retiring employes may in future elect a survivor option before retirement.
- Maximum accidental death benefits will be raised from $30,000 to $50,000. Minimum pensions for retirees under age 65 will be raised from $85 to $100, and for those over 65 to a bracket ranging from $135 a month to $145.
- Beginning next Jan. 1, employes will be offered a dual choice of health insurance—stay with Blue Cross-Blue Shield or enroll in a group practice plan.
- Basic medical benefits will be changed from the present set-fee formula to 80 percent of a doctor's "usual, customary and reasonable charge."
- Premiums now paid for by retirees at $5.30 a month for Medicare Part B coverage will be paid by the Bell System.

The settlement also calls for no fewer than nine paid holidays for all workers; vacations of one week after six months, two weeks after a year, four weeks after 17 years.

A non-discrimination clause was included. Union leaves of absence with credit for service were increased from two years to four, plus an additional two years for union business without a service credit.

Full retroactivity to May 1 for first year wages is provided.

law enacted last year, which changed the mail service from a government agency to a semi-autonomous corporation, arbitration is required if a contract dispute remains unsettled after 180 days.

Postal workers are still considered federal employes to the extent that they are barred by law from striking.

The 180-day period was technically up at midnight on July 18. But with an agreement in sight, the negotiators "turned their backs" on the clock and on the calendar to continue their bargaining.

At 2:30 a.m. on July 19, Usery summoned Postmaster Gen. Winton M. Blount to the Washington hotel where the 'round-the-clock negotiations were held. By late afternoon the three union negotiators had a contract package to recommend to the full seven-craft bargaining coalition, known as CAPE—the Council of American Postal Employes.

Bernard Cushman, the veteran labor attorney, served as chief spokesman for CAPE during the six months of negotiations. With him in the long, tough windup of the bargaining were the presidents of the two largest postal unions—Francis S. Filbey, who heads the American Postal Workers Union which was born just weeks ago by the merger of the Postal Clerks and four smaller unions, and James H. Rademacher of the Letter Carriers.

Both parties agreed to further negotiations on a number of secondary issues that were not resolved. Talks will resume in mid-August and any items not resolved after 90 days will go to arbitration.

The final package was approved by the presidents of the seven craft groups—the Maintenance Employes, Mail Handlers, Special Delivery Messengers, Motor Vehicle Employes and Rural Letter Carriers, as well as the Postal Clerks and Letter Carriers.

No further ratification procedure is required, but joint union-management teams will visit major postal centers throughout the nation to explain the contract provisions and seek to establish a climate of good relations under the union contract.

In addition to the $300 bonus, which does not become part of the pay scale, postal workers will receive their first $250 raise retroactive to July 20. They will receive additional $250 increases in their annual pay scale on Oct. 20, 1971, Jan. 20, 1972, July 20, 1972 and Jan. 20, 1973. The cost-of-living increase, based on the rise in the index over a one-year period, will take effect July 20, 1972.

A tough stumbling block to agreement was the issue of disciplinary action and grievance procedure — specifically whether workers whom management seeks to suspend or fire should be kept on the payroll until the grievance procedure is exhausted.

The compromise provides a 30-day "stay of execution" for dismissals while the grievance is being processed and a 48-hour stay for suspensions except in cases where an employe being disciplined is unfit to work. No worker will be removed from the employment rolls until the grievance is finally decided and, of course, employes who were upheld will be entitled to pay for any period off the payroll.

The postal negotiations began in January, but not until late June did there appear to be any realistic hope of a negotiated settlement.

For months, postal management insisted that it would not make any money offer unless the unions first accepted a stringent "management rights" clause.

A neutral fact-finding committee —one of the mandatory steps required by the postal law in the event of a deadlock—issued a 20-page report listing the many issues in dispute, but made no recommendation for settlement.

CAPE, the union coalition, filed unfair labor practice charges accusing management of bad faith at the bargaining table.

Not until late June did management put its first money offer on the table—an offer that was to be raised five times during the course of negotiations.

Usery, the government's top trouble-shooter in labor-management negotiations, nudged the parties into intensive bargaining and during a continuous 24-hour session, "considerable progress" was reported but there were still too many unresolved issues to wrap up an agreement.

It took the final session of 36 hours, with only a 90-minute break to freshen up, to wrap up the contract.

At the signing ceremony, in the ornate reception room of the U.S. Postal Service, union and management negotiators joined in expressing the deepest satisfaction that collective bargaining had met its first and hardest test.

It was the first time that Congress did not have to act on pay legislation for postal workers and both Cushman and Blount said it would have been a poor start if the initial contract, covering the entire range of working conditions and union-management relations as well as pay rates, had to be written by outside arbitrators.

Both sides had high praise for Usery's role. And the former Machinists representative — who between railroad and postal negotiations had managed some seven hours of sleep in a four-day period —said the success of the negotiations gave him "one of the happiest days of my life."

Copper Unions Slate Vote on Magma Pact

In copper negotiations, the unions said the tentative Magma settlement would raise wages an average of 59.02 cents an hour this year, 15.49 cents additional next year and 17.49 cents more in the third year of a three-year contract—92 cents in all.

It would include an unlimited clause tied to the Consumer Price Index in the second year of the proposed pact, and other improvements in shift premiums, pensions, holidays and insurance coverage.

Magma workers will stay on strike until the terms are ratified, the unions said. They continued to meet with Anaconda and Kennecott Copper Corp., and asked for renewed negotiations with five other firms involved in the strike.

STRIKING MEMBERS of the United Transportation Union picket the Union Pacific Railroad freight yards at Las Vegas. The union called selective strikes against that road and the Southern Railway System when management negotiators sought to force rules changes affecting the jobs and wages of several thousand employes. Other railroads put the rules changes in effect in retaliation for the strike, the UTU said.

Philadelphia Plan Opposed in TV Poll

Los Angeles—Feelings run strong against extending the Philadelphia Plan's racial hiring quotas to all federal construction projects, the producers of the Advocates television program reported.

The results of a national mail poll of TV viewers showed that 78 percent opposed extension of the plan; 19 percent were in favor.

An additional poll of 18,000 persons on a special subscriber list in the Los Angeles area showed that 58 percent were against the plan and 38 percent were for it.

The question of whether the Philadelphia Plan should be extended was proposed on the Advocates program late in June over the Public Broadcast Service network.

Suit Protests State Dept. Bid To Shift Jobs

The Government Employes have filed suit to stop the State Dept. and the U.S. Information Agency from establishing a Foreign Service Specialists Corps which would strip about 6,000 federal employes of Civil Service protections.

Congress rejected a similar project in 1966.

The suit, filed in U.S. District Court at Washington, D.C., asks an immediate halt to the move which would impose the State Dept.'s vicious "selection out" system by which employes are fired if they fail to reach a certain grade within a specified time limit.

In effect, the proposed move would put the employes under State Dept. foreign service regulations which are strictly an "in-house operation," the AFGE charged.

The government workers would lose their rights under the Veterans' Preference Act in addition to Civil Service protections. Both of these laws assure them appeal rights outside their own agencies.

The suit charges that the State Dept. and USIA's action gives employes the questionable alternative of voluntarily chosing to join the Foreign Service Specialist Corps or remaining in dead-end jobs, which the two agencies bluntly warned will be lacking in promotion opportunities and which, AFGE charges, would see them eventually "phased out of their government jobs."

First Railroad Reaches Agreement With UTU

failed to make positive moves toward settlement.

Under the new pact, UTU members will get 17.5 percent in pay increases retroactive to Jan. 1, 1970; 5 percent more, effective Oct. 1, 1971, Apr. 1, 1972, and Oct. 1, 1972. Another 5 percent in raises will be split into two increases, effective Jan. 1, and Apr. 1, 1973. Some rules changes also were agreed to, the negotiators told a press conference in Chicago.

The UTU has been on strike since July 16 against two major railroads and served notice the strike will spread to eight other carriers this month unless management cancels unilateral work rules changes and begins bargaining in good faith.

With little progress reported in negotiations under federal auspices in Washington, the union gave notice that it intends to withdraw its members from service July 23 on the Southern Pacific and the Norfolk & Western and July 30 on six other roads. The object is to expedite agreement on the work rules dispute, UTU Pres. Charles Luna stressed.

The roads in the latest notice are the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe, the Alton & Southern Railway, and four industrial or "belt line" carriers.

The UTU has been trying for more than a year to get new contract terms from the carriers. When negotiations came to an impasse over wages and management demands for changes in working rules, the UTU and three other unions struck several national carriers and were ordered back to work by Congress in special legislation—the fifth such intervention in railroad negotiations since 1963.

The other unions reached agreement with the employers on contracts containing minor rules changes. UTU then announced it would strike a few roads selectively but would avoid a national shutdown.

When the carriers appealed to the courts to restrain selective strikes, UTU won the right to call such strikes. An appeals court ruling to that effect was left undisturbed by the Supreme Court. When the union struck the Union Pacific and the Southern railways July 16, management of all other roads began putting their own work rules into effect.

Thousands of employes lost their jobs with no severance pay to cushion the loss. Thousands more were transferred to jobs hundreds of miles from home without payment of expense money.

Rules on pay rates, promotions, seniority, job assignments, vacations and other benefits won in past contract negotiations were scrapped forthwith. The carriers claim the right to make such changes under the Railway Labor Act.

When Luna said the union will press for lost pay for all the affected employes and a no-recrimination clause in contracts, the carriers' chief negotiator halted negotiations to have his staff prepare an angry press release denouncing the make-whole remedy.

Luna called it a "classic example of recent railroad tactics to drive all issues to Congress" and thus buttress a claim that the selective strikes are causing a national emergency.

The Wall Street Journal reported in a news roundup that the Santa Fe road admitted laying off "about 1,000 workers;" the Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul and Pacific Railroad trimmed its force by about 400; the Illinois Central failed to call in an unspecified number of workers, and the Norfolk & Western "isn't using some 300 to 375 firemen.

AMA Termed Constant Foe Of Health Bills

The American Medical Association has consistently opposed every program designed to improve medical care or make health care available to more people, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) stated at a hearing of his Senate health subcommittee.

Kennedy noted that the AMA, which now vehemently opposes the labor-backed National Health Security program, previously opposed social security, non-profit group health insurance, Medicare, group practice and even more training funds for new doctors.

As a result, Kennedy said, "the organization of health services is still a shambles. The AMA and its friends in political life and in the health insurance industry have stood in the way of every step towards an efficient, effective, affordable health care system for the American people."

He said that the AMA has put "the lives and well-being of American citizens below its own special interests in ordering its priorities. It deserves to be ignored, rejected and forgotten."

The Labor Press

THERE ARE A LOT of gloomy remarks to the effect that the labor press is losing its impact; that it can't stand the competition of the television set and the commercial press and mass of printed paper that comes to everybody's mailbox.

In recent years we have heard a lot, too—though we don't seem to hear it any more—about how the labor movement itself is losing its steam, and how union members are getting lazy and self satisfied and timid, and how they care more about hanging onto what they have, than about winning more and winning it for others. Well, that is nonsense.

In the America of 1971, the labor movement stands almost alone as the only major force still working to upgrade the quality of life for all the American people.

Building this movement of ours and strengthening it in every way we can is the most important task before us; not only as workers, but as citizens, and as upholders of the idea of a free, just and liberal democratic society.

We are not a majority. Union members are a minority of the population and a minority of the work force. It is our unity that makes the difference. And one of our strongest assets in building that unity is the effective communications instrument we have created in the labor press.

It isn't as effective as it should be. American workers in AFL-CIO unions are served by 55 weekly publications, 30 biweeklies, two triweeklies, 210 monthlies, 30 quarterlies and an uncountable number of small, irregular publications. All of them are served by the AFL-CIO News Service, as well as by their own professional and volunteer staffs.

EVERY TRADE UNIONIST needs to know all of the things that are going on that affect him—the negotiations and grievances in his own shop and in the shop down the street. What's happening in city hall and the capitol building. What's happening in Washington. What's happening to prices, to wages, to fringe benefits, to jobs. Every union member needs to know what's going on, where help is needed, what has to be done. No one publication can give him all the things he needs to know.

Certainly, the daily press falls down badly. Unions scarcely exist, where they are concerned, unless there happens to be a strike, or unless some politician raises an outcry about the "terrible power of the unions."

I often think the daily press and other media are missing the greatest success story in history by the blind, clumsy, ill-proportioned coverage they give our movement.

Every year about 100,000 union contracts are negotiated. About 98 percent of those negotiations take place without conflict, without the loss of an hour's working time, and they are almost entirely ignored.

Conflict is what catches the eye of the media, and they tell a story of conflict. They tell about the 2 percent. So we have to rely on the labor press to put things in proportion.

We have to rely on our own newsmen and our own newspapers to report what progress our unions are making in civil rights, consumer affairs, community affairs and a thousand other things.

A Word Edgewise:

Proliferation of New Nations Brings Woes to Philatelists

By John P. Roche

THIRTY-FIVE YEARS AGO if you set out to become a stamp collector, you went to a department store and bought a Scott worldwide album and then settled down to fill the blanks. From a philatelic viewpoint, the world was manageable and only a few nations flooded the market with new issues. The United States, for example, issued 31 commemorative stamps in the decade 1920-30; Britain only 9.

In the 1930s things began to speed up: Postmaster General Jim Farley, in combination with a stamp-collecting President (Roosevelt), put the U.S. Post Office on the commemorative map with some of the most attractive stamps we have ever issued: the National Parks series of 1934. But you could still manage with one substantial album.

I put away my general collection when Gen. Lewis B. Hershey sent for me, and after the war specialized in British 19th Century colonials. It therefore came as a shock to learn that if today a 10-year-old wants to start as I did around 1930, his first acquisition is a set of albums that virtually fill a shelf.

Naturally I have been aware of the emergence of new nations, but completely unaware of the extent to which many of them must have postage stamps as their leading export. There are, for instance, a bunch of little oil states along the Persian Gulf that seem to send out a new stamp with every tanker. One wonders if they are ever used for postal purposes. Indeed, there is a rumor that one of these trucial states, as they are called, does not even have a post office.

Under these circumstances, collecting the world, which we used to do as kids, is obviously preposterous. You would need two full-time assistants just to mount new issues, and a third out buying new albums. So, sensibly enough, stamp collectors have gone "topical," that is, they specialize in certain kinds of stamps that have a common subject: fish, butterflies, flags, stamps-on-stamps, works of art, etc.

However, this too could be a losing cause; the prolific stamp-issuing countries obviously have their spies out. If people want animals on stamps, they will oblige; if they want religious art, that's fine too. You name it, and Cyprus, Anguilla, Fiji, the New Hebrides, and dozens of others will start the presses.

In fact, these ruminations were triggered by a list of new offerings that a dealer sent me. It is absolutely fascinating.

Suppose you are interested in marine fauna. You send 97 cents to the dealer and receive stamps of the "Robber Crab," the "Spotted Pebble Crab," and the "Galati" (whatever that is) from the British Indian Ocean Territories (wherever they are). The Cypriots have a gorgeous "Virgin Mary and Child with Archangels," with which you can mount "The Adoration of the Shepherds" (Anguilla), the "Apparition of Angels to Shepherds" (Britain), the "Nativity" by Durer (Antigua), the "Madonna of the Goldfinch" (Grenada), and, if you have a secular streak, "Marley's Ghost" (Dominica).

THIS LIST may be unrepresentative because it reflects last year's Christmas output, but there are other delicacies in store for the specialized collector.

For years people have collected trains on stamps and they are still represented (Jamaica's 125th railroad anniversary), but what about antique cars? It is cheering to report that the Republic of the Maldives has come through with imagination: a series of eight stamps portrarys early automobiles, the Columbia, 1899, the Duryea, 1902, running up to the two-rupee value, the Autocar, 1907. This could be a great coup on the part of the Maldives.

The roster could go on indefinitely: Bhutan, for example, has a two-horse parlay: a series of animals and one on the conquest of space, which begins with an illustration from Jules Verne's "From the Earth to the Moon." But it is too depressing. The only sensible thing to do is throw the list away and go back to British 19th Century colonials, a category that has not been enlarged in the slightest for 71 years, and you never have to buy a new album.

'Power For Good':

Labor Political Role Designed To Foster Key Social Gains

The following is excerpted from the Eternal Light program "A Conversation with George Meany" presented by NBC radio network under the auspices of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America. The interview was conducted by Herbert Kaplow, NBC News White House correspondent.

KAPLOW: Mr. Meany, you have been involved in trade union leadership for something like 50 years. How have you seen the missions and goals of trade unionism in this country develop over this period?

MEANY: Well, of course, I've seen a great deal of progress in the trade union movement. I've seen tremendous upward progress in the standard of life of the American people in that time. I think that it's reasonable to say that the worker in America gets a better share of the wealth that he helps to produce than he got when I started. I'm quite sure of that.

KAPLOW: Back in those days there was talk of shorter weeks, there was talk of a higher minimum wage, there were child labor problems. Now we don't have those problems, certainly to the degree that they were present then.

MEANY: Well, we don't have the child labor problem anything like it was back in those days. I suppose it may be a problem in spots here or there. Of course, we've had a minimum wage law on the books since 1938, and this still is a problem from two angles.

One, the present minimum wage is not sufficient; it's not sufficient by official government estimates to keep people together; that's why we have thousands of people in this country that work full time and still have to depend on federal or local charity of some kind to keep going. So from that point of view the minimum wage law is not adequate. And then there are still some people, workers, who are excluded from the minimum wage law. So from those two points of view there is some improvement needed there.

But more and more labor's activities over the years have been directed toward things that are of a general nature and affect all people rather than those that affect specifically the workers alone.

KAPLOW: Is that because you achieved many of the goals that were directed specifically toward what were then considered the exploited workers?

MEANY: Well, partly, but also because the trade union movement leadership many years ago realized that if we were to have decent wages and good working conditions we have to have an economy that could sustain decent wages and good working conditions. And we came to the conclusion—when I say "we" I mean people that preceded me—came to the conclusion that labor had an interest in the welfare of all the people; that you couldn't do something that would enhance the welfare of the people without enhancing the welfare of the trade union movement.

So, despite the fact that the trade union movement represents a minority of the working population and always did and of course does even to this day, we were never discouraged by that because we felt that even if we were in a minority, as an organized minority we could make an impact on government, on state legislatures, on the Congress. And the record proves, of course, that this is so.

When I was a young fellow at this business all we thought of was wages and working conditions on the job. In other words, all of our problems were self-centered. We were thinking of ourselves and our membership. But many years ago we came to the conclusion that what is good for the great mass of the people must be good for us. And we followed that right along. This is not altruistic in a sense; it's practical. I would say it's sort of an intelligent selfishness, let's put it that way if you want.

KAPLOW: There are some people in the country who feel that the labor unions have a disproportionate power in this country.

MEANY: Well, I'm not really concerned with that charge—I've heard it—because I don't get excited over power if it's constructive. Now, of course, there's always a sort of connotation about the word "power" to feel it's power to destroy, power to control other people's lives, et cetera. If the trade unions have power, I contend—and this can be documented going way back—that it's power for good. If we're trying to get a better share for a worker of the wealth he helped produce, we're trying to get better care for his children, better education. This is what we use our power for.

Yes, we have influence. We have a political machine that is set up to try to elect to Congress people who are favorable to the ideas that we espouse, but at the same time you'll find out that we have our defeats, that we certainly are not all-powerful.

But I am not concerned about the charge of having too much power. It doesn't concern me at all, because if we have too much power, I say you cannot have too much power if the power is for the good, if it's being used for good.

Without Wage Cut:

Focus of Bargaining Remains On Shorter Working Hours

DESPITE GROWING INTEREST in the four-day workweek, the thrust of most union contract bargaining will continue to center on shorter workdays without reduction of take-home pay, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald declared.

Oswald said that a recently completed detailed study shows that only about 8,000 U.S. workers are now on four-day weeks, but that major gains have been made in shortening workweek hours, with some 10 million workers now on standard weeks of less than 40 hours. He added that "more and more unions are negotiating a reduction of hours," not only by shorter workdays, but also through "longer vacations, additional holidays and earlier retirement."

Oswald appeared on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, broacast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Oswald agreed that the four-day week concept that includes 10-hour days does pose scheduling problems, particularly in factories and other establishments that operate in shifts around the clock. But, he said, "some unions have negotiated a four-day, eight-hour provision," citing a recent Printing Pressmen's contract in Canada.

He said that the increasing productivity of workers should make substantial "reduction of hours of work" without reduction of pay a real possibility in the next decade. If the expected productivity gains of the next 10 years were applied to shorter hours, "a 29-hour workweek . . . maintaining the same real take-home pay" would be possible by 1980, Oswald observed.

Turning to other bargaining trends, Oswald noted that while workers covered by union contracts have won longer paid vacation periods in the last 20 years, "a large number of non-union workers still do not get paid vacations." He added that "in the United States, paid vacations exist only through union contracts—as a right—or through the employers' largesse, in non-union situations."

ON PENSIONS, Oswald said that Congress should "beef up the social security program, rather than leave the full burden on collective bargaining in the private sector." He pointed out that the "growth of private pension plans has largely been the result of the failure of social security to meet the needs of retirees," and that such problems as vesting, portability, funding and re-insurance might be best handled by the federal government.

Reporters questioning Oswald on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine and Donald Finley of United Press International.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

ON AUG. 17, 1936, Wisconsin paid the first unemployment benefit check ever issued in this country from a state unemployment fund.

The check, in the amount of $15, was paid to Neils B. Rund. It covered one week of total unemployment.

Today an unemployed worker in Wisconsin could receive as much as $84 for one week unemployment. He could do even better than that if he lived in Connecticut where he could receive up to $123, or Massachusetts as much as $104, or Rhode Island, $95.

If the unemployed worker resided in Mississippi the best he could do would be $40 a week. However, after next January this will rise to $49. In at least half a dozen other states he would not be able to get more than $50 a week.

Minimum weekly unemployment benefits vary as much as $3 in Missouri to $25 in California.

Here, too, we see widespread disparity.

Two years ago Pres. Nixon urged the states to set the maximum benefits at two-thirds of the average wage in a state. Currently, as AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany pointed out in a letter to Nixon, only four states have reached this goal.

Benefits is only one area of jobless compensation that differs so greatly from state to state.

In Utah you can receive your benefits for as long as 36 weeks or 34 weeks in Wisconsin or the District of Columbia. Puerto Rico permits payments for only 20 weeks, however.

The number of ways in which states determine whether an unemployed worker is eligible for jobless pay almost defy imagination.

In Michigan you must have worked 14 weeks at $25.01 per week or more. In Indiana you must have earned $500 over the last year with $300 in the last two quarters. In Idaho you must have earned during the year one and one-fourth times what you earned in your best three-month period but not less than $520.01 over the year.

Nevada has a simple qualification: you must have earned money 33 weeks out of the last year with no minimum required. On the other hand, West Virginia demands that you earn a minimum of $700 during the year but with no requirement for having worked a certain number of weeks.

Three states—Alabama, Alaska and New Jersey—require employes to pay state unemployment taxes. No other state does. The maximum employer contribution varies from 6 percent of wages in Michigan to 2.7 percent in a large number of states.

All this illustrates the crazy-quilt pattern of the so-called federal-state unemployment compensation system. Many more illustrations of extremes, state by state, could be drawn.

THE FEDERAL-STATE program is peculiarly unique to the United States. To secure passage of unemployment compensation in 1935 it was necessary to bow to the philosophy of "states rights."

Actually though, except for Wisconsin and Ohio, the states were making little progress in passing jobless benefit laws in the 1930s. In 1933, for example, 83 bills were introduced in 23 states and none enacted. Supporters realized that federal legislation was essential but with proper deference to the states. Many states were actually waiting for the federal government to act and pick up a large part of the cost.

We've learned a great deal since 1935. No one thinks that a federal system would be unconstitutional. Also, there is a fuller recognition that unemployment is not a local or a state problem and its causes are not contained inside state borders.

The basic inequities, state by state, written into the unemployment compensation program, can be largely wiped out by simply adopting federal standards, a floor for at least benefits and duration but, perhaps, in every category.

In that way an unemployed worker who lives in Mississippi need not be penalized and states in New England could pay high benefits if they desired.

SHORTER HOURS without reduction of take-home pay remains the major thrust of union bargaining, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald, center, declared on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Donald Finley, left, of United Press International and Frank Swoboda of Business Week Magazine. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

VACATIONING COLLEGE STUDENTS handle cargo on the Duluth, Minn., waterfront as a part of a summer jobs program initiated by Local 1366 of the Longshoremen. The program provides jobs for about 50 students a day during peak periods of activity on the Duluth docks. Union membership requirements have been waived for the students.

Sea Unions Call for Full Funding To Keep Public Health Hospitals

The AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. and the Seafarers urged a $30 million increase in the Fiscal 1972 budget for the U.S. Public Health Service to keep open the eight remaining PHS hospitals and 26 out-patient clinics.

MTD Administrator O. William Moody told a Senate subcommittee that a budget of $101 million would be necessary if the PHS hositals are to operate at full efficiency. He noted that this figure represents an increase of $10 million over the Fiscal 1971 budget "based solely on the inflation in hospital costs since the 1971 budget was proposed."

He also asked the Senate panel "to recognize the great potential in the Public Health Service for new and innovative types of medical services by appropriating funds for the renovation and modernization of the eight PHS hospitals."

The hospitals are situated in Baltimore, Boston, Galveston, Tex., Norfolk, Va., New Orleans, New York, San Francisco and Seattle. They provide medical services for American merchant seamen, members of the Coast Guard, other federal employes and sometimes act as emergency facilities for surrounding communities.

The Administration has been seeking to close the facilities, but the Senate recently passed a resolution urging that they be kept open.

Moody warned that there is no guarantee that cities would be able to maintain the hospitals if federal support were cut off. The proposed budget would also cut the PHS medical corps from 6,200 to 970.

In addition, he said, the reduced budget would mean the termination of medical manpower training programs that turn out thousands of new medical personnel annually.

"This will be the cost in terms of human values of converting to a program where all medical care for PHS beneficiaries is provided by private contract hospitals," Moody said.

He said such a plan would actually cost more. Instead of the present $70-a-day cost of treating a U.S. seaman including all doctor costs, it would cost $100 or more, which would pay only for basic hospital services—not additional doctors' fees.

Moody said that while $90 million had been considered sufficient to operate the PHS, $71 million would be needed for medical care, alone, "without any of the ancillary benefits that the U.S. Public Health Service provides."

"The proposed savings in this budget are illusory at best," he said, "as they represent a shift of funds that will cut the budget in one area, but increase its commitments in another."

Debate Opens on Loans For Faltering Firms

Congress moved towards action on legislation authorizing emergency government loans to Lockheed Aircraft Corp. and other major employers caught in a financial bind that might force them to shut down and dump tens of thousands of workers on the unemployment rolls.

The bill passed its first big test in the Senate, with the 56-36 defeat of a motion by Sen. William Proxmire to send it back to committee for further hearings.

As the Senate debate opened, the House Banking Committee voted approval of an identical measure—also choosing broader legislation in preference to limiting assistance to Lockheed alone.

Initially, the Administration proposed only a $250 million loan guarantee to Lockheed, which needs the money to go ahead with production of its TriStar "airbus." Banks which have already extended substantial credit to the company have said they will put up the additional funds needed only if there is a guarantee of repayment.

The Senate Banking Committee, however, broadened the bill to authorize similar guarantees up to a total of $2 billion to any major enterprise whose failure would seriously damage the national economy.

The House Banking Committee then decided to follow the same legislative path.

Before the House committee acted, Machinists Pres. Floyd E. Smith testified that abandonment of the TriStar would mean the difference between jobs and unemployment for 32,000 workers directly—employes of Lockheed and its contractors and suppliers—and thousands of additional jobs as a chain reaction to the unemployment.

Most of the jobs that would be lost, Smith noted, are in areas already suffering "serious and substantial" unemployment.

The House committee was closely divided on whether to support the original bill limited to Lockheed or the broader measure. But once the decision was made, the legislation was cleared by a 23-11 vote.

Deck Officers Elect Secretary-Treasurer

New York—Election of Capt. Robert J. Lowen as secretary-treasurer of the Masters, Mates and Pilots was announced by the union. He succeeds Capt. Charles M. Crooks, who died in January.

The appointment was by unanimous vote of the union executive board, Pres. Thomas F. O'Callaghan said. The union agreed in March to become the Marine Division of the Longshoremen.

Capt. Lowen has been a union member since 1952, when he was graduated with honors from the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy at Kings Point, N.Y. He became a master in 1958 after World War II service as a Navy quartermaster.

'Amalgamation' Pressed:

Guild Delegates Vote Higher Wage Goals

Boston—Delegates to the Newspaper Guild's 38th annual convention voted to boost their union's wage goals and directed the officers to continue to explore the possibility of "amalgamation" with other unions in the publishing and broadcasting industries.

The collective bargaining report adopted by the convention also urged Guild locals to look into "the advantages of joint bargaining."

Delegates approved a new wage goal of $450 a week for experienced editorial, advertising and circulation employes—up $25 from the previous bargaining target.

A convention resolution called for the resignation or dismissal of Attorney Gen. John N. Mitchell, who was accused of attempting to undermine freedom of the press through his effort to block publication of the "Pentagon Papers."

Mitchell was also hit for the Justice Dept.'s "vindictive" efforts to indict the New York Times reporter who obtained the Pentagon's classified Vietnam report.

In other actions, the convention:

- Adopted a wide-ranging program to advance recruitment and training of minority-group employes and to assure equal rights for women on newspaper staffs.
- Agreed to put a larger share of the union's income into its general fund for organizing and servicing, after its strike-assistance defense fund reaches the $2 million mark. At that time, the general fund's share of per capita payments will rise from 60 to 70 percent. The current special strike assessment will also cease when the $2 million figure is reached.
- Voted to rename the union The Newspaper Guild, dropping the word "American" in acknowledgement of its substantial Canadian membership.
- Called for an end to U.S. military involvement in Southeast Asia contingent on the release of U.S. prisoners of war.
- Urged recycling of newsprint to conserve forest resources.
- Endorsed establishment of press councils and review boards with Guild representation in the United States and Canada.

Delegates rejected proposals to establish full-time posts of women's rights and minority hiring coordinators, but directed the union's executive board to designate members to oversee both of these programs.

Also rejected were resolutions to allow paid local officers to serve on the Guild's international executive board, to hold conventions every two years instead of annually, and to establish regionally-assigned international representatives.

Nominations made at the convention assured a rematch of the contest for top officers that was held two years ago.

Charles A. Perlik, Jr., incumbent president, will again be opposed by Brian L. Flores, administrative officer of the Washington-Baltimore local. And Sec.-Treas. Robert M. Crocker will be opposed by John (Ned) Sweet of San Antonio, who will again be the running mate of Flores.

The mail referendum election will be held Sept. 23-28.

AFTRA Scores Move To Curb News Media

Dallas—A congressional committee's attempt to probe the editing of a news program was sharply challenged by delegates to the 34th annual convention of the Television & Radio Artists.

The convention denounced efforts by the House Commerce Committee to cite the Columbia Broadcasting System for its refusal to surrender unused material gathered for a controversial documentary program on the Pentagon.

The House has since rejected a motion to cite the head of the network for contempt.

That action would have had a "chilling impact" on the news media, delegates stressed in a convention resolution. It would have intimidated reporters, newsmen, commentators and analysts in their "rights and obligations under the First Amendment . . to investigate, research, analyze and report the news."

"Broadcasters are entitled to report the news to the American people with as much freedom from censorship or coercion, whether by congressional committee action, citations for contempt, or otherwise, as newspapers and magazines," AFTRA declared.

Delegates also pledged strong support for members who had been striking at the Westinghouse radio station KFWB in Los Angeles. Agreement was reached July 16 after a two-month strike.

In other resolutions, the convention established guidelines for negotiations on video cassettes, slide films, pensions and fringe benefits.

Re-elected to new one-year terms were AFTRA Pres. Bill Baldwin and Vice Presidents Kenneth Harvey, New York; Joe Slattery, Chicago; John F. Henning, Boston; Arthur Metzler, Louisville; Elizabeth Morgan, New York, and Rubin Weiss, Detroit.

Three new vice presidents were elected: Bill Cole, Los Angeles; George Herman, Washington-Baltimore, and Bill Hillman, San Francisco.

Mel Brandt, former AFTRA president, was elected treasurer to succeed Jack Costello. Parley Baer was elected recording secretary to replace the late Roy Glenn.

Ed Sullivan was selected for the union's George Heller Memorial Gold Card Award, which is presented annually to a person who has made a most "significant contribution to AFTRA and its members."

Sullivan, who was out of the country, sent recorded greetings to the delegates. He will receive the award upon his return.

CREDIT UNION AUDIT

A complete verification of accounts of all members of the AFL-CIO Employes Federal Credit Union was made as of June 30, 1971. Members who do not receive statements by July 30, 1971 are asked to notify the Chairman, Supervisory Committee, Room 706, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Despite Recent Progress:

Black Workers Still Trail In Both Jobs and Earnings

Negroes and other minorities have made some progress in eliminating racial differentials in income and employment during the 1960s, but the gaps remain and are likely to persist for some time, according to an expert on minority employment.

Dr. Ray Marshall, a University of Texas economics professor, notes also that the rate of progress for minorities in the employment picture has been uneven.

His observations appear in an article in the July issue of the Federationist, the AFL-CIO monthly magazine. Dr. Marshall is the author of several books and numerous studies on minority group employment patterns.

Marshall notes that minorities have been far more successful in penetrating the blue-collar job market than they have been in getting into clerical, technical managerial and professional jobs. But even here, he said, the rate of penetration has been uneven.

"In general," he writes, "blacks have had the greatest difficulty penetrating those jobs which have the greatest skill and educational requirements.

"Because of this unevenness in progress and because of the persistence of the overall gap between whites and minorities in terms of income and employment, civil rights forces can be expected to continue to push for economic improvements during the 1970s and 1980s," he predicted.

With Negro unemployment running nearly twice the national average and the median family income for blacks only 61 percent of that for whites, Marshall suggests that what is needed is a program that strikes more at institutionalized racism than at overt discriminatory employment practices.

He pointed to the Apprenticeship Outreach program as a workable solution to the problem.

"This kind of program can be, and has been, transferred to other situations where it is desirable to gain jobs for Negroes and other minorities in areas from which they had previously been excluded."

The author notes that in 1960, nonwhite apprentices totaled 2,191, or only 2.52 percent of the number of apprentices in the nation.

The Outreach program, endorsed by the AFL-CIO and its Building & Construction Trades Dept. caused a dramatic change in the figures.

By this year, minority apprentices totaled 9,328, and Marshall said "mainly because of the Outreach programs there have been relatively large percentage increases in minority apprentices since 1964, and there is every indication that the number will continue to increase."

Although Marshall concedes that Outreach programs have not been uniformly successful, he suggests that where the program has had only limited success, this has been due more to "identifiable personnel problems and faulty administration" than to defects in the basic concept.

Marshall emphasizes that the Apprenticeship Outreach concept is important as an example of the kinds of things that might be done to change employment patterns in many other situations where minorities are much more underrepresented than in apprenticeship programs.

"The value of this approach already has been demonstrated in such diverse situations as preparing minorities for foreign service and civil service entrance examinations and in preparing them for journeyman status in the construction industry without going through apprenticeship."

As a final note, Marshall warns both employers and unions that they must cooperate in eliminating inadequate employment opportunities for minorities.

If they do not, he said, "they have little grounds for complaining when the courts, government agencies and civil rights groups make demands on them that threaten their control of traditional training and employment procedures.

"Experience also has demonstrated that those unions and employers who resist equal opportunity changes the most are the ones who ultimately have to make the greatest adjustments."

Government Unions Hit Civil Service Job Plan

The AFL-CIO and unions representing federal employes warned Congress that Civil Service Commission proposals to revamp the government's job classification system would "destroy the principle of equal pay for equal work in federal employment."

Kenneth Meiklejohn, an AFL-CIO legislative representative, told a House Civil Service subcommittee that a commission task force ignored a congressional mandate to develop a coordinated job evaluation system.

Instead, he charged, its "interim report" would compound inequities by establishing five classification systems where there are now two, and would restrict promotion opportunities for employes.

Pres. John F. Griner of the Government Employes, Pres. Maywood Boggs of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., and Director John A. McCart of the Government Employes Council also testified in opposition to the Civil Service Commission plan and associated themselves with the AFL-CIO statement.

The union witnesses also took sharp exception to a statement in the commission report that development of job evaluation and pay systems should "recognize union views."

Meiklejohn told the House panel that unions in the federal service are set up to "bargain" on issues affecting wages and working conditions, not merely to present their views.

CONVERSION AND EDUCATIONAL AID is needed for jobless scientific and technical workers, union witnesses told the House Subcommittee on Science, Research & Development. From left, are Pres. William T. Cleary of the Technical Engineers, Pres. William Lucas of AFTE Local 9, Representatives George P. Miller (D-Calif.), John F. Seiberling (D-Ohio), and James W. Symington (D-Mo.).

Jobless Professionals Seek 'Role'—Not 'Dole'

Jobless scientists, engineers and defense workers want to play a "role," not go on a "dole," six representatives of the Council for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes stressed in testimony before Congress last week.

All six spokesmen for the coalition of AFL-CIO unions repeatedly cited the desire of their members to perform useful social services to their country rather than accept a hand-out, should they become unemployed.

The union witnesses presented 48 pages of testimony to the House subcommittee on Science, Research & Development during hearings on a bill to assist in conversion and re-education of jobless scientists, engineers and defense workers.

Presenting the testimony were Jack Golodner, executive secretary of the council; Executive Vice Pres. George Gill of the Communications Workers; Pres. William Lucas of Technical Engineers Local 9; Sanford Lenz, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Pres. Henry Zylla, of IUE Local 445; and Keith Prouty, research director of the State, County & Municipal Employes.

"We must put our money where our new priorities are," said Golodner, "in pollution control, public services, noise abatement, preventive medicine, mass transit and housing."

The unionists gave their support to the bill, but made it clear they felt it is only a beginning.

"We emphasize that no single program or piece of legislation is going to be effective in moving this nation toward a solution of the scientific and technical manpower problem," Prouty told the subcommittee.

Gill urged the adoption of an 11-point program, authored by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, which he said would stimulate the economy towards full employment and provide assistance for those that need it.

He also proposed that the bill be strengthened by adding provisions for labor representatives on the advisory commission, financial aid to state and local governments, and emphasis on assisting experienced men who are laid off.

Lenz declared that real work programs are needed to cure the basic ills of the economy. He said the United States was the only industrial country in the world that exports jobs, and the problem is growing as multi-national firms expand operations in low-wage countries at the expense of American workers.

Lucas pointed out that the job crunch for scientists and engineers had been a recurring phenomenon over the last 15 years.

To prevent this situation from continuing, Zylla said, "we must develop the methods necessary to bring together the required funds and the available skills on the problems which have the highest national priorities."

Fire Fighters Staffer Harry Williams Dies

Portland, Ore.—Harry Williams, a staff representative and former vice president of the Fire Fighters, died July 3 of a heart attack.

Williams, 58, had been on the union's staff since April 1969 and had been a vice president of the Fire Fighters for five years previously.

IUD to Probe Crisis in Jobs At Convention

New protections and advances for workers in light of spiraling inflation and high unemployment will take top priority as the AFL-CIO's Industrial Union Dept. holds its ninth convention Oct. 5-6 in Washington, D.C.

The convention call issued by IUD Pres. I. W. Abel stated that since the department's last biennial convention, "we have lived through an era of economic troubles:

"A rise in unemployment by some 2.5 million men and women, to a point where over 6 percent of the people have been without work, and a constant escalation in the cost of living, which has eroded the substantial improvements in wages and benefits won by our affiliated unions."

Abel said that the situation is further complicated by the rising flood of imports which has not only brought serious unemployment, but in some cases "wiped out whole sectors of American manufacturing."

"Much of this difficulty is a product of the burgeoning growth of American-based, multi-national corporations which have shipped vast quantities of capital and technology to other countries in order to garner still greater profits through overseas production, without regard for the welfare of American workers," he declared.

Clears Senate, 88-2:

Works Bill Trimmed To Avoid New Veto

The Senate voted overwhelming approval of a pared-down public works bill aimed at providing jobs for unemployed workers—although not as many as the legislation Pres. Nixon vetoed.

Under the bill passed by the Senate, 88-2, the authorization for public works construction in areas with special unemployment problems would be boosted by $250 million a year—$500 million over the two-year period. This compares with the $2 billion authorization for the same period in the vetoed bill.

The money would be added to funds for the economic development program administered under the Commerce Dept., but the definition of communities elegible for federal grants was considerably broadened—and can now include neighborhoods and areas less than city-size that have lost major sources of employment or otherwise have special jobless problems.

Fewer communities would be eligible for federal public works grants than under the vetoed bill. But in those that would be helped, the effect would be similar — creation of badly-needed jobs at the same time that the communities get the permanent value of facilities that they need but can't otherwise afford to build.

Quick House action is expected and the strong bipartisan support in the Senate was seen as a sign that the Administration is not making any veto threats this time around.

The legislation also includes the non-controversial extension of the Appalachia Regional Development Act and companion programs for other regions with common economic problems. Both were also part of the vetoed bill.

Enactment of the new legislation would not, by itself, guarantee a go-ahead on the public works program.

The money must still be appropriated—and past public works appropriations have often been less than the spending ceiling authorized in the enabling legislation.

In other congressional developments:

- The Senate routinely approved, as part of a State Dept. appropriations bill, funds to pay the United States share of the budget of the International Labor Organization. Last year Congress withheld the money as a sign of U.S. dissatisfaction with the increased Communist bloc role in the ILO. The House this year again knocked the ILO appropriation out of the budget, and the issue will have to be resolved at a House-Senate conference on the bill.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has said that the United States has an obligation to pay the money it owes to the ILO so long as it remains a member. "We owe them money and we should pay it." Meany told newsmen at the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting this spring.

- The Senate agreed on a debate limitation for a bill limiting political campaign spending on behalf of candidates, ending the possibility of a Republican filibuster. Pres. Nixon last year vetoed a bill setting a ceiling on spending for television and radio broadcasts.

- A House Labor subcommittee began voting on a minimum wage bill that would raise the pay floor to $2 an hour in two steps and gradually bring the farm worker minimum up to the same level. Republicans will seek to substitute the Administration bill that would put off a $2 rate until 1974, keep farm workers below the regular minimum, and establish a special sub-minimum youth rate.

Jobless Rate Tops 10% in Inner Cities

147,000 persons during the second quarter, but remained equal to its first-quarter levels on a seasonally adjusted basis.

Over the year, the BLS said, the civilian labor force in urban poverty areas declined by 155,000 as the population of these areas decreased.

But the percentage of the population in the labor force also declined from 56.9 percent to 55.5 percent, indicating that people were giving up the search for work in ever-increasing numbers.

Unemployment figures for poverty areas and the nation as a whole do not include those who have become discouraged and stopped looking for jobs.

Blacks and members of other minority groups continued to be hardest hit by joblessness in the nation's slums with a rate of 11.9 percent during the second quarter, up nearly a full point from the previous quarter.

The unemployment rate for whites in poverty neighborhoods, while at a lower level, showed a much more dramatic increase, jumping from 7.7 percent to 9.1 percent.

Joblessness among teenagers showed its first dip in a year, dropping from 28.9 percent in the first quarter to 27.8 percent in the April-June period, seasonally adjusted.

On an actual basis however, it showed a large increase, from 23.2 percent to 28.5 percent.

The seasonally adjusted decrease in joblessness among teenagers was credited almost exclusively to a sharp drop in the unemployment rate for Negroes in the 16-19 age group which decreased from 44.9 percent to 36.2 percent.

But here again, actual figures showed that the unemployment for Negro teenagers jumped from 34.2 percent to 39.1 percent.

What Now?

CHORUS PICKET LINE of Variety Artists protested a proposed Clark County, Nevada, ordinance that would have established a 5-percent tax on the gross incomes of entertainers in Las Vegas. Because of AGVA's strong and vocal turnout, the county commissioners turned down the proposal.

Job Security, Single Pact Called Key Goals in Dock Negotiations

Miami Beach—Longshoremen's Pres. Thomas W. Gleason told the 1971 convention of his union here that job security and port conditions would be the most important topics of discussion in forthcoming ILA negotiations with the American shipping industry.

Gleason told the 1,000 delegates that money would be of secondary importance in talks scheduled to begin next month in New York.

By job security, Gleason was referring to the union's plan to extend to all its members the guaranteed annual income provisions of the current contract that now apply to most members of the New York area locals.

On port conditions, Gleason was focusing on the union's goal of a single contract covering all ports under ILA jurisdiction from Maine to Texas.

The ILA's current three-year contract with the industry expires at the end of September, and Gleason's remarks were made in a rebuttal to Helen D. Bentley, chairman of the Federal Maritime Commission.

In a speech to the convention, Mrs. Bentley warned that a prolonged strike this fall "could put the final skids under financially strained American-flag companies, because, almost without exception, not a single one can withstand a termination of the vital cargo-cash flow for any more days than you can count on the fingers of one hand."

Gleason insisted that the union has no desire for a strike and reminded the convention that the ILA's seven strikes over contracts in recent years had followed 80-day no-strike injunctions issued under the Taft-Hartley law.

He noted pointedly that Pres. Nixon had promised not to invoke Taft-Hartley provisions this fall.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in an address to the delegates, castigated the economic policies of the Nixon Administration for piling recession on top of inflation.

He criticized the Administration's rosy predictions on the country's economic future and its optimistic interpretation of government reports that show 5.5 million workers unemployed, and an ever-increasing cost of living.

"The public relations image is building every minute of the day, day in and day out," Meany said.

He called the Administration's pronouncements on the economy "Madison Avenue gimmickry."

"And what Madison Avenue has as its stock and trade is 'fool the public.' They make a virtue of deceit."

"Well, we don't buy this sort of thing. We are very practical people in the trade union movement and we are concerned with facts and we deal with people and their problems and that is what unions are all about," he said.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland addressed the convention on the exportation of American jobs brought about by outmoded foreign trade policies "dictated by private interests that know and respect no flag except the dollar sign."

"We in the AFL-CIO are not isolationists," Kirkland said. "We want more trade, more jobs and more prosperity on a world-wide basis. Our goal is to raise the living standard of all the workers of the world, rather than to see American living standards depressed."

And he said that if there was any question where Nixon stood on preserving jobs of American workers, "it ended with his recent assault on the jobs of American seaman."

Kirkland was referring to the suspension of the presidential executive order requiring that 50 percent of all U.S. grain sold to Iron Curtain countries be carried in American flag vessels.

"In effect, he selected a group of American workers—those in the maritime industries—as expendable," Kirkland said. "In effect, he publicly declared that these workers can be excluded from a share in America's economy, and the needs and hopes of their families can be sacrificed in order to increase the profits of the giant grain shippers."

Kirkland noted that several years ago when the shippers "with the connivance of the Commerce Dept., tried to whittle away the 50-50 policy" it was the ILA's refusal to load ships that safeguarded the jobs of American seamen.

He said he was sure there would be some action against the Administration by the maritime trades and reiterated a Meany pledge that "it will have the strongest support that the AFL-CIO can give."

Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) told the delegates that unemployment is actually running about 8 percent—instead of 6 percent as the government says—because as many as 1.5 million persons have left the labor force altogether and are not counted in Labor Dept. statistics.

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) charged that Administration policy has resulted in the largest two-year federal budget deficit since World War II.

Humphrey said that if the present gap in the Gross National Product continues, the current recession will have cost American working people more than $55 billion in lost real income during 1970-71.

U.S. Technology Exports Held Threat to Economy

Price Index Continues Sharp Rise

By Tom Castor

The Consumer Price Index jumped a seasonally adjusted five-tenths of 1 point during June with sharp advances in the cost of food, transportation and home ownership accounting for much of the rise, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The index increased even more on an unadjusted basis—six-tenths of 1 percent—which represents the actual prices the consumer pays.

The June increase pushed the CPI to 121.5 percent of its 1967 base, meaning that the same cross-section of goods and services that cost $10 four years ago, now cost $12.15.

The White House was quick to point out that real spendable earnings for a worker with three dependents were higher than year-ago figures for the sixth consecutive month.

Spendable earnings during June were $91.96—seven-tenths of 1 percent higher than May and 1.8 percent higher than June 1970. But they still were 1 percent below the all-time high recorded in September 1968.

This meant that despite substantial wage increases, the average worker's purchasing power was the same, or slightly less than it was three years ago.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson, although agreeing that June "was not one of the better months on the price front," emphasized that the first half of 1971 had seen the smallest six-month rise in prices since the last half of 1967.

The index showed a 4-percent rise over the first six months of the year, as compared with 6 percent in the year-ago period, but prices accelerated to a 5.3-percent rate in the second quarter, up markedly from the 2.8 percent recorded January to March of this year.

Even at that, Hodgson said the June increase in the CPI did not constitute a trend because much of the increase was due to higher food prices—which fluctuate sharply anyway—and to higher interest rates.

He did concede, however, that much of the relatively slow-paced increase in the first quarter was directly tied to declining mortgage interest rates which have since turned upward again.

Ronald Ziegler, White House press secretary, said the Nixon Administration continues to "have confidence in the policies

A HANDCLASP seals the tentative new two-year contract between the Telegraph Workers, led by Pres. E. L. Hageman, right, and the Western Union Telegraph Co., whose negotiators were headed by Vice Pres. Gerald P. Kent, left. About 17,000 union members returned to work after a 57-day strike, pending a membership vote on the new agreement. Still unsettled is a strike by 3,000 members of the Communications Workers against Western Union in metropolitan New York.

In 57-Day Walkout:

Telegraph Strikers Win Improved Pact

The Telegraph Workers won "important improvements" from the Western Union Telegraph Co. after a 57-day strike and returned to work pending a referendum vote of their 17,000 members.

Another 3,000 employes represented by the Communications Workers remained on strike in New York and New Jersey while negotiations continued.

All members of the Telegraph Workers' negotiating committee agreed to recommend the settlement, which will be voted on within the next three weeks, Pres. E. L. Hageman said. It includes wage increases of 10 percent this year and an additional 9 percent next year, a stronger job security plan, improved severance pay schedules, more paid vacation and other benefits valued by the union at 4 percent of payroll.

Hageman said the job security language will "prevent wage reductions for employes with five years or more of service" when staff reductions require "bumping" into other jobs.

The severance pay provision was raised by 50 percent for employes displaced by work transfers or office closings. If an employe is displaced and is eligible to retire, he will be given a cash bonus of 25 percent of the new higher severance schedule, plus retirement pay, according to the union president.

Besides across-the-board wage increases totaling 19 percent, the new pact provides additional raises for technicians and other workers in skilled classifications.

A new clause requires the company to notify the union and engage in prior negotiations with it on any plan to contract-out work now performed by employes in the union bargaining unit.

Labor Warns of Peril To Living Standards

The accelerating export of U.S. technology abroad undermines the American economy and threatens the nation's standard of living, the AFL-CIO charged in congressional testimony.

Licensing and patent agreements with foreign firms and joint ventures with foreign producers amount to exporting U.S. production, services and jobs, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller warned.

And while American companies entering into such agreements may reap an immediate profit from royalties, "those benefits do not flow to the United States economy."

Biemiller and AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger testified before a House Science & Astronautics subcommittee which is exploring the export of America's technological advances.

Biemiller cited the shift in the U.S. trade balance over the past decade from a healthy surplus to a possible deficit this year.

"There seems to be a relationship between the rise of foreign spending by U.S. firms on plant and equipment abroad and the loss of leadership in trade," he told the panel.

Latest government figures show that U.S. imports exceeded exports for the third consecutive month in June—and over the first six months of the year the nation spent $372.3 million more on imports than it received from exports. Imports rose 15 percent over the same period last year as compared with a 5 percent rise in exports.

The AFL-CIO testimony sharply criticized government policies that encourage the export of technology, production and jobs as "a waste of our resources and a denial of the nation's need to provide a rising standard of living for all of its citizens."

Labor believes that the United States "should not spend the taxpayers' dollars to export the taxpayers' jobs," Biemiller declared. "That's self-defeating."

He contrasted the American gov-

Pared-Down Public Works Bill Passed

By David L. Perlman

The House voted 375-27 approval of a "quarter-loaf" version of the accelerated public works bill that Pres. Nixon vetoed a month ago.

The new legislation would authorize up to $500 million in new federal money over a two-year period to help communities with high unemployment and bare treasuries build needed public facilities.

This compares with the $2 billion spending authorization in the vetoed bill.

It would mean tens of thousands of jobs in communities and neighborhoods with the heaviest unemployment rather than hundreds of thousands of jobs spread over a wider area.

The House improved one section of the Senate bill by allowing unused spending authority to be carried over into the next fiscal year. The Senate was expected to promptly accept the House change and speed the legislation to the President's desk.

Pres. Nixon is expected to sign the trimmed-down bill, which also includes a non-controversial extension of the Appalachia Regional Development Act and other regional assistance programs. The ex-

New Strike Targets Added in Rail Dispute

By Eugene A. Kelly

Cleveland—The refusal of major railroads to bargain with the United Transportation Union on wages and work rules has left the UTU "no choice but to set up an increasing selective strike pressure," Pres. Charles Luna said.

Luna, in a statement charging government interference in negotiations on the side of management, named three more carriers the UTU will strike next month in its long effort to settle the wage-rules dispute without sacrificing the jobs and income of thousands of train crewmen.

Negotiations broke down July 26, but were resumed July 29 in Washington at the request of the Administration.

UTU members struck the Southern and Union Pacific railroads July 16 in a selective strike procedure ruled legal by the courts. They walked out July 24 on the Southern Pacific and the Norfolk & Western. Five more roads have been chosen for walkouts July 30, another five for Aug. 6 and the latest three on Aug. 11 — the Lackawanna, Louisville & Nashville and the Frisco Road.

A U.S. Court of Appeals upheld the union's right to strike a few roads at a time provided it has exhausted the processes of the Rail-

Steel Showdown Near, Copper Pattern Spreads

The Steelworkers headed for a contract showdown with nine big basic steel firms even as the USWA and 25 other unions were bargaining to resolve the four-week copper strike by extending the pattern settlements won from five copper producers.

The basic steel negotiations in Washington affecting 350,000 USWA members faced a deadline of Aug. 1, when existing contracts expire. A report on those negotiations was to be made July 30 to 600 local union presidents and other officers at a meeting of the union's Basic Steel Industry Conference.

The conference, according to union custom, will consider any offer made by industry negotiators at that point. It has authority to decide whether to strike or extend the contracts.

Neither union nor management has reported on the status of negotiations to date. But the USWA announced the results of a strike authorization vote conducted recently under the union constitution. The vote was 93 percent in favor of strike action,

UNITED TRANSPORTATION UNION members began picketing the West End yards of the Norfolk & Western Railway in Roanoke, Va., as the UTU's selective strike method spread to more railroads. The Supreme Court has upheld such strikes when used by railroad unions in pursuit of a national agreement refused by the carriers.

Union Hits Refusal to Bargain:

New Strike Targets Set in Rail Dispute

way Labor Act without getting an agreement, and provided it gives at least two weeks' notice. The Supreme Court refused to disturb this ruling in spite of management appeals, and the UTU complied with all its terms.

Of 160 major U.S. railroads, 17 are UTU strike targets to date. More will be chosen until the carriers agree to bargain in good faith, the union said.

"There is no other course open, since the railroads continue to refuse to bargain," Luna explained.

"We have made offers that should have been the basis for bargaining. We have even given them an offer allowing changes in work practices. But nothing can induce them to bargain." The offer paralleled one accepted by the Chicago & North Western Railway.

In support of his charge of government bias toward the employers, Luna cited a message from Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson after the breakdown of negotiations and Luna's return to his headquarters. The message proposed that the union and management "mutually agree to resolve the matters in dispute . . . by submitting the unresolved issues to arbitration" by a panel of three "distinguished experts" selected by the parties to the dispute or named by Pres. Nixon.

The request, Luna charged, "reflects the complete bias of the government toward the management position" and presents "proof that a position is being constructed either for Congress or some court."

The union's attitude toward arbitration was made clear throughout the negotiations, and was explained to Assistant Labor Sec. William J. Usery as late as July 26, Luna said.

"This is exactly why management does not and will not bargain," he emphasized. "To revert to arbitration at this point, when we have established the right to the exercise of economic strength through court action, would be foolish."

Hodgson's reference to "another railway union which has settled" on wages and work rules was called by Luna "pure nonsense and aggravation." That union—the Locomotive Engineers—settled "conditional on the UTU settling," he said.

Further, the BLE member who loses his job "bumps down and takes a job from a UTU member"—a fireman or brakeman, according to Luna. Such a member then walks the streets and in effect "pays for the wage increase" negotiated this year, he said.

Luna declared "it is very distressing to find the Secretary of Labor coming along and telling us that strikes hurt. We all know that strikes hurt—they hurt us worst of all."

But "collective bargaining never can work as long as the government remains a slave to management and interferes when collective bargaining is beginning to succeed."

"The chips are down and the bets are made," Luna declared. "The U.S. courts have approved selective strikes. Let's find out whether collective bargaining will survive in this industry, or whether we should allow it to deteriorate to a meaningless phrase."

In other developments, a House subcommittee opened hearings on a number of bills calling variously for compulsory arbitration on the rails, a system allowing selective strikes and Administration-imposed settlement terms.

Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.) told a Senate subcommittee hearing on the Penn-Central Railroad that he may call both labor and management before the subcommittee to air the issues in the rail dispute.

The head of the struck Norfolk & Western road said in New York City that his railroad is collecting $737,000 a day from 64 other big roads in a mutual aid pact. The president of the Southern system, also struck by the UTU, said his road's daily subsidy is $635,000.

Financial statements of several struck roads showed sharp gains in profits for the first half of 1971.

Living Costs Continue to Rise Sharply

we are proceeding with" and planned no change in economic tactics.

"We think that very good progress is being made in dealing with the problems of the economy," Ziegler said. He added that the Nixon Administration is doing everything it can to slow rising food prices which jumped sharply again in June.

Supermarket prices soared nine-tenths of 1 percent during the month led by a 1.4-point increase in the prices of meats, poultry and fish, and a full 3-point increase in the cost of fruits and vegetables.

Overall food prices were up 1.9 percent from the first quarter and were running 3.5 percent higher than a year ago.

The seasonally adjusted increase in the overall price of food was five-tenths of 1 percent. Pork prices did not rise as much as they usually do in June, and egg prices fell.

The price of restaurant meals and snacks, however, rose another five-tenths of a point in June.

The cost of services climbed five-tenths of 1 point as mortgage interest rates no longer held down this component. Services were 1.3 percent higher in the second quarter and 5.6 points higher than during June 1970.

Leading the increase in services was the cost of housekeeping and home maintenance, which was up 1.2 points over May and 9.4 percent higher than year-ago figures.

The cost of homeownership—including purchase prices, mortgage interest rates, taxes, insurance, maintenance and repairs—was up 1.1 percent over May and showed a 1.4 percent increase in the April-June period compared with the first quarter of the year.

While overall apparel prices dropped one-tenth of a point in June and women's and girls' clothing were down four-tenths of 1 percent, the cost of transportation jumped seven-tenths of 1 percent over the previous month.

The most notable increases in transportation were hefty rises of 1.9 percent for public transport and 1.2 percent in the price of used cars.

Approximately 41,500 workers will receive cost-of-living escalator adjustments based on the June national CPI or one of the city indexes.

But 4,500 other workers will not receive adjustments because they already have been paid the maximum cost-of-living increases stipulated in their contracts.

Police Harass Strikers At Tennessee Hospital

Oneida, Tenn.—Court injunctions, state troopers and county police have failed to destroy the unity of 100 low-paid hospital workers in the fourth week of a strike for recognition of their union by the Scott County Hospital.

The pickets are new members of Service Employes Local 150-T, a statewide union of public employes headquartered in Nashville. On strike since June 30 in this remote outpost of the labor movement, they feel their cause is right and their hope for better wages and working conditions reasonable.

"We'll stay with them until they win," said Business Agent Johnny R. Roberts of the local, which has 4,000 members across the state. "All they want is for the hospital board to recognize them and negotiate with them." Wages, Roberts said, averaged $67 a week before the strike started.

The hospital has about 150 beds and serves a small town and rural area just south of the Kentucky border. Its service employes, mostly women, joined Local 150-T last winter and asked hospital management for recognition, with or without an election. Trustees refused to answer their requests for a meeting.

Union members waited through three months of frustration, then left their jobs to picket. They were manning the lines in front of the hospital on the first day of the walkout when officers of the Scott County Court in Huntsville served an order on 12 union officers and members restraining picketing.

Three days later, another injunction was served on 40 pickets walking alongside State Route 27. Roberts and other pickets were held in the county jail and released 30 hours later when friends raised cash bonds in an area-wide collection.

Roberts led a march past the hospital that night to demonstrate in support of the right to picket.

The marchers walked on the edge of the highway and were not blocking traffic when members of the Tennessee Highway Patrol arrived. They had been summoned, the union said, by Arzo Carson, state attorney general.

Roberts described what happened: "Before the troopers arrived it was relatively peaceful, but the situation did not remain so. We have 15 eye-witnesses who say members of the Highway Patrol assaulted and brutally beat the Rev. Levi Bowling," whose wife was among the pickets.

Bowling was driving his truck slowly behind the pickets when the state police halted him, pulled him out of the truck and beat him with a flashlight and nightstick, the union witnesses reported. The troopers took him to the county jail, then to a hospital at Somerset, Ky., some 50 miles away.

"The doctor said there is a good chance he will never walk again," Roberts said.

Bowling was a coal miner for 24 years. His back was crushed in a mine accident and he walked after many months of recovery with surgical pins in the injured area. The pins broke loose because of the beating he received, the union said it was told.

Meanwhile, pickets remain at their posts every day from 6 a.m. to 1 a.m., 100 yards or more from hospital entrances as the court order requires. A few strikebreakers have been hired and seven pickets have been notified of their replacement, the union reported. It represents nurses' aides, orderlies, ward secretaries, housekeeping and maintenance workers in public hospitals and universities.

House Passes Blue-Collar Pay Bill Despite Threat of Presidential Veto

A labor-backed bill to improve the pay system of the federal government's 650,000 blue-collar workers easily passed the House despite Administration opposition and warnings of a presidential veto.

A one-sided voice vote sent the legislation to the Senate, where hearings have already been held on similar bills.

AFL-CIO affiliates, representing the big majority of government workers, joined in urging the legislation as an important step towards giving blue-collar workers the same opportunity for within-grade pay increases that white collar and postal employes have long had.

Under the present wage board system of setting blue-collar rates on the basis of area prevailing wages, employes start at 96 percent of the prevailing rate, move up to parity after six months on the job, and reach the third step of 104 percent 18 months later.

The House bill would add two additional 4-percent increases—each after two years at the previous pay step. The new top step would thus be reached after six years.

The legislation would also:

- Extend the prevailing wage system to include about 140,000 workers who now have what amounts to second-class status as government employes. They are employed by military post exchanges and other self-financing activities and are not paid from appropriated federal funds.

An attempt to delete this section of the bill was soundly beaten, 232-147.

- Provide a uniform 7.5-percent night differential for workers on the second shift and a 10-percent differential for anyone on a post-midnight "lobster shift."

- Establish a high-level advisory council on wage board policy with equal representation from unions and management. The board would be headed by a neutral chairman, appointed by the President for a four-year term, who would not hold any other government post.

- Workers who are downgraded or bumped to a lower-rated job would have their pay red-lined for a two-year period so that they would not have to take a pay cut.

The House passed an almost identical bill last year. In the hope of avoiding a presidential veto, a House-Senate conference committee trimmed the final version down to a four-step wage system, rather than five.

The bill, nevertheless, was vetoed by the President. He waited until two hours before the 91st Congress adjourned—thus precluding any attempt to override the veto.

Despite the Administration's continued opposition, the legislation won a bipartisan 21-3 endorsement from the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee.

All committee Democrats voted to report the bill and only three Republicans dissented, echoing Pres. Nixon's claim that the legislation would be "inflationary."

The bulk of federal blue-collar workers—about 80 percent of the total—are employed by the Dept. of Defense.

New Strike Authorized:

Steel Talks Near Deadline, Copper Settlements Spread

if that should be necessary, and 7 percent opposed.

Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel has reiterated the union's position on 1971 negotiations—it wants an acceptable settlement on or before the contract expiration date. He has said the terms should be at least equal to the settlements reached by the USWA earlier this year in the aluminum and can industries—31 percent in improved benefits, plus cost-of-living protection.

Negotiations in copper headed into their final phase when a Steelworker-led coalition of unions representing 35,000 workers reached a contract with the Kennecott Copper Corp. that the unions labeled a pattern-setter.

The Kennecott agreement achieves the major goals of this year's negotiations—a sizable wage increase and a cost-of-living clause protecting the wage gains. Four other companies followed Kennecott, and employes of some returned to work when local negotiations were completed. All have been on strike since July 1.

Meanwhile, the unions said in the Nonferrous Workers' Strike Bulletin, the walkout will continue at all Kennecott properties "until the contract language is finalized and all remaining local issues are resolved." All other strikes where no final agreements have been reached also will continue.

Settlements were concluded first at the Miami Copper Co. and the Magma Copper Co., where new terms were approved and some 4,000 strikers returned to work. Kennecott was the first of the Big Four companies to settle. Two others then reached tentative agreement—Phelps Dodge Corp. and the Anaconda Mining Co.—subject to working out contract language.

The American Smelting & Refining Co. is the only one of the industry's Big Four without an agreement. Negotiations also were continuing with two smaller producers.

The pattern agreement with Kennecott includes wage increases of about 92 cents an hour over three years, a cost-of-living clause with no ceiling on raises tied to the Consumer Price Index, and improvements in pensions, health care, holidays and other benefits.

Delegates to the National Nonferrous Industry Conference, representing all the unions that bargain for workers in the industry, voted at a meeting in Salt Lake City to approve the agreements with Kennecott and Miami Copper, provided local issues were settled.

A settlement with Magma was rejected by the 400 delegates as unsatisfactory, but union and management negotiators later resolved the disputed issues.

The conference voted unanimous support to the bargaining team's action in rejecting the last offer by American Smelting because it contained no cost-of-living protection. Action on the Phelps Dodge and Anaconda pacts was left to the steering committee.

The approved pacts provide across-the-board wage increases of 50 cents an hour effective immediately, second and third-year hikes of 12.5 cents an hour, plus increases between grades that will add 10 cents an hour to rates in the first year, 3.5 cents the following year and another 3.5 cents in the third year.

The agreements call for a 25 percent boost in shift differential pay in the second year of the contract—from 8, 12 and 16 cents an hour per shift to 10, 15 and 20 cents.

Another second-year improvement will boost retirement payments from $5 a month times years of service to $7.50. Disability pension benefits also will be raised. Current retirees will get a $15 monthly boost, and widows of qualified employes an additional $7.50.

Pension benefits for widows of employes with 10 or more years of service were liberalized to permit payments at age 40 instead of the current 55.

Other improvements cover supplemental unemployment benefits, an additional paid holiday in the second contract year, a wider range of hospital and medical benefits, improved sickness and accident benefits, safety and health plans, job review and civil rights clauses.

IBEW Scores Gains At Western Electric

Bell Telephone System employes represented by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers won major gains in contracts covering 60,000 workers in Western Electric units and 11,000 plant employes of New Jersey Bell. The New Jersey group returned to work after a four-week strike.

The Western Electric settlement, the union reported, provides wage increases up to 37.6 percent over a three-year period, plus an estimated 2.5 percent more in a cost-of-living clause and fringe benefits.

Eight IBEW local unions in Montana settled with Mountain States Bell without stopping work. The union's Illinois Bell system council, representing 15,000 employes, is meeting daily in Chicago in Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service offices. Its members are not on strike but did respect CWA picket lines during the latter's six-day strike early this month.

Negotiators for 30,000 IBEW members continued efforts to reach a first settlement with New England Bell and set Aug. 1 as their deadline for agreement. Contract talks are being conducted in Boston by union members who recently switched to IBEW from an independent union.

The New Jersey Bell settlement provides wage increases ranging from 70 cents to $1.02 an hour over a three-year term. It also provides for upgrading of job classifications, improved shift differentials and mileage allowances, a cost-of-living clause and other gains.

An agreement by management to eliminate territorial zone classification for installers will add 74 cents an hour to the wages of about 2,000 employes, the union said.

Two other IBEW strikes against Bell are continuing in California—by 6,500 directory service workers in San Francisco, whose picket lines are being respected by members of the Communications Workers, and 2,000 toll test board employes in Los Angeles.

Montana locals in Billings and seven other cities won a "pattern" agreement with a guarantee that wage rates will be the same in all cities regardless of size or number of telephones. Also they negotiated a union security clause and double time rates for overtime after the regular working shift.

Ballots in a mail referendum on a proposed new CWA contract with Bell System companies and the Western Electric subsidiary of Bell have been mailed to some 500,000 employes nationwide. They are to be returned by Aug. 10.

Shoe Unions Hit 'Voluntary' Import Quotas

The "voluntary" Italian shoe export quotas to the United States, recently announced by the White House, were criticized as "far from being a workable solution to the imports problem" by the heads of two AFL-CIO unions last week.

Presidents John E. Mara of the Boot & Shoe Workers and George Fecteau of the United Shoe Workers called the quotas a "fraud" and said that only agreements with teeth in them could be of value.

"Italian shoes have already cost 65,000 American shoe workers their jobs," they said as they pledged to work to get quota legislation through Congress.

The two leaders of more than 80,000 shoe workers declared that the agreement limiting 1971 Italian shoe imports to 5 percent over the 1970 level is worthless because imports are already running about 22 percent over 1970.

Both men suggested that the agreement could be easily circumvented by the Italian shoe industry because its exports to the United States are in terms of dollar value. Simply downgrading the value of the shoes would enable the Italians to increase the actual amount of footwear shipped to this country.

"The American shoe industry can be saved," they stated, "only with hard-nosed quotas supported by tariff restrictions."

Job Problem Theme Of September Tape

The AFL-CIO's recent nationwide Conference on Jobs will be brought to the local union level in the September program of COPE Report, the monthly cassette tape message from COPE.

The September program will include highlights from the Washington conference. Reports on foreign trade, public works, public service employment, emergency aid to the unemployed and reconversion are covered on the 30-minute tape.

Speakers include AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, House Speaker Carl Albert and AFL-CIO Vice Presidents I. W. Abel, Paul Jennings, Matthew Guinan, Jerry Wurf, S. Frank Raftery, James A. Suffridge, Floyd E. Smith, Peter Bommarito and Joseph D. Keenan.

Information on subscribing to COPE Report is available from COPE.

PAUL J. BURNSKY, right, Machinists director of organization, has been elected president of the AFL-CIO's Metal Trades Dept., succeeding Maywood Boggs, left, who resigned. Burnsky will take over the president's duties Sept. 1.

Paul J. Burnsky Elected To Head Metal Trades

Paul J. Burnsky, director of organization for the Machinists, was elected president of the AFL-CIO's Metal Trades Dept., succeeding Maywood Boggs, who resigned effective Sept. 1 for "compelling personal reasons."

Boggs has been president of the department since July 1969.

In announcing Burnsky's election by the department's executive board, Boggs described him as "the right man, at the right time to head the department." He said Burnsky brings with him "the kind of background, experience, knowledge and vigor that will move the Metal Trades Dept. ahead."

Burnsky, 49, began his union career as a member of IAM Lodge 1487 in Chicago. At the time, he was a mechanic for Capitol Airlines, and he served his local union as shift steward, shop committee chairman and vice president. He was a member of IAM District 144's negotiating committee and a delegate to both the Chicago and Illinois AFL-CIO.

He was appointed a grand lodge representative in 1950 and came to the Machinists' Washington, D.C., headquarters in 1965, serving as an administrative assistant to IAM past Pres. P. L. Siemiller. It was then that he began representing the Machinists in Metal Trades Dept. activities.

Burnsky served as Metal Trades convention delegate and as a member of the department's Cooperative Committee on Organization of Federal Employes and its Organization & Disputes Committee.

He was appointed organizing director of the Machinists in 1970 by Pres. Floyd E. Smith. Burnsky will resign that post when he assumes the Metal Trades presidency.

Boggs was a vice president of the Boilermakers from 1956 until his election as head of the Metal Trades.

COPE Ties '72 Election To Union Member Vote

Victory in 1972 depends on voter registration, COPE Director Al Barkan said in an interview recorded for COPE Report, the monthly cassette tape message to union officials.

Reporting on a series of meetings around the country with leaders of state and city central bodies of the AFL-CIO, Barkan said he found "solid confidence that we can win in 1972."

"The primary responsibility now, as always, is registration," he stated. "Every hour spent on registration this year frees our COPE volunteers for two hours of other important political activity in next year's elections."

Barkan predicted victory in 1972 if 75 to 80 percent of all union members and their families are registered to vote.

In another feature on the August program, Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) explains "no-fault" automobile insurance.

The present system of auto insurance, Hart said, often requires "a toss of the coin" to determine who is at fault. With "no-fault" insurance, the consumer would get substantially all of his actual losses.

"The lawyers would get less; the court fees would be less; there would be fewer investigators; the overhead would be less, but the payment to the fellow who paid his premium dollar would be substantially greater," Hart said.

Also on the August COPE Report is a detailed analysis of the Occupational Safety & Health Act of 1970 by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.) and Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland reports on blacks in the labor movement.

Taylor, Sheehan On Safety Panel

Two job safety specialists from organized labor were named to the National Advisory Committee on Occupational Safety & Health by Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson.

They are George H. R. Taylor, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, and John J. Sheehan, legislative director of the Steelworkers.

The 12-member committee, created by the new Occupational Safety & Health Act, consults with and makes recommendations to the Secretaries of Labor and Health, Education & Welfare on the administration of the act. The committee members represent labor, management, occupational safety and health professions and the public.

The first meeting of the committee is scheduled for Aug. 11. All sessions are open to the public.

Behind the Price Rise

THE ORDINARY American family measures inflation in a very direct and unconfusing way: How much does it cost this month compared to last month?

By that measure the Administration's policies to curb inflation are a washout no matter how Labor Sec. Hodgson tries to blur the sharp edge of the statistics.

In the first three months of 1971 the cost of living, as measured by the Consumer Price Index of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, increased at an annual rate of 2.8 percent.

In the second three months of the year the annual rate of increase nearly doubled to 5.3 percent.

It's true that on a six-month basis the annual rate of climb is only 4 percent. But that's not what it's all about. If the Administration's plans to curb inflation were succeeding, the second quarter would have been at the same level or lower than the first quarter; instead it nearly doubled.

So the ordinary family last month paid $12.15 for a cross-section market basket of goods and services that cost $10 four years ago.

And those goods and services were priced at the same level to the 5 million persons unemployed last month. Four years ago when the market basket cost $10 there were only 3 million unemployed.

MOSTLY UNNOTICED and unmentioned in the living costs stories and reports is the effect of interest rates. The first quarter of the year when the annual rate of increase was 2.8 percent, interest rates were declining. These rates, essentially the price of money, are reflected throughout the economy; they enter into the price of nearly all goods and services.

This higher price of money certainly contributed to the doubling of the rate of increase in living costs during the second quarter of the year.

There are of course other factors in the CPI, but the Administration's inability or unwillingness to control the rise in interest rates plays an important role in what's happening when the ordinary American family goes shopping.

On Individual Liberties

It's so terribly easy, in these days of multiplying pressures and mounting tensions, for people to feel outrage or even hatred for muggers and smut peddlers, for student protesters and black militants, for men who leak secret documents and papers that print them.

Yet the very swiftness with which angry emotion can come makes it all the more necessary that the government move slowly and deliberately to prosecute and punish. Times of high tension and easy anger are traditionally those that most severely strain the strength and resiliency of the constitutional guarantees of individual rights. Yet those safeguards were not designed, after all, primarily to protect the powerful or popular—they normally need no special protection—but rather the weak and the unpopular.

The Nixon Administration usually says all the right things about its commitment to individual liberties, but sometimes its actions don't quite jibe.

The Man Who Came to Dinner

A Word Edgewise:

Fairness in TV Network News Legitimate Concern of Congress

By John P. Roche

WELL, DR. FRANK STANTON of CBS has been spared a trial for contempt of Congress and—unless some security risk at the network leaks the "CBS Papers"—we shall never know exactly how the "Selling of the Pentagon" was put together. As has been suggested here before, this is just as well—there is enough snooping in our society already. And besides CBS has changed its rules, in effect proclaiming that while it is not guilty, it won't again play games with interviews.

Yet, conceding that Harley Staggers's committee went off the reservation in this particular instance, the fact is that the investigators were trying to put a handle on a notably slippery billiard ball: bias and distortion in the presentation of news. And when the networks claim that they are just like newspapers, and have the same constitutional protection, they have gone well beyond the First Amendment as it is generally interpreted. Indeed, the Supreme Court has sustained the right of Congress to require "fairness" from both radio and TV stations.

This is a crucial distinction. Newspapers are private property, and have the right to be as biased as they choose. If you don't like one paper's position, you can always buy another. Radio and TV stations, on the other hand, are utilizing public property—the air waves and channels—and if all you get is the same pitch from all the networks, you can either believe it or turn it off.

To prevent any one viewpoint from dominating these publicly owned media, Congress passed and the Federal Communications Commission is supposed to enforce the "Fairness Doctrine," which requires that all sides of controversial questions be presented. And presented fairly: you can't have a university professor representing one side, and the village idiot the other.

The legitimate, and constitutional, concern of Congress then is not with such esoteric questions as were raised in the "Selling of the Pentagon," nor should it be with the paranoidal issue of the political viewpoints of the TV editors or commentators.

It is simply this: Is the news presented fairly? No more, no less. The trouble with this standard is the absence of accepted criteria of fairness and the lack of objective techniques of measurement.

However, a land-mine is shortly going to explode. Miss Edith Efron of TV Guide decided back in 1968 that there must be some way of empirically evaluating "fairness" in TV network news. So she got three tape recorders and had transcribed all the daily prime-time news features on the three networks from Sept. 16 to election eve, Nov. 4, 1968. As issues, she chose the presidential race and 10 associated matters including Vietnam policy, black militants, demonstrators, and the white middle class.

She then took this mass of material—over 100,000 words per network—and broke it down in terms of "for" and "against," e.g., Hubert Humphrey, Richard Nixon, George Wallace, or black militants, or the war.

WITHOUT GOING into details here, the result is a volume, "The News Twisters" (to be published in September by Nash) that should make quite a stir. It is a devastating indictment of unfairness of treatment by all three networks. Without an independent investigation of her data and methods, it is impossible to issue a final verdict on her charges.

But the point is that she has put a handle on that billiard ball, has provided a prima facie case of private news-management that would bring a true bill from any grand jury in the nation.

In other words, what Miss Efron's charges merit is a thorough, sophisticated and nonpartisan investigation by Congress of the extent to which its stewardship, as set forth in the Fairness Doctrine, has been evaded. It might be added that this is not a matter of grinding any special ax—she suggests that the New Left was treated as unfairly as the war in Vietnam.

Bayard Rustin Says:

National Interest Undermined By Inaction on Inner City Decay

SPEAKING at the recent NAACP convention in Minneapolis, Andrew Brimmer, a leading economist and the single black member of the board of governors of the Federal Reserve System, pointed to a basic problem affecting black America in the cities: the division between the stable, reasonably affluent working and middle class segment of the black community and the black underclass.

The first group has already made considerable economic progress and is in a position to take advantage of opportunities as they open up.

The second group consists of blacks who live in the spiritually and physically oppressive world of the urban ghetto. They have few marketable skills and so little chance of moving ahead when opportunities arise, nor are they now in a position to acquire skills in the near future.

A few exceptionally talented individuals may be fortunate enough to escape from the impoverished ghetto, but in the absence of a new and radical social commitment on the part of the government, most of them have little to look forward to that will be different from the past.

Summing up his fears about where we are moving, Dr. Brimmer said that "We may end up . . . in the black community with a large body of underclass people, sort of people on the fringes of things with no real opportunity to participate in what actually is going to be substantial economic expansion over the decade."

The tragedy is not only that people are poor, but that they are unable to escape from their poverty. Moreover, they are receiving little help from the outside. Our government is more concerned with helping the rich than solving pressing social problems.

Last January, to cite just one example of government neglect, the Treasury Dept., acting on an Administration proposal, ruled to reduce business taxes by an annual average of $3.9 billion over the next 10 years—a tax saving for business totalling $39 billion. The government claims that the tax cut for business will stimulate investment and production, but it is just as likely to increase business profits.

Moreover, there is no reason why the government, if it collected the $39 billion in tax revenues, could not use the money to rebuild our cities and provide for other basic social needs. In addition to stimulating the economy, such an approach would further the cause of social justice.

Writing in the June 1971 issue of the Federationist, the monthly magazine of the AFL-CIO, economist Nat Goldfinger points out that the business tax cut was announced in January, "only weeks after the President vetoed a bill passed by both houses of Congress to provide federal funds for the creation of public service jobs for the long-term unemployed and seriously underemployed; it came only weeks after the President vetoed congressional appropriations for housing and urban development; and only weeks after he vetoed funds for education."

THE UNJUST NATURE of the President's priorities is not all that is outrageous. His actions also run counter to any reasonable assessment of what is our national interest. We have come to see during the past decade that it is not in our national interest to permit our cities to decay to the point where they have become centers of poverty, segregation, crime, congestion, and pollution.

Nor is it in our national interest to stand idly by while the black underclass, referred to by Dr. Brimmer, grows in size and provides a permanent source of despair and resentment that can be turned against the entire society.

Two years ago Gunnar Myrdal, the Swedish social scientist, assessed the racial situation in the United States 25 years after his monumental work, An American Dilemma.

After discussing the progress that had been made in a number of areas, he noted that one of his major miscalculations had been to assume that the United States would not permit its cities to deteriorate into their present condition. Coming from a society like Sweden, where social planning is a way of life, he found it incredible that the most affluent society in the world could not take the steps necessary to preserve its own well-being.

The decade of the 1950s was a period of great complacency in the United States, even though the conditions were developing that were to produce the riots of the 1960s.

Today we do not have the illusion that all is well, yet we are still doing nothing and the future is not bright. If our society can be compared to a volcano, it follows that those at the top are no less vulnerable to the consequences of an eruption than those at the bottom. The message to Mr. Nixon is that social justice is in the national interest.

How to Buy:

Consumers Caught In Auto Tire Jungle

By Sidney Margolius

IN THE PAST FIVE YEARS tires in general have become at least somewhat safer as the result of safety standards required since 1968 by the federal tire safety law, although they still have a distance to go in improved endurance and reserve load capacity.

Consumers also now can get a little more information, as the result of the government requirements that certain data must now be imprinted on the sidewalls.

Otherwise, the tire business is more of a jungle than ever. Five years ago there were some 1,100 tires of different brands and quality on the market. Now, marketing researcher Stefan Josenhans found in a survey for this column, there are 1,700 different models, grades and brands, and most of them come in 12 to 15 different sizes.

As before, you have to decide on the general grade—premium, first line, second line or third line, none of which are dependable designations in any case since the manufacturer does the designating and one maker's "premium" tire may be no better than another's "first line."

This choice is further complicated by the additional cords now in use—fiberglas, polyester, nylon and rayon, with or without steel belts. Now new types of construction have been added. In addition to the conventional bias ply tires, there now are belted bias tires and radial tires.

Each of these types may be made with different cords. A belted bias tire, for example, may have polyester, nylon or rayon cords in the body, and fiberglas, rayon or steel cords in the belt. Moreover, some belted bias tires may have four cord plies in the body; others, only two, and the cords may be polyester or nylon.

The tire safety law of 1966 had directed the government to promulgate simple grade standards by 1968 so that tires would be graded 1, 2, 3, or 4. Thus, consumers would have a clue to the general quality of a tire whether the maker calls it premium, first line or "super deluxe." But establishing grades apparently has been difficult, and we are still waiting for them.

Until the government finally can develop a grading system, or require that manufacturers provide more data meanwhile, tires will remain a jungle of exaggerated names; a world in which low-grade tires sound like high-quality luxury tires.

Guarantees also vary considerably. Five different types were found to be offered by various manufacturers and larger retailers.

THE NEW DESIGNATIONS give some clues to the type of tire. A tire labeled "7.75-14 N" means that it is made with nlyon cord. If labeled "Poly" it uses polyester cord. If the designation includes the letters "78" this means that it has a 78 percent profile, (the height divided by the width). The 78 series is wider with more "footprint" on the ground and consequently better cornering ability than lower grade tires which may not show a profile designation but often have an 83 percent profile. Tires with a "70" designation have an even lower profile than the 78 series.

The letter "R" in the designation means a radial model. For example, in the designation "ER78-14," the E refers to the tire size, the R stands for radial, the 78 indicates the profile and the 14 the wheel size.

Under the federal tire safety law, tires must be labeled with the manufacturer's name or brand name, and a code number to identify the manufacturer to the purchaser upon request. But if the dealer is unwilling to identify the manufacturer, here are the code numbers for most of the leading manufacturers who also make the private-brand tires: 125, Gates; 126, McCreary; 127, Uniroyal; 133, Michelin; 137, Mohawk; 138, Kelly-Springfield; 140, Dunlop; 141, Dunlop Canada; 145, Goodrich; 146, Seiberling; 147, Firestone; 148, Mansfield; 151, General, 152, Lee; 153, Armstrong; 154, Dayton; 155, Firestone Canada; 163, Goodrich Canada; 167, Uniroyal Canada; 169, Goodyear; 170, Goodyear Canada; 171, Seiberling Canada.

Quick Action Needed:

White House Still Without Plan For Jobs, Economic Problems

ALTHOUGH UNEMPLOYMENT has nearly doubled since Pres. Nixon took office, the Administration still has "nothing in sight" to create jobs and spur the economy to reverse the worsening trend, AFL-CIO Economist Nat Goldfinger declared.

Pointing out that since January 1969, the nation's jobless rolls have shot up from 2.7 million to more than 5 million, the federation's research director said that only a sharp shift of Administration policies can ease the "breadline unemployment" situation.

But, Goldfinger stressed, the recent comments of Nixon's top economic advisers hold out no hope that "the Administration intends to quickly turn this thing around."

"To reduce employment and provide jobs for growth in the labor force and for the returning GIs," he said "it would be necessary to create about 2.5 to 3 million new jobs within the next 12 months."

Goldfinger said the recent national AFL-CIO Conference on Jobs showed that the heavy impact of imports on American production and jobs "is the most serious problem that the U.S. government has to face up to." He said that "if the current trend is permitted to continue, we could well wind up with a low-wage economy—the kind of low-wage, service-type economy in which the American standard of life is destroyed."

Goldfinger appeared on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, produced as a public service by the AFL-CIO and broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Goldfinger renewed organized labor's call for federal action to curb and supervise the flow of U.S. capital to foreign companies and subsidiaries of American companies that are producing heavily for U.S. markets and "displacing large proportions of American production and American jobs."

BECAUSE OF THE RECESSION and the continuing sluggishness of the economy, Goldfinger noted, only about 75 percent of U.S. industrial capacity has been utilized. He also urged establishment of quotas to "slow down the very sharp rise of imports."

Turning to continuing inflation, Goldfinger said that "equitable, across-the-board, even-handed" controls on "all forms of prices, costs, income and profits, as well as wages," would be "workable . . . if the Administration had the determination" to make them work.

Reporters questioning him were Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine and Donald Finley of United Press International.

DESPITE "breadline unemployment" that has nearly doubled the jobless rolls during Pres. Nixon's 2.5 years in office, his Administration still fails to move on job-creation and badly-needed economic spurs, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger, center, declared on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Tom Joyce, left, of Newsweek magazine and Donald Finley of United Press International.

South Dakota Names Iowan To Labor Post

Pierre, S.D. — South Dakota reached into neighboring Iowa for the state's first Commissioner of Labor-Management Relations, the head of a new department established with strong union support by the legislature.

A five-member, labor-management relations board selected Henry E. Carter of Des Moines, Ia., for the new post. Carter will also serve as the state's industrial commissioner.

South Dakota AFL-CIO Pres. Cliff W. Shrader said the state's trade union movement has long sought establishment of a State Dept. of Labor and he termed the new agency "a start in the right direction." Nearly every other state, he noted, has a labor department.

Carter is a former Machinists business agent, who served as a member of the Iowa Employment Security Commission from 1957 to 1969, including six years as commission chairman.

He then moved to the staff of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute as project director in Des Moines, and for the past year has been project director of the Des Moines area Outreach program, geared to preparing persons from minority groups for apprenticeships in the building trades.

Textile Workers Win Fieldcrest Elections

Columbus, Ga. — The Textile Workers Union of America won bargaining rights for 1,235 employes of Fieldcrest Mills' Muscogee plant in a National Labor Relations Board election. The vote was TWUA 620, no union 510.

The union also bargains for Fieldcrest workers in eight plants at Eden, N.C., and one each at Stokesdale, N.C., and Fieldale, Va.

Same Old Prescription

Peace Corps Seeks 100 Skilled Craftsmen

The Peace Corps is seeking 100 volunteers with construction skills for the Congo and other developing nations, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. S. Frank Raftery has announced.

"The developing nations urgently need help in training their people to work with their hands to build up their own countries and improve the standards of living of all," Raftery said, adding:

"Through the Peace Corps, a craftsman can pass on his skills to others, thereby making a practical contribution to a better world and demonstrating the dignity of labor."

Raftery, president of the Painters and a former Seabee in the South Pacific during World War II, is a member of the National Advisory Council of Peace Corps/ACTION. ACTION is the new volunteer agency which includes the Peace Corps, VISTA, Foster Grandparents and other federal programs.

A new Peace Corps program in the Congo has high priority, Raftery reported, with 50 construction and maintenance personnel needed by late fall. The skills sought include 10 machinists, 10 diesel mechanics, 10 gasoline mechanics, 10 heavy equipment operators, 5 welders and 5 auto electricians.

These volunteers would take part in a plan to create a network of training and operational centers which would rebuild roads, bridges and ferries throughout the Congo. A transportation system is seen as the key to development of the Congo, which is equal in area to the United States east of the Mississippi. The World Bank and the U.S. Agency for International Development are backing the project.

Swaziland and Sierra Leone are other African nations seeking skilled volunteers. Swaziland needs 14 skilled volunteers, most of them experienced mechanics; Sierra Leone needs people with experience as builder contractors and foremen to oversee projects and train foremen and workers.

Korea has requested four agricultural mechanics and four electricians to serve at rural vocational training centers. The United Nations' UNICEF and the International Labor Organization are cooperating in this pilot project to equip Korea's rural youth with skills badly needed in farming areas.

Micronesia, the Pacific area administered by the United States under a UN trusteeship, has asked for several volunteers with construction experience, along with engineers and architects.

The Peace Corps, which has 7,500 volunteers in 57 nations, provides language training, travel, housing, health care and a modest living allowance. A readjustment allowance of $75 a month is payable at the end of the 27-month tour; $200 a month is set aside for families in the few cases where they can be accommodated and the spouse can perform volunteer services.

Applications are due by the end of August. Applicants should write Ray Dolan, Labor Liaison, Peace Corps/ACTION, Washington, D.C. 20525, or call collect, (202) 382-2657.

Stove Union Mounts Organizing Campaign

Colorado Springs, Colo.—Delegates to the 35th triennial convention of the Stove, Furnace & Allied Appliance Workers approved an increase in monthly dues to $5.50 in three steps.

The current per capita tax of $3.75 will be raised to $4.50 next Oct. 1 and to $5, Oct. 1, 1972. It will reach the $5.50 level a year later.

Stove Workers Pres. James M. Roberts said the added revenue will be used to meet the increased cost of conducting the union's affairs.

Citing a decline in membership of between 1,500 and 2,000 unionists since the last convention, Roberts reported that an extensive internal and external organizing campaign will be launched to recoup the losses.

He attributed the membership decline primarily to the shutdown of a number of smaller firms absorbed by conglomerates which have shifted their manufacturing operations to other areas.

Layoffs brought on by the economic recession also contributed to the membership drop-off, he told the 81 delegates to the four-day convention.

Roberts was re-elected to his sixth consecutive three-year term as president. Also re-elected were Sec.-Treas. Edwin F. Kaiser and Executive Vice Pres. Fred C. Keller.

The convention voted to expand the union's executive board from nine to 11 members. Added to the board were George Pierson, fourth vice president, and international representatives Richard Bacher and E. Ray Sullivan.

Convention speakers included Pres. Maywood Boggs of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., Sec.-Treas. Edward P. Murphy of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., and Nicholas Zonarich, organizational director of the Industrial Union Dept.

AFL-CIO Bars Aid To Heublein Boycott

The AFL-CIO has not approved or endorsed nor is it encouraging or supporting a boycott of Heublein, Inc. products, Federation Pres. George Meany has informed all affiliates and state and local central bodies.

Meany specifically directed state and local bodies "to cease whatever support you may now be giving the product boycott."

The boycott was called by the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee which has called on AFL-CIO affiliates and central bodies for support.

Meany wrote that the Heublein firm for over 30 years has recognized and bargained with numerous local unions of AFL-CIO affiliates and that the "company and those unions presently enjoy numerous sound contractual relationships."

Convention Action:

Dues Increase Voted By Elevator Union

Miami Beach—Delegates to the 22nd convention of the Elevator Constructors voted to increase per capita payments to their international union, elected officers and laid the groundwork for collective bargaining in 1972.

The 250 convention delegates from the 17,000-member, Philadelphia-based union approved a per capita formula providing for increases in each of the five years before the next convention.

The adopted plan calls for annual increases beginning next Jan. 1 when the per capita payment will be raised from $3.15 to $3.90. It will go to $4.15 at the beginning of 1973, to $4.40 in 1974, to $4.65 in 1975, and to $4.90 in 1976.

Pres. R. Wayne Williams won re-election, defeating challenger R. M. Williams of Philadelphia by a 3-1 margin.

Sec.-Treas. Tom Fitzgerald and Edward R. Smith, assistant to the president, were re-elected without opposition. The eight incumbent vice presidents of the international also were returned to office.

Delegates also selected four men for the union's labor committee for 1972 bargaining: John E. Russell of Pittsburgh, Everett A. Treadway of Baltimore, Jerome Mullett of Detroit and Sam LaPaglia of Chicago.

A unanimously passed convention resolution gave strong support for the AFL-CIO's program for National Health Security.

The convention heard criticism of the Nixon Administration from a trio of speakers: AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Pres. Frank Bonadio of the federation's Building & Construction Trades Dept. and Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.).

The three speakers sounded a common theme: that the Administration has done nothing to hold prices at a stable level and has consciously contributed to growing increases in the national unemployment rate.

Meany urged delegates to gird for the presidential election, stressing that "we have got to see to it in 1972 that we get an Administration in Washington that is responsive to the problems of the little people of America; that is not just interested in the bankers and the great business corporations of this country."

He said that with 5.5 million American workers unemployed, with the cost of living rising by more than 6 percent, and with the President sitting on $12.5 million in appropriated public works funds, the most discouraging part of the economic picture is the Administration's "stubborn refusal" to change its "game plan."

"They are still sticking to a tight money plan; they're still sticking to a plan that has brought us interest rates the highest in the history of this country," Meany told the delegates.

"Can you imagine that we now have a situation where a man making $20,000 a year with a family cannot buy his own home? He can't buy a decent home because of the high cost of money, which is the interest rate, which is something the President of the United States could control with a snap of his finger," Meany said.

He cited COPE as a vehicle for change in 1972 and voiced confidence that the building trades would "continue to be in the forefront" of COPE activities.

Western Union Strike Yields Improved Pact

Other improvements include five weeks of vacation after 25 years of service, increased per diem allowances for travel on company business, improved vehicle allowance for motor messengers, better hospital benefits and a 25 percent increase in group life insurance coverage.

Hageman said union bargainers consider the agreement a "good" contract with "very important improvements." It is "not all we wanted," he said, but is better than the company proposed when the walkout started June 1. The company then offered a 6-percent increase this year, 10 percent next year, plus 4 percent if and when rate raises were granted.

The new terms, if approved, will be effective as of July 28, the day that UTW strikers returned to work.

CWA-represented members also walked out June 1 and will maintain picket lines until they win a settlement too, that union said.

Talks Open in September:

Dock Union Points To National Pact

Miami Beach—Delegates to the 42nd Longshoremen's Convention voiced staunch support for the union's bargaining goal of a nationwide contract that would bring them to approximately $7.50 an hour in wages and fringe benefits.

The convention ended here with a note of warning to the Nixon Administration to keep its hands off upcoming ILA talks with the American shipping industry as delegates spoke out against compulsory arbitration on wages or other issues.

Negotiations by the 129,000-member union and the industry are scheduled to get under way in September in Washington, D.C.

ILA Pres. Thomas Gleason had said at the beginning of the convention that the nationwide pact, covering union jurisdictions from Maine to Texas would be one of the top goals.

He warned delegates that new methods of cargo packaging, including containerization and loading from barges instead of docks, seriously threatened the dock workers.

"Its purpose is to move freight more efficiently and to cut shipping costs, notably labor," Gleason said.

He made it clear that the union has no intention of standing in the way of progress, but he said contract negotiations would be designed to insure that Longshoremen "share in the fruits of progress with higher wages and benefits."

Gleason also condemned Pres. Nixon's suspension of the 50-50 grain cargo rule which required that half of all grain being shipped to Communist countries be carried in American ships.

He called it an issue of plain job security.

Gleason was re-elected as were Sec.-Treas. Harry R. Hasselgren and 21 international vice presidents.

Delegates also elected a 22nd member to the international executive board. He is Norman Quigley of Montreal, an ILA Atlantic Coast District vice president.

A new vice president also was elected to the Atlantic Coast District, reflecting increased membership in the ports of Newark and Elizabeth, N.J. Lester Gardner, business agent for ILA Local 1233 in Newark was named to that post.

The convention adopted a resolution in strong support of the proposed National Health Security Act, and empowered their executive board to petition the President and Congress to declare the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s birthday a national holiday.

ILA members already have Dr. King's birthday as a paid holiday.

Harry Bridges, president of the unaffiliated International Longshoremen's & Warehousemen, which represents West Coast dockers, sounded a note of conciliation in remarks to the convention. Earlier in the year, Gleason had addressed the ILWU convention in Honolulu.

The ILWU currently is striking West Coast ports. And Gleason offered the ILWU "whatever help, whenever they ask for it, because whatever they get out there will just be more in our favor."

Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, called on delegates to form a coalition of white and black workers to defeat Pres. Nixon in 1972.

He said that white and black workers have been duped for years into fighting each other, but must unite to gain the political power necessary to eradicate social injustice.

New York Teacher Aide Program Flourishes with Union Cooperation

The pioneer New York program to expand the use of teacher's aides in the schools has not only helped relieve overburdened teachers in the classrooms, but has created valuable links in teacher-community relations.

Velma Hill, chairman of the paraprofessional division of the Teachers Local 2 of New York City, also notes that the New York system has upgraded minority group members to a point where they are making vital contributions to the schools and institutions where they work and, at the same time, helping themselves as well.

Mrs. Hill's observations on the maturing of the paraprofessional as a functioning part of the education system appear in the July issue of the Federationist, the AFL-CIO monthly magazine.

When the project began in 1967, it employed 1,500 aides who were to assist teachers by taking attendance, collecting lunch money and performing other tasks that would free the teacher to teach.

Since the aides were helpers and not professionals, they did not have to meet stringent educational requirements. They were paid $2,000 a year and received minimal sick leaves, vacations and health insurance. There was no job security.

Faced with all these inadequacies, the "new careers" concept was fast becoming a farce, Mrs. Hill recalls. Left on their own, the paraprofessionals would have become nothing more than a source of cheap labor.

This realization started the New York City local on one of the most difficult and, in the end, one of the most rewarding organizing campaigns ever conducted, the article reports.

It was difficult because many teachers distrusted the concept of paraprofessionals, and regarded them as possible "community spies."

It was also difficult because, Mrs. Hill notes "racial tensions were high and many people sought to keep the paraprofessionals out of the UFT."

After joining the union, the first step was to negotiate a satisfactory contract.

"The negotiations proved exceedingly difficult and moved slowly," says Mrs. Hill, "because the school board was convinced that the UFT did not have the backing of the paraprofessionals and would not risk calling a strike."

After a show of solidarity between the teachers and their aides, the board was finally prompted into action and a settlement was reached.

The new contract nearly tripled wages. It provided four weeks vacation, sick leave, health care, dental and optical care and grievance procedures. It also provided for a college program with release time during the school year and a four-week free summer college and high school equivalency program.

The program has also upgraded the duties of the paraprofessionals beyond menial chores. They now lead small group instruction, help with homework, act as tutors and help identify classroom problems. They also aid in communicating with parents, who are often their neighbors.

Mrs. Hill notes that the paraprofessionals also provide continuity of learning and authority when substitute teachers must be called upon.

Although the concept of paraprofessionals in education is now established, only the surface has been scratched in terms of its potential application in other fields such as health, Mrs. Hill suggests. She says that under pressure from the labor movement, whose social programs call for greater public investment in human resources, programs that provide better services for the American people can grow steadily.

As a final note, she points out that most of the workers in new paraprofessional programs will be minorities who are now among the poorest in society. "The fact that these workers will be making a vital contribution to schools, hospitals and other human welfare institutions, while they are helping themselves only magnifies the meaning of their struggle."

Ruling Denies License Of 'Unfair' Radio Station

A hearing examiner for the Federal Communications Commission ruled against renewing the license of a Puyallup, Wash., radio station after various civic groups protested that it failed to give equal time to opponents of its outspoken views. The station has until Aug. 20 to appeal.

The examiner denied a petition for renewal of Radio Station KAYE's broadcast license on the ground that it had violated the FCC's Fairness Doctrine and stated, "the issue is fairness and KAYE has not been fair.

"KAYE has given lip service to its espousal of the right to dissent. But that has been the extent of carrying out the obligations of reasonable opportunity for presentation of contrasting points of view," said Ernest Nash, hearing examiner for the FCC.

"Characteristically, commentators appearing on KAYE expressed their opinions in language which included a noticeable amount of invective and vilification. There was no programming to balance the strongly spoken views of KAYE with contrasting viewpoints," the hearing examiner said in his decision.

Thomas E. Harris, associate general counsel of the AFL-CIO, said that while the case did not involve organized labor, it has ramifications directly affecting federation affiliates plagued by broadcast stations presenting anti-union views.

"Under the Fairness Doctrine, unions have the right to present an answer to such views, and if they are denied that right, they have a legitimate complaint which they should file with the FCC," Harris said.

In the case of Radio Station KAYE, groups like the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith presented testimony before the FCC and submitted transcripts of broadcasts, as did the Puget Sound Committee for Good Broadcasting.

The station aimed most of its programming towards nearby Tacoma, attacking the municipal government, the Human Relations Commission and the city manager, personally.

"No record was kept by the station as to personal attacks, nor was there any case in which an individual or organization which had been attacked was given the opportunity for response required under the Commission's rules and policies," said Nash's ruling.

"The evidence is overwhelming that KAYE violated the Fairness Doctrine and failed to observe the requirements of the personal attack policies and rules."

Major Store to Delete Phony Labels on Suits

New York—Phony "union labels" are being removed from imported suits sold by Macy's, a major department store here, as a result of an agreement between the department store and the Clothing Workers.

The agreement was reached when Macy's was confronted with a show cause court order obtained by ACWA's New Haven, Conn., Local 125.

Macy's promised to put forth its "best efforts" to assure that suits with the bogus label would no longer be sold in any of its branches.

Macy's also agreed to direct the importer involved, Sportclothes Ltd. of Los Angeles, to remove the objectionable label, which resembles a standard American union label and bears the words "union made" and the letters "NFTWU."

The ACWA contended that the letters "NFTWU" do not represent any union, Japanese or otherwise. The local charged that the suits were improperly marked and in violation of the Connecticut Consumer Fraud Act.

A similar complaint, following the detection by the ACWA of bogus labels at Macy's in New York, has been filed by the ACWA with the Consumer Fraud Bureau of the Federal Trade Commission and the Customs Bureau of the Treasury Dept. These complaints are still pending.

Reaction to the intensive consumer education campaign being conducted by the ACWA has resulted in the addition of another name to the list of chain stores agreeing to sell only American made clothes.

Klein's department store in New York, in a joint statement with ACWA Vice Pres. Louis Hollander and ACWA Union Label Regional Director Jerry Landman, declared its intention not to "import any more men's and boys' clothing."

Commenting on the agreement Hollander declared that "industry as well as retailers should realize that imports are destroying the ability of the American worker to buy."

Klein's joins Korvettes and Bonwit-Teller as stores which have recently agreed to discontinue the sale of imported men's and boys' clothing.

Trimmed After Veto:

$500 Million Voted For Public Works

tent of the Administration's commitment to the program, however, will be more thoroughly tested in the appropriations request it submits for the funding of the program. The authorization bill merely sets a ceiling on the spending; the money must then be voted in a separate appropriations bill.

And the final test will be whether the Administration promptly allocates the funds voted by Congress —so that the job-creating projects can be quickly started.

In a related area, the House Appropriations Committee issued a sharp blast at the Nixon Administration's refusal to spend the full amount of public works funds Congress appropriated last year.

Congress had added $63.4 million to the President's budget to finance various water and power projects and the committee said it is "deeply concerned" at the Administration's refusal to use the money.

As a result, the report charged, the eventual cost of the program will be substantially higher and meanwhile the nation is losing $242 million a year in benefits that would have come from the projects.

This, it suggested, is not "good business."

Congressional leaders and the AFL-CIO have repeatedly called on the President to release more than $12 billion in funds that Congress voted but federal agencies have refused to spend.

In other congressional developments:

- Both the House and Senate moved towards a decision on legislation to enable the government to guarantee loans necessary for Lockheed Aircraft and other major employers to stay in business.

A minority of senators opposing the loan guarantee bill has sought to block a vote, forcing supporters to seek to muster the two-thirds majority required to break a filibuster. A 59-39 vote to limit debate on July 28 fell short of the needed two-thirds. But on the eve of a new cloture vote July 30, there were reports that a compromise was being worked out by both sides. The House was scheduled to take up the bill the same day.

- Attempts to increase funds for health programs met with mixed success when the House took up a multi-billion dollar appropriations bill that included the budget of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

The main effort, to add $230 million for seven health programs, failed on a recorded teller vote of 214-169. But then the House voted 236-153 to add $82.4 million in federal grants to states to finance vocational rehabilitation programs for handicapped persons.

- A House-Senate conference committee refused to include funds for U.S. dues to the International Labor Organization in the final version of a State Dept. appropriations bill.

The Senate had voted the money, but the House conferees led by Rep. John J. Rooney (D-N.Y.) prevailed. The statement on the final version declared: "The conferees have not the slightest intention of ever abandoning our membership in the ILO. We do not lose our voting rights until we are two years in arrears. The conferees recommend that no payment at all be made at this time pending further improvement in our position."

While the AFL-CIO has been critical of Communist bloc efforts to distort the goals of the ILO, Federation Pres. George Meany has urged that "the United States has an obligation to pay the money it owes to the ILO so long as it remains a member."

Survey Shows Wide Doubt on Nixon Policies

Most Americans doubt that the Nixon Administration is doing a good job of solving the problems of inflation and unemployment, according to a quarterly survey conducted by the University of Michigan's Survey Research Center.

Jay Schmiedeskamp, a university economist who directs the center, said in a Washington speech that only 14 percent of those responding to the survey believe the government is doing a "good job." The majority, 52 percent, rated the government's economic policy as only "fair."

Twenty-eight percent said the Administration is doing a "poor job."

"This is the major reason why consumers have continued to keep a tight rein on their purse strings," Schmiedeskamp said. "What the government does, or does not do, has a powerful influence on consumers' willingness to go into debt."

Although an "Index of Consumer Sentiment" based on the survey did rise during May, Schmiedeskamp believes that consumers are waiting to hear the message of "decisive action by the government, or substantial progress against unemployment and inflation . . . before a full recovery in consumer sentiment can be expected."

Public Health Hospitals Given Additional Funds

The House made it clear to the Nixon Administration that it wants all of the nation's Public Health Service hospitals and clinics kept open.

By an overwhelming voice vote, it added $14 million to the President's budget request for the facilities. Rep. Paul G. Rogers (D-Fla.) and Majority Leader Hale Boggs charged that the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare is already restricting admissions to some hospitals as the first step to closing them down—despite continued need for the facilities.

The added money restored the appropriation to last year's level.

Earlier, the Senate had passed a resolution urging continued operation and greater utilization of the Public Health Service facilities, which provide medical care for merchant seamen as well as serving their communities.

INDIAN OIL PAINTING produced by trainees at the Kicking Horse Job Corps camp in Montana was presented to Pres. S. Frank Raftery of the Painters to acknowledge the union's participation in the program. The Painters sponsor training projects at 29 Job Corps centers across the country. Inspecting the work are Raftery, Ralph J. Conroy, associate director of the Job Corps, and William Duval, director of education, apprenticeship and training for the Painters.

IUD Scores Labor Dept. Failure To Assure Worker Safety Role

Workers are being shut out from a role in the implementation of the new occupational safety act by Labor Dept. proposals that would allow states to dilute its effectiveness, the Industrial Union Dept. charged.

Pres. I. W. Abel, in a letter to Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson, said unionists "are genuinely worried" that certain Labor Dept. proposals "violate both the spirit and letter of the law."

"We are dismayed by the retrogressive nature" of the proposed procedures for regulating approval of state plans on the enforcement of the act, Abel stressed.

"Federal occupational safety and health legislation arose from the necessity to assure protections that the states—without exception—were not able to provide," he noted.

The heart of the legislation, Abel said, is the worker's right to participate in the development of policies, procedures and standards under the act, besides taking part in the enforcement process and the review and appeal of enforcement actions.

But the proposals for state implementation are lacking on seven specific guarantees of worker participation, Abel charged.

These proposals, he said, do not provide for:

- Worker representation in any body comparable to the National Advisory Committee on Occupational Safety & Health.
- Employes to observe the monitoring or measuring of exposure to toxic materials or harmful physical agents; nor do they provide for labels or posted warnings.
- Adequate protection for workers who file complaints so their names can be withheld from employers on request.
- Unqualified prohibition of advance notice of an inspection.
- Right for an employes' representative to accompany the inspector during the "walk-around."
- Written reports on inspections.
- Placing job safety and health responsibilities in agencies whose other functions don't conflict with the protection of workers.

By advancing proposals that do not contain these safeguards, Abel said, the Occupational Safety & Health Administration "is actually encouraging the states to deny workers rights mandated by the act."

Of particular concern to the IUD is the proposal that would ban the "walk-around" privileges of employes since labor fought hard to keep this right in the legislation. Congress, Abel pointed out, sustained this key point.

The only conclusion that can be derived from the proposed regulations, he said, "is that the Dept. of Labor would nullify the obvious intent of Congress. Our lawyers believe that this proposed action is legally untenable."

Abel urged Hodgson to reconsider the position taken by the Labor Dept., adding, "If these proposals prevail, much of what the labor movement fought for and believes it won will have been lost by administrative fiat."

The Labor Dept. issued the proposed regulations June 18.

OSHA reported that 45 states and the District of Columbia have reached agreements with the Labor Dept. as of July 12 to submit plans for assuming responsibility for enforcement of the job safety law.

Meanwhile, the Labor Dept. announced the signing of agreements with eight states for the implementation of the law in four hazardous industries: lumber and wood products, roofing and sheet metal, mobile home and transportation equipment, and meat and meat products.

The eight states are California, Florida, Illinois, New York, North Carolina, Oregon, Pennsylvania and Washington. They will share $886,320 for their services to OSHA.

Exports of Technology Held Peril to Economy

ernment's approach with that of other nations, noting:

- Most countries give a strong preference to their own manufacturers in government procurement.
- Capital controls are used by almost all nations, particularly for direct investment abroad.
- Some countries have set up barriers to the transfer of technology through patents, while the United States encourages such transfers except in very limited national security situations.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany recently cited the licensing of General Electric technology to Japan for production of highly advanced military and spaceship equipment. All of these features, Meany stressed, "were developed at the expense of the U.S. taxpayer."

The AFL-CIO testimony warned that "global managers of global corporations should not be decision-makers for the present and future policies of this nation. Foreign economic policy should be made by the United States government."

Multinational corporations "juggle their bookkeeping and their prices and their taxes," Biemiller stated. "Their export and import transactions are within the corporation, determined by the executives of the corporation—all for the benefit and profit of the corporation."

Biemiller emphasized that labor's position is not isolationism.

"Clearly no nation can or should try to stop all interchanges, nor build walls against the world."

But, he stressed, "no sensible nation can afford to ignore reality . . . in a practical world of nations, each of which is self-determinant of its national interest."

New Rail Pact Called 'Major Victory'

350,000 Steelworkers Win 'Most Successful' Contract

PRESIDENTS of two big unions headed negotiating teams that produced significant new contract settlements in the steel industry and on the railroads. Left, Pres. Charles Luna of the United Transportation Union joins Assistant Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr. in announcing UTU's first national contract with major railroads since its formation in 1969. Right, USWA Pres. I. W. Abel and steel industry spokesman R. Heath Larry report a contract settlement that headed off a scheduled strike of 350,000 Steelworkers.

3-Year Package Praised by Abel

By Eugene A. Kelly

More than 350,000 members of the Steelworkers began drawing benefits from new three-year contracts that USWA Pres. I. W. Abel hailed as the result of "one of the most successful, if not the most successful contract negotiations" in the union's history.

The agreements with nine big basic steel firms assure union members a 31 percent package of benefit improvements over the contract span and a vastly improved grievance and arbitration procedure.

Union negotiators extended a strike deadline by 24 hours to reach agreement without a strike. The terms were approved unanimously by a standing, shouting vote of 600 local union presidents who had telephoned the details to members back home.

The settlement came three hours before a scheduled shutdown of blast furnaces and steel mills of a group of producers headed by the United States Steel Corp. Their contracts were due to expire at midnight Aug. 1.

Union negotiators headed by Abel held out over four weeks of determined bargaining for improvements at least equal to those won this year in the aluminum and can industries, and also for working-condition language tailored to the specific needs of basic steel employes.

New contracts with the nine major producers call for general wage increases of 75 cents an hour over the three-year term, plus a

Public Jobs Plan Voted Full Funds

By David L. Perlman

Congress moved quickly to provide $1 billion to launch a public service employment program designed to put about 150,000 persons to work in jobs that cities, counties and states haven't been able to fill because of lack of funds.

The money bill contained the full amount authorized for the program during the current fiscal year. But the manner in which the Labor Dept. proposes to distribute the money brought sharp protests from congressmen who had led the fight for enactment of the legislation.

With Congress about to recess for a month-long vacation, how-

On Nation's Railroads:

Safeguards Gained On Working Rules

The United Transportation Union returned to work on 10 struck railroads with major gains in contract benefits and working conditions that provide important new protections for the UTU's 180,000 members in the industry.

The union called off a series of selective strikes that produced the first national agreement since the UTU was formed by the merger of four on-train unions on Jan. 1, 1969.

Settlement of the 18-month dispute over railroad work rules was a "major victory for collective bargaining and selective strikes," UTU Pres. Charles Luna told an Aug. 2 press conference at which the settlement was announced. He said the union had achieved an agreement "we are proud of, one that we can live with."

The new contract will be voted on within 21 days by UTU general chairmen and local union chairmen. It provides an orderly method for protecting members and settling disputes over work rules the railroads have insisted on changing or abolishing.

Exact language of the memorandum of agreement was not available, but the substance of one key protection for workers displaced as a result of work rules changes is a guarantee of a year's income with no cut in pay for every year of service. Makeup pay is provided for men transferred to lower-paying jobs along with payment of expenses or losses for those forced to take jobs in another state.

The work rules were the central issue in the dispute that brought on the strikes. Wage provisions had

Profits Show Sharp Rise For Quarter

Corporate after-tax profits jumped an average of 10.3 percent in the second quarter of the year over the similar 1970 period for the highest three-month increase since the third quarter of 1968, the Wall Street Journal reported.

The newspaper said that the upturn in corporate profits which began in the first three months of the year has accelerated, but that prospects for continuing improvement are uncertain.

The Journal based its findings on tabulations of the second-quarter earnings of 597 companies, plus

Job 'Disaster' Aid Bill Clears Senate Panel

Areas hit by extreme unemployment would be eligible for special federal assistance under an Economic Disaster Relief bill approved by the Senate Public Works Committee.

The legislation was originally introduced by Senators Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) and Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.), and its concept had been spelled out in an AFL-CIO Executive Council statement in May that declared:

"Legislation is needed to provide immediate assistance to communities affected by high unemployment, similar to the federal aid that is provided areas hit by natural disasters."

The committee bill authorizes the President to designate an economic disaster area at the request of the governor of the state affected. A federal official would be named to coordinate government relief programs in the area.

Individuals hit by economic disaster would be eligible for housing assistance, mortgage and rental payments, food coupons and surplus commodities.

The bill also provides:

- Extension of unemployment benefits.
- Relocation assistance for those who have job opportunities in other areas.

Lockheed Loan Action Tied to Unemployment

Congress approved a federal loan guarantee designed to save the Lockheed Aircraft Corp. from bankruptcy and preserve the jobs of tens of thousands of its workers and employes of its subcontractors.

The legislation had the support of both the AFL-CIO and the Administration, but the votes in both the House and Senate were hairsbreadth close. Both party lineups and normal liberal-conservative divisions were splintered on the issue.

In the end, the argument prevailed that a recession-mired economy cannot afford to dump another large group of workers on the unemployment rolls.

The House voted 192-189 to pass the bill. (House rollcall on Page 6.)

And the Senate, under an agreement that ended a filibuster by foes of loan guarantee legislation, approved the House-passed measure intact by a 49-48 vote, thus clearing it for the President's signature. (Senate rollcall on Page 7.)

Both the House and Senate limited the legislation to a federal guarantee of payment for a $250 million bank loan to Lockheed. The money would be lent by private banks and the federal government would be obligated only if Lockheed was unable to pay back the loan from the sales of its Tristar

CONVENTION GAVEL is presented to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as a memento of his 50 years of participation in Plumbers & Pipe Fitters conventions by Pres. Martin J. Ward and Pres. Emeritus Peter T. Schoemann. Meany first attended a convention of the union as a delegate in 1921. He was a delegate to this year's convention from New York City Local 2, his home local.

Schoemann Is Lauded For Service to Union

Denver, Colo.—Peter T. Schoemann heard the regard his union holds for him expressed in one great voice as delegates to the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters convention roared approval of a resolution designating him as president emeritus.

And he returned the accolades, declaring: "The United Association has been very good to Pete Schoemann. . . . You can rest assured that in the years I hope that I am going to survive, I shall continue to operate in behalf of this great United Association."

The resolution also made Schoemann a voting delegate to all future conventions and he was presented with an engraved copy of the convention's action.

Schoemann's half century of service to the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters drew the high praise of his successor, Martin J. Ward, who pledged that he will continue to seek the advice and counsel of "Pete."

Schoemann remains an AFL-CIO vice president—a post he has held since 1957—and Ward said he would see to it that the president emeritus would be a delegate to conventions of the federation and its Building & Construction Trades Dept.

He has served as a vice president of the Building Trades since 1955. He is chairman of the AFL-CIO's Committee on Education and a member of its Committee on Economic Policy.

Schoemann began his trade union career as a rank-and-file member of Local 75 in Milwaukee, his native city, and served his home local in almost every capacity. He was recording secretary of the local for 15 years, and its business agent for three.

He was president of the Milwaukee Building Trades for more than 20 years—until his election as assistant to the president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters in December 1952.

Two months later, when Pres. Martin P. Durkin was given a leave of absence to serve as Secretary of Labor in the Eisenhower cabinet, Schoemann was chosen as acting president.

And following Durkin's death in 1955, he was chosen president by the international executive board. He was unanimously re-elected at the union's 27th convention in 1956 and at succeeding conventions.

Throughout his trade union career, Schoemann served not only organized labor, but his country and community as well.

In 1947, Pres. Truman appointed him as adviser to the U.S. delegation to the International Labor Organization parley in Geneva. He was given a similar appointment in 1962 by Pres. Kennedy.

Prior to moving to Washington, D.C., he was a member and twice president of the Milwaukee Board of School Directors. He served on the Wisconsin State Board for Vocational Education for 18 years, and as its president for seven years.

AFGE Chosen By Employes Of 4 Agencies

The American Federation of Government Employes has won bargaining rights for more than 5,000 employes in four agencies.

The largest unit, with 3,100 eligible employes, was at the headquarters of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development.

AFGE won the election by a nearly 4-1 margin, polling 828 votes to 214 for no union and 78 for the unaffiliated National Federation of Federal Employes.

A unit of 308 Home Loan Bank Board employes chose AFGE by a vote of 10-1.

Earlier, the union won bargaining rights for employes in the Office of Economic Opportunity who voted 610-112 for exclusive AFGE representation. Workers in five cities took part in the vote. The union also swept a national election at the Federal Railroad Administration by a 133-15 vote.

Organizing Goal Stressed:

Ward Maps Five-Year Plan For Plumbers & Pipe Fitters

By Tom Castor

Denver, Colo.—More than 3,000 delegates to the 30th convention of the United Association of Plumbers & Pipe Fitters united behind newly elected Pres. Martin J. Ward as he outlined his program to streamline the union's structure to meet the challenges of the next five years.

The new president of the 320,000-member union placed special emphasis on the need to employ rank-and-file members as a source of manpower for increased organizing efforts, with the international reimbursing locals for wages and expenses.

In the field of residential work and in the metal trades section of the industry, he said, "there are scores of thousands of workers who clearly should be members.

"Enlisting them in our ranks will improve our collective bargaining position and increase our influence in our communities."

Ward, 52, who was unanimously elected to head the 91-year-old craft union, had been acting president since last June when Pres. Peter T. Schoemann took an extended leave of absence.

A native of Chicago, he entered the industry as an apprentice pipe fitter in 1937 and was a journeyman by 1942. After World War II service, he was named business representative of Local 597 in Chicago and succeeded to the post of business manager in 1952.

In 1958, he was elected assistant to the secretary-treasurer by the international executive board and was unanimously elected to that post by the next convention in 1961. He was elected secretary-treasurer in 1966, and in 1969, was named assistant to Schoemann.

Ward's entire slate of officers was returned to their posts by acclamation, including Sec.-Treas. William T. Dodd; Eugene W. Bradshaw, assistant to the president; Owen P. Kelly, assistant to the secretary-treasurer, and Joseph A. Walsh, executive vice president, plus six vice presidents and 24 elected international representatives.

Besides organizing, Ward listed other priorities for revamping the international's structure.

He told delegates that all matters pertaining to jurisdiction would be consolidated in one department and that it would be given additional staff.

He noted that eight new international representatives are needed in the field, and that additional personnel are needed to cope with the Nixon Administration's wage-stabilization policies.

Ward said steps already have been taken to revitalize the international's research department, which he said will devote more attention to legislative matters and to the task of encouraging more active support of COPE by all local unions.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany—a delegate from his home local in New York—installed the officers and marked his 50th year of participation in the union's conventions by also urging support of COPE as a vehicle for getting rid of the present Administration.

"The number one problem that is facing the American people today is the national administration in Washington," he told fellow delegates.

"Pres. Nixon says 1972 is going to be a good year," Meany said. "COPE, I think, is going to make that prediction come true—a good year for the people of America."

The delegates were out of their seats applauding after Meany told them, "I'm sure that this great union . . . under the leadership of Marty Ward and those associated with him, are going to play their part in this overall AFL-CIO effort."

"The COPE organization has done a better job each year for each of the last 16 years, and it's going to do a better job in 1972 than it did in 1970. That machinery is going to be used," he vowed.

Meany charged the Administration with "stupid and stubborn adherence to an economic policy that has failed," and said, "we have in Washington today the worst economic mess since the Hoover depression of 1930."

He declared that organized labor has the will, the desire and the militancy necessary to "carry this fight to those that are leading us down the road to ruin."

Previously, Ward had noted that the Nixon Administration's tight-money policy has aggravated the American housing crisis and that members of the union are affected in a way that most of their neighbors aren't.

"When the cost of money and land discourages homebuilding, United Association members not only cannot buy a house, they lose jobs."

The convention adopted a recommendation of its committee on laws, providing that by the union's next convention in 1976, no one 65 or older will be eligible to run for an international office. The constitutional change also affects officers elected at this convention if they are 70 or older, or if they reach age 70 in the next five years. All those elected who are 70 or older must retire by Jan. 1, 1973, and the others must retire by Dec. 31 of the year they reach the age of 70.

Jail Terms for Teachers Stayed, High Court Asked to Hear Case

The Newark Teachers Union won a preliminary round in its legal battle against harsh penalties for public school strikers when Supreme Court Justice William J. Brennan granted a stay of heavy fines and prison sentences imposed by a state court on peacefully picketing teachers.

The teachers were preparing to return from summer school and vacation to surrender to New Jersey jail officials Aug. 2 when Brennan postponed execution of sentences. He gave the union's attorneys until Aug. 15 to file a petition for a hearing by the Supreme Court on the union's appeal from sentences on contempt of court charges.

An order for such a hearing requires the consent of four Supreme Court justices.

Attorney Paul Giblin, counsel for Newark Teachers Local 481, said the case "presents substantial constitutional questions which I feel the court will want to hear."

The AFL-CIO joined Local 481 and its parent American Federation of Teachers in asking for the stay of sentence. They acted on behalf of 184 union members, and two non-strikers who were found guilty of picketing in 1970 in violation of an injunction secured by the Newark Board of Education before the strike started.

The case came before Brennan as Circuit Justice for federal appeals courts in New Jersey and other states.

The AFL-CIO's "friend of the court" brief was submitted by Gen. Counsel J. Albert Woll, Robert C. Mayer, Laurence Gold and Thomas E. Harris, associate general counsel.

The New Jersey Supreme Court a month ago denied review of the state Superior Court's action finding the strikers and Local 481 guilty of "criminal contempt of court for violation of a labor injunction" and sentencing the teachers to jail terms ranging from 10 days in most instances to three months for some of the union officers. Judge Samuel Alcorn also levied fines of $200 and up on the teachers and a fine of $40,000 on the union and ordered the fines withheld from the teachers' pay.

The AFL-CIO brief said the case "involves the largest number of jail sentences imposed in a labor dispute" in decades. It added:

"The unions of this country and their members are naturally concerned over this retrogression to government by injunction, which may have a widespread chilling effect on the organization and operation of unions, particularly in the field of public employment."

The federation faulted the original court injunction on two grounds—it interfered with the rights of free speech and assembly protected by the First Amendment and it was issued on short notice, without giving the union or the teachers the right to be heard.

The facts show that school officials "had two weeks' notice of the threatened strike" and that their one-party court proceeding was "a matter of preference, not of last-minute necessity," the AFL-CIO said.

Local 481 said in its own brief "this is the first occasion where there have been presented to this court the constitutional questions involved in the mass jailing of rank-and-file members of a union and their supporters for peaceful conduct, claimed to be in violation of an ex parte injunction of remarkably broad and speech-interdicting scope and issued in a proceeding in which they were not even parties."

"Not since the days of the Danbury Hatters case [1908] has any court in this land adopted the technique of jailing individual members of a union for the concerted peaceful activity of the union," the Newark local said. "In this posture the New Jersey Supreme Court stands alone. . . . Other jurisdictions, while prohibiting public employe strikes to one degree or another, all refrain from using the awesome contempt power to jail peaceful rank-and-file strikers."

'Most Successful' Contract:

Steelworkers Score Gains for 350,000

cost-of-living bonus that guarantees no less than 25 cents an hour for a total of at least $1.

The agreements also contain machinery to break the usual pileup of employe grievances through a speeded-up process aimed at producing an arbitration decision no later than three weeks after submission.

Union and management agreed to set up joint advisory committees on productivity at each plant to "achieve uninterrupted operations in the plant, promote the use of domestic steel, achieve the desired prosperity and progress of the company and its employes, and review matters of special concern."

The new pacts also raise premium pay for Sunday work from 25 percent of regular pay to 50 percent, add one more paid holiday, provide vacation pay bonuses of $40 to $50 a week in non-summer seasons, and improve pensions, life insurance, medical care coverage, sick and accident benefits, supplemental unemployment benefits and apprenticeship training.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson praised the negotiators for "a remarkable demonstration of leadership" in averting a strike. But later, when U.S. Steel and other big firms announced new prices rises of 8 percent on top of earlier increases, a White House spokesman said Pres. Nixon was surprised and displeased at the action as "not in the industry's long-term interests."

The Steelworkers issued a summary of contract changes that took effect Aug. 1.

Wage increases start with a 50-cent general increase this year, plus a half-cent increment between job classes. Another 12.5 cents is added to wages next year, and at the same time the cost-of-living bonus takes effect. A third general increase of 12.5 cents is effective Aug. 1, 1973. By May 1, 1974, the added cost-of-living benefits will be at least 25 cents an hour.

The guarantee in the cost-of-living clause makes it certain, the union said, that by the end of the agreement, employes will be receiving at least 25 cents in living-cost allowances on top of the wage increases. There is no maximum, it said, on how high the escalator can go.

The effect of the increases is that the lowest-paid job in any plant will be improved at the rate of at least $1 an hour, plus any cost-of-living increase yielding more than 12.5 cents an hour in 1972 or 1973 to match rising prices of consumer goods.

The initial general increase of 50 cents an hour effective this year will be applied to the rates on which incentive pay is calculated.

Starting next Aug. 1, the minimum pension benefit will be raised from the current benefit—$6.50 per year of service for a maximum of 35 years—to $8 per month for each of the first 15 years of employment, $9 for each of the next 15 years, and $10 for each year of service over 30, with no limit on the number of years which may be counted.

The old agreement provided pension benefits ranging from $97.50 a month after 15 years to $227.50 a month after 40 years. The new benefits will range from $120 a month to $405.

Other pension plan changes improve disability pensions, deferred vested pensions, surviving spouse's benefits, and other formulas covered by contract.

The cash vacation bonus, formerly $30 a week, was revised to provide $40 a week for vacations taken in April, May, September and October, and $50 a week for February, March, November, and nonholiday weeks before Christmas and after New Year's Day.

Employes of the nine major companies who retired on pension before July 31, 1971, except on deferred vested pensions, will have their benefit increased by $15 a month next Aug. 1.

Maximum SUB benefits were increased $30 a week as of Aug. 1, 1971.

In the area of grievance procedure, major changes were agreed to "for the purpose of streamlining and speeding up the processing and resolution" of employe grievances. These provide that the first and second steps of the grievance procedure will be oral steps; the grievance committee or chairman is responsible for handling grievances at the third step, and the USWA staff representative is responsible for grievance handling at the fourth step. The responsibilities of company representatives were similarly defined.

An expedited arbitration procedure, to be adopted by both union and management at each plant, will "enable the parties to obtain an arbitrator's decision within approximately three weeks following receipt" of the complaint of contract infraction.

Three new provisions were added to the contracting-out clauses of the new agreements. They provide for notice to the union committee, a full-scale discussion before any final decision is made to let out contracts on unit work, and an investigation by high-level union and management officials in cases of disagreements.

The contract provides for a study to "determine the best way" to apply an average of 10 cents an hour additional to all office and technical employes in steel producing plants and iron ore mine operations.

Insurance benefits include an immediate increase in life insurance coverage before retirement to a minimum of $8,000 and a maximum of $10,500. The basic program of medical care insurance is changed to cover physicians' charges for emergency treatment, abortions and sterilization procedures including vasectomies, and raises in the maximum duration of hospital benefits. Also raised was the maximum benefit for major medical care.

64 Fire Fighters Killed in 6 Months

Deaths of fire fighters while on active duty reached a record high of 64 in the first six months of 1971, Pres. William H. McClennan of the AFL-CIO Fire Fighters reported.

The "grim figures" confirm that fire fighting is the most hazardous occupation in this nation and "is becoming more dangerous each year," McClennan said.

Total deaths in 1969 were 104, and for 1970 the number was 114 or more, according to preliminary figures.

The union noted that deaths and injuries are increasing "just when many municipalities want to cut back on fire protection." This kind of "false economy" will be countered by the union wherever possible, McClennan said

THE AYES HAVE IT as members of a Steelworkers local union in Homestead, Pa., signal their reactions to a telephone report of a contract settlement from their local union president in Washington. News of the USWA settlement with nine major steel firms came a few hours before a midnight strike deadline.

Copper Pact Reached with Phelps Dodge

Tucson—Unions representing 35,000 copper workers on strike for better contracts since July 1 reported one settlement and two new walkouts in scattered locations.

An 11-union coalition came to terms with the Phelps Dodge Mining Co. for 6,400 workers at three Arizona locations, but the same company prolonged a settlement at the El Paso refinery where 538 Steelworkers are still looking for an agreement.

Phelps Dodge was the second Big Four copper firm to reach agreement at some locations. The other was Kennecott Copper Corp., which settled in Arizona, Nevada and Utah but still has not reached agreement for 1,000 New Mexico workers because of a legal snarl.

Settlement terms at Phelps Dodge follow a pattern previously agreed to by Kennecott, Miami and Magma copper companies and approved by the 26-union Nonferrous Industry Conference at Salt Lake City July 24. The pattern provides wage hikes of at least 75 cents an hour over three years, a cost-of-living escalator clause and other gains.

Only one of the eight companies involved in the coordinated strikes has settled fully with all the unions on contract issues. A major stumbling block is management insistence on restrictive work rules, the unions said.

Magma Copper Co. is back in operation at San Manuel and Superior, Ariz. Anaconda Copper Co. terms have not been accepted by 6,500 strikers in Montana, and unresolved local issues still prevent a settlement with the Inspiration Mining Co. in Miami, Ariz. No meetings have yet been scheduled with American Smelting & Refining Co. New strikes started Aug. 1 at Anaconda's Twin Buttes mine here and at the White Pines, Mich., Copper Co. mills employing 2,400 Steelworkers.

Strike Pressure Cracks Deadlock on Rail Rules

been agreed upon in earlier stages of bargaining.

The agreement includes wage increases totaling 42 percent compounded over the 42-month period of the contract. It also calls for the return of strikers to their jobs without prejudice, improved vacations and holidays, more expense money for away-from-home crewmen, and new machinery for voluntary arbitration of unresolved disputes over wages or work rules.

UTU leaders on July 16 began calling the first of 10 selective strikes on individual railroads under a precedent-setting court ruling won by the union from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia and left undisturbed by the Supreme Court.

The decision to strike a few railroads at a time avoided congressional intervention that has blocked nationwide railroad strikes in recent years. But it also maintained the pressure on all the carriers for a national agreement. That pressure, plus a face-to-face meeting at the Labor Dept. between top union officials and three railroad presidents, produced the settlement that ended the strikes.

Union and management negotiators agreed on work rules changes that gave the railroads some of the revisions they wanted while spelling out protective conditions for crewmen subject to layoff or transfer.

One major provision covers union members who lost pay or were laid off when non-struck railroads unilaterally imposed their own work rules on thousands of railroad employes—rules that the union had rejected months ago. This will permit any aggrieved UTU member to file a formal complaint under grievance procedures of the new contract.

Other major changes in rules permit extension of train runs beyond the existing 100-mile limits that measure a day's pay, extension of switching limits for freight cargoes, and dovetailing of some road and yard duties by members of a train crew.

Under the settlement, changes in interdivisional runs must be negotiated road by road. The new agreement calls for establishment, at union and management expense, of a national task force to draft guidelines. These would be referred to local task forces for translation into specific terms on a run-by-run basis. Task forces would include one union representative, a management member and a neutral chairman whose decisions in disputes would be final and binding.

Meal expenses for away-from-home crewmen will be raised under the agreement from the present $1.50 a day to $2, plus an extra $2 if a layover extends beyond eight hours.

Negotiations on the final strike-ending agreement were held at the Labor Dept. with Assistant Labor Sec. William J. Usery, Jr., assisting the parties.

Profits Show Sharp Rise For Quarter

interviews with corporate officers in key industries.

The automotive industry helped push the second-quarter figures upward, reporting $858,659,000 in after-tax earnings, up 26.5 percent over the same period last year when earnings were $678,879,000.

Profits for General Motors were up 20 percent and those of Ford rose 19 percent. Chrysler's April-through-June earnings were triple those for the same period last year.

The nation's airlines and aircraft makers, however, were writing their second-quarter figures with red ink. Earnings for the aircraft manufacturers surveyed were down 30.5 percent, and the airlines showed the biggest percentage drop—37.9 percent under last year.

The steel industry's second-quarter earnings actually benefited from the threat of a strike as steel users built up huge stockpiles of strike-hedge inventories. Steel manufacturers reported after-tax earnings up 66.4 percent over the second quarter of last year.

Railroads showed a 36 percent gain and rubber industry profits were up 58.3 percent, according to the Journal's survey.

Goodyear Tire & Rubber contributed significantly to this increase with earnings jumping to $48.2 million from $24.3 million in last year's second quarter when a number of plants were closed during a strike.

Realism, Not Isolationism

THE AFL-CIO believes that any examination of international relationships must recognize that the issue is not solely the balance of payments or even the balance of trade, but it is the total impact on the total economy of investments, patents, licenses and other joint ventures by multinational corporations.

Clearly, no nation can or should try to stop all interchanges, nor build walls against the world, nor live in isolation. But no sensible nation can afford to ignore reality and live in a world of theory.

We recognize the need to encourage research, science, and technology. But we also believe that the United States government should not spend the taxpayers' dollars to export the taxpayers' jobs. That's self-defeating.

The practical realities of today are that other governments encourage transfer of production, technology and jobs into their countries, and discourage the transfer of production, technology and jobs out of their countries.

THE AFL-CIO has repeatedly called attention to the problems created by the emergence in the modern world of so-called multinational or international corporations. These are often American-based companies with plants, sales agencies and other facilities in as many as 100 countries around the world.

The multinational firms can juggle their bookkeeping and their prices and their taxes. Their export and import transactions are within the corporation, determined by the executives of the corporation—all for the benefit and profit of the corporation. This is not foreign trade. Surely it is not foreign competition.

This phenomenon is far different from the development of the corporation here in America during the last 100 years. The multinational is not simply an American company moving to a new locality where the same laws apply and where it is still within the jurisdiction of the Congress and the government of the United States. This is a runaway corporation, going far beyond our borders. This is a runaway to a country with different laws, different institutions and different labor and social standards.

BACK IN THE United States, expansion of large national corporations has been tempered to a degree by government regulations, standards and controls. The multinational global operations are beyond the reach of present U.S. laws and the laws of any single nation.

It is clear that no automatic irresistible force, but direct policies of governments around the world are the important factor in seeing to it that nations have fully employed and productive and diversified economies. Certainly the government of the United States, not the government of a global corporation, should be the determining force of what will best serve the interests of all Americans.

This is a problem for all Americans, because the loss of our productive base and the loss of our industrial employment will most certainly be followed by job losses in all segments of the economy. And with those losses will go much of the American standard of living, American technology, American science, and American services.

This is not isolationism. It is merely realism in a practical world of nations, each of which is self-determinant of its national interest.

Wilson's 'Stunting' on Market Threatens Labor Party Unity

By John P. Roche

HAROLD WILSON, a distinguished American diplomat once observed with some bitterness, "could sleep on a pretzel." The occasion was the Middle East crisis in 1967 when Wilson, then British Prime Minister, put on a spectacular performance of working both sides of the street.

Initially, when the Egyptians blockaded the Strait of Tiran, Wilson rose in the House of Commons breathing fire, and announced that Her Majesty's Government would fulfill its commitment to Israel under the 1957 agreement. Concretely this meant that armed force would be used if necessary to guarantee freedom of navigation.

Cheered by this support, Pres. Johnson began assembling a multilateral fleet to force the blockade—the "Red Sea Regatta" we called it—and it soon became apparent that Wilson was firmly and vigorously in favor of all steps short of action. Since the British had the only naval assets in the area—the carrier "Hermes," several frigates, and a number of mine-sweepers were positioned in Aden—their cooperation was essential.

Days went by, the Israelis became more and more impatient, but Wilson devoted himself to getting signatures on a petition denouncing the Egyptian action. Israel understandably took a dim view of this futile exercise and solved the problem in its own way.

For years Wilson has wriggled his way along in this fashion; "Following Harold," one of his Labor colleagues told me, "would give a snake a backache." An extremely intelligent man, he has always managed to survive disasters that would have brought down most politicians. Although he is a professional economist and was clearly the author of the Labor Government's economic policies, when his first initiative aborted, he neatly ducked the blame.

In effect, he told the nation: "I cannot tell a lie: Jim Callaghan (then Chancellor of the Exchequer) did it." And he moved Callaghan to the Home Office. When an effort to regulate wildcat strikes ran into strong union opposition, he benignly threw Barbara Castle, the responsible minister, off the back of the sled.

Then last year he tripped. Apparently under the illusion that Britain has a presidential system of government, he turned the general election into a TV competition between himself and Conservative leader Edward Heath. But Britain does not have a presidential system and the Conservatives won.

Wilson still puffed his pipe and exuded confidence, but for the first time he was tagged as a loser, with all the vulnerability that this tag implies. But the ineptness of the Conservative Government permitted Wilson, as Leader of the Opposition, to stay on the high wire—he is a master of parliamentary in-fighting.

Then suddenly trouble began. Wilson as Prime Minister had committed Britain in principle to entering the Common Market. Conservative Prime Minister Heath, however, was left to make the deal with the European Economic Community. He has now presented the package to Parliament and announced that the decisive vote will be taken in October.

Wilson, noting that public opinion polls now show about two-thirds of the British opposed to joining and also indicate that Labor is about 20 points ahead of the Tories in popularity, pulled one of his typical stunts. Without repudiating his agreement in principle with British affiliation, he assaulted Heath for not getting better terms from the EEC.

A NUMBER OF LEADING Laborites have uneasily followed Wilson's labyrinthine course in the interest of party unity, but this was simply too much. It brought out Roy Jenkins, Wilson's last Chancellor of the Exchequer, the deputy leader of the opposition and a man of implacable integrity, with a flat statement that the Labor Government would have accepted the current package. And behind Jenkins are such formidable men as former Sec. of State for Defense Denis Healey, Anthony Crosland, and a number of other top-drawer party figures.

Wilson must have realized that this time he had gone too far. Indeed, quite uncharacteristically, he blew his cool, invited his opponents to quit the Shadow Cabinet, and virtually accused them of personal dishonesty.

This is rough stuff—Jenkins and his friends are not men to be trifled with—and before the October decision the Labor Party may be in total disarray and Wilson an active candidate for the House of Lords.

As Murphy's Law puts it, "If you play too hard with anything, it will break."

'The AFL-CIO Is Right':

Wall Street Journal Supports Labor's Revenue-Sharing View

The following editorial, titled "The AFL-CIO Is Right," appeared in the July 29, 1971, edition of The Wall Street Journal.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S revenue-sharing proposal hasn't been getting anywhere in Congress, and the AFL-CIO hasn't improved its prospects. In a number of ways the federation's objections make a great deal of sense.

In congressional testimony Andrew J. Biemiller, the AFL-CIO's legislative director, stressed that revenue sharing "will not create money where none now exists." Obvious as that may seem, some state and local officials appear to regard the plan as a newly discovered bonanza.

In one way or another the federal government has been sharing its revenues with states and localities since the republic was founded, and in recent years the outflow from Washington has grown rapidly. Between 1948 and 1970 federal aid to lower levels of government spiraled upward from $2 billion a year to $24 billion.

The rapid acceleration of aid has built a massive bureaucracy, as federal officials have sought to oversee minute details of programs executed in jurisdictions throughout the land. Often two or more programs are aimed at the same objective, and state and local officials need guidebooks to lead them to funds.

Although Mr. Biemiller claims this setup "has served the nation well," he sees most of the problems. He calls for a "careful review" of existing grant programs, "consolidating overlapping grants, increasing their efficiency, examining matching funds formulas, and making it easier for state and local officials to be aware of and obtain the federal aids available to them."

That's good, as far as it goes. But Mr. Biemiller would leave the whole grant system under direct federal supervision, down to the tiniest detail. If he has any doubts about the ability of federal officials to cope with such responsibilities, they are overridden by the AFL-CIO's deep distrust of state and local governments.

Sensibly enough, the federation urges improvement of state-local government. "A study of consolidation of inefficient local government units . . . should be pursued," says Mr. Biemiller. "Many of the 81,000 local spending and taxing units of government present an obstacle to using public funds efficiently."

Numerous state and local governments have been reformed; many school districts, for instance, have long since disappeared through consolidation. Unquestionably more reform is needed, but the AFL-CIO apparently prefers that states and localities handle relatively less of the governmental workload, no matter how much they upgrade themselves.

As Mr. Biemiller says, "many public needs involve nationwide issues such as education." This may justify federal funding of programs in such areas, but the educational problems of New York City are simply not the same as those of Newport, Ore. It's hard to believe that federal officials could always handle all the little local problems better than the local officials who have to live with them every day.

WHILE IT WOULD probably be unwise to cut all the strings on federal aid, a good case can be made for loosening them a bit. This could be done under the Administration's special revenue-sharing plan, or some variation of it. The special revenue-sharing programs proposed in the federal budget for fiscal 1972 would largely be conversions of existing grant systems, with restrictions lessened but not removed.

"Unconditional tax sharing," says Mr. Biemiller, "violates a major principle of good government—the authority to collect taxes should not be separated from the authority to determine how these revenues will be spent. Free money opens the door to waste and extravagance."

True; but another principle is that America is simply too large and diverse to be governed entirely from Washington. A growing proportion of power has drifted into federal hands, and that has at least something to do with the erosion of responsibility at state and local levels.

In the interest of efficient government, it's time to see whether both trends can't be reversed.

In Combatting Joblessness:

Government Urged to Expand Proven Manpower Programs

AN AFL-CIO manpower expert hailed the success of many established manpower programs and urged that they be expanded and improved to ease the growing pressures of shrinking job opportunities and mounting unemployment.

Many existing programs "have proven effective in servicing the needs of particular segments of the national community . . . and should not be rubbed out," declared Julius Rothman, president of the Human Resources Development Institute, on the network radio interview Labor News Conference. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System. HRDI, a private corporation created by the AFL-CIO, is rounding out its third year as the federation's manpower arm.

Rothman said that although HRDI's operations have paralleled a "remarkable rise in the nation's unemployment," it has helped place "thousands of disadvantaged men and women, most of them from minority groups," in training programs and jobs. He added that "for the first time in their lives," many of those placed were able to earn "decent wages that they could live on."

He said many of those aided by HRDI have completed their training and entered a job market which, because of high and rising unemployment, grows ever tighter. He renewed the call for more public service employment opportunities. "If the private sector can't place people in jobs . . . we have to find some job-creation mechanism," he said, and "public service employment is certainly one effective" method.

Rothman said the new Emergency Employment Act is "a step in the right direction." But, he added, the 150,000 public service jobs it provides fall far short of meeting the needs of a job market that now has more than five million workers looking for employment.

HE SAID the Job Corps is an "excellent program" that ought to be "continued and expanded." He scored the deep cuts made in the Job Corps during the early months of the Nixon Administration.

Turning to current and future HRDI efforts, Rothman said that in addition to continuing recruitment, training and placement efforts in the building trades and service industry, the institute is putting heavy emphasis on helping returning veterans find training or jobs. He pointed out that the current unemployment rate among veterans is much higher than among non-veterans.

Reporters questioning Rothman were James F. Welsh of the Washington Evening Star and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine.

THERE IS STILL opposition from lawyers and some sections of the insurance industry, but the concept of low-cost, no-fault auto insurance is gaining widespread acceptance.

The early champion of no-fault insurance was Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) who has conducted extensive hearings in the auto insurance field as chairman of the Senate Anti-Trust subcommittee.

Now we find that the Nixon Administration is endorsing the no-fault concept with Transportation Sec. John A. Volpe and Mrs. Virginia H. Knauer, special assistant to the President for consumer affairs, speaking out in support of it.

The gulf between the Nixon position and that of Hart and consumer groups is considerable.

Hart has introduced the Uniform Motor Vehicle Insurance Act which would establish a national no-fault system.

The Hart bill would allow any licensed driver in the nation to take out a no-fault auto insurance policy. It would guarantee any victim of an accident reimbursement for all expenses for medical treatment, physical rehabilitation or death benefits in the case of a fatal accident.

If the victim were forced out of work by the injuries, the policy would pay 85 percent of his monthly wages up to $1,000 for 30 months.

This general concept has the endorsement of the Nixon Administration—but only as state legislation, not national.

The existing system of auto insurance will serve the accident victim, the insuring public and society at large, Volpe told the American Bar Association recently.

He added that no-fault insurance "will substitute certainty for uncertainty."

Mrs. Knauer, in a recent speech to the Texas Association of Insurance Agents, said "history suggests that unless the industry takes rapid and responsible action to meet the legitimate objections in current automotive insurance practices, private insurance initiatives in the field will be threatened by federal intervention."

THUS, THE NIXON ADMINISTRATION, once again, is in the business of trying to spur the states into action under the threat of federal intervention. Just as with unemployment compensation, there is a serious question whether it will work.

To date, only a handful of states have adopted no-fault plans.

The Canadian Province of Saskatchewan actually started the no-fault approach in 1947. James Dutton, general manager of the Saskatchewan Insurance Office, reports that the program is popular. Prior to the plan, only 50 percent of the people involved in accidents were covered. Now everyone is. Premiums vary from $6 to $94 annually, sharply lower than previously.

The Massachusetts program has been in operation less than a full year, but the first quarter report shows that bodily injury claims dropped about 60 percent and the average claim was down 36 percent in amount.

Five other states—Delaware, Florida, Illinois, Oregon and South Dakota—have passed some form of no-fault insurance, but about one-half of the states have no action plans in the mill.

The state approach has both support and opposition from segments of the auto industry. Said the president of a major car rental company: "If each state adopts a separate form of no-fault automobile insurance a state of no-fault anarchy would exist. The obvious solution is federal regulation."

Even on the federal plan there are some glaring limitations. It is concerned solely with personal injury. Hart hopes that once this becomes law the principle could be extended to damages to vehicles and some other property.

Meanwhile, the battleground is no-fault insurance, federal versus state, and the hard-pressed automobile driver has a great deal at stake.

EXISTING MANPOWER programs that have proved their worth should be retained and expanded, not "rubbed out," Pres. Julius Rothman of the Human Resources Development Institute, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Frank Swoboda, left, of Business Week magazine, and James F. Welsh of the Washington Evening Star.

House Rollcall on Lockheed Jobs Bill

With thousands of jobs at stake, the AFL-CIO supported passage of the bill providing a federal guarantee for a $250 million loan to Lockheed Aircraft Corp.

The bill passed the House on July 31 by a 192-189 vote.

On labor's scoreboard, 102 Democrats and 90 Republicans cast Right votes (R) for the bill; the 129 Democrats and 60 Republicans who voted against it were Wrong (W).

Numerals show congressional districts; AL—at large; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent; NV—present but not voting.

New Programs Urged:

Oil Workers Score Nixon's 'Game Plan'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Oil Workers' Pres. A. F. Grospiron set the tone of the union's 1971 convention with strong criticism of the Nixon Administration's policies, and the 750 voting delegates promptly responded with a series of resolutions calling for sharp revisions of federal programs and priorities.

Grospiron attacked the Nixon "game plan" of halting inflation by increasing unemployment, branding it as "an old, old approach, and it is unfair, for it consists of punishing the poorest of the people for the greed and the mistakes made by moneyed people."

He urged immediate U.S. withdrawal from Indochina and review of military budgets, charging that "our members pay heavy taxes to maintain a vast military machine while serious domestic needs lack attention and financing."

"Of course, we need an adequate national defense," he said. "We need a foreign policy which will protect our country and which will make sense to the friendly countries of the world. But I am not convinced that this means the United States should involve itself in fighting all the grass fires that erupt in the world. We need a foreign policy based on getting people together."

He concluded his keynote address by calling on the union's members to correct the situation by becoming more active in politics.

Sen. Harold E. Hughes (D-Ia.), a major convention speaker lauded OCAW as a union in step with the late 20th Century.

"I have been impressed," he said, "by the fact that you have not been afflicted by the tunnel vision that all of us are prone to get at times. You look at your union's needs in the context of the nation's needs and not vice versa."

Hughes charged that the unemployment rate in the United States actually is 9.1 percent, not the approximately 6 percent stated by official government reports. And, he noted, it is substantially higher for Vietnam veterans, blacks and teen-agers. He cited the growing pessimism of Wall Street, the increasing inflation, the record national deficit and the negative balance of trade as further evidence of economic disorder.

"But with the economy in a mess, the war still dragging on, and the nation's social problems in an unprecedented state of neglect," said Hughes, "it must be admitted that the Administration's propaganda machine unperturbedly continues to claim victory with every defeat, success with every failure."

"And," said Hughes, "if periodic reports on the nation's economy embarrass the Administration, they have the ready answer—discontinue the reporting. In the wake of the report that the number of poverty-level families had increased in the past two years, the Nixon Administration summarily ordered an abolition of poverty—not by imaginative programs or adequate funding, but by the stroke of a pen. The word poverty has now been barred from government reports. The bloodless term 'low-income level' has been substituted."

Resolutions adopted by the convention delegates in the early sessions called for:

- Conversion of the economy to domestic improvements and a review of military spending.
- Guaranteed jobs for all Americans, with the government furnishing employment whenever private business fails to do so.
- Tax reform.
- Adoption of the National Health Security Act.
- Vigorous programs to protect the environment and enforce the new Occupational Safety & Health Act, along with continuing efforts in collective bargaining to improve job health and safety.

Labor Board Logs Record-High Year

Members of the National Labor Relations Board had the busiest 12 months in their history so far as unfair practice decisions went in Fiscal 1971, they reported.

The five-member board handed down 836 decisions on contested unfair practice charges brought by unions, employers and individuals —16 percent more than the 719 decisions rendered a year earlier.

The record was set in spite of a reduction in board staffs, NLRB Chairman Edward B. Miller said. In addition, the board issued 432 rulings in election cases—the same number as in Fiscal 1970.

'The Water's Great'

Labor Asks Job Aid For Older Workers

Federal programs to provide increased employment opportunities for middle-aged and older workers were urged by the AFL-CIO in testimony before a Senate Labor subcommittee on aging.

Bills endorsed by AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman would establish a community-service employment program for low-income or unemployed workers over 55 and a mid-career services program to meet the "unique" job problems encountered by many workers of 45 and older.

Older workers are hardest hit by unemployment, Seidman stressed. Beyond the age of 45, "joblessness increases, duration of unemployment rises sharply . . . and poverty increases."

Presently, he told the subcommittee, "there are more than a million individuals 45 and older without jobs, a 68 percent increase in unemployment for this group since January 1970." And the 171,000 persons aged 55 and over who have been unemployed for more than 14 weeks "is a shocking 195 percent increase" since January 1969.

Older Americans make up "the largest single poverty group in the nation," Seidman testified.

One part of the legislative package urged by the AFL-CIO would provide special training and retraining programs for workers who are handicapped by age in finding jobs but are too young for retirement.

Another part is aimed at helping workers of retirement age who lack adequate retirement income. They would be eligible for special public service job opportunities in their own communities.

"Millions of older Americans are bearing the burden of poverty and enforced idleness when they could be productive members of society," Seidman testified. "The longer we wait, the greater the hardship on them and the greater the deprivation of the communities they could be serving."

With Seidman at the witness table were AFL-CIO Assistant Legislative Director Kenneth Young and Assistant Social Security Director Lawrence Smedley.

The Senate subcommittee also heard strong support for the legislative proposals from William R. Hutton, executive director of the National Council of Senior Citizens.

Hutton cited the success of the council's "senior aides" program of government-financed, part-time community service employment for low-income elderly persons.

The "highly successful experience" with this and other demonstration projects should be utilized in a large-scale, nationwide program, Hutton urged.

Rollcall Vote in Senate On Loan to Lockheed

The Senate on Aug. 2 voted 49-48 for the bill providing a federal guarantee for a loan to enable Lockheed Aircraft Corp. to continue in business and meet its payroll costs.

The AFL-CIO supported the position of the senators who voted to pass the job-saving legislation.

Layoff Threat Spurs Passage Of Loan Bill

"airbus" in which a large part of its capital and production capacity has been committed. If Lockheed defaults on the loan, the government would have prior claim over all other creditors on the company's assets.

A broader bill that would have set up a $2 billion loan guarantee fund to assist other large employers in similar difficulties had been approved by both the House and Senate Banking committees. But before coming to a vote, it was ditched in both the House and Senate in favor of the original plan to guarantee only the Lockheed loan.

Lockheed had taken a series of heavy losses on defense contract overruns, and its financial condition became critical after Britain's Rolls-Royce Co. went bankrupt last winter. Rolls-Royce had designed and was building the Tristar engine. And while the British government in effect took over the company, the renegotiated engine contract substantially boosted cost estimates.

Pres. Nixon in May asked Congress to guarantee the Lockheed loan after banks which had already advanced $400 million for the Tristar program said they could not put up additional funds needed without a guarantee that a new loan would be repaid.

During the AFL-CIO Executive Council sessions that month, Federation Pres. George Meany told newsmen that the AFL-CIO endorsed the proposal—stressing the jobs at stake and noting ample precedent for federal loan guarantees.

The Machinists, representing Lockheed workers, mounted a major drive to keep the company from going under.

The action of first the Senate and then the House committees in broadening the Lockheed guarantee into the $2 billion general authorization brought mixed results. It won over some who had opposed the original Lockheed aid bill—and lost the support of some members of Congress who were willing to go along only with the smaller-scaled bill.

Supporters of the legislation pressed for quick action to meet a double deadline—Britain had said it could not continue to finance Rolls-Royce operation beyond Aug. 8 if there was no assurance that Lockheed would go ahead with the Tristar, and Congress in any event was scheduled to adjourn for a month-long recess on Aug. 6.

But Senate opponents, led by Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.), refused to agree to an up-or-down vote on the legislation. Three attempts to limit debate failed to muster the two-thirds majority required under Senate rules.

The filibuster was dropped, finally, in exchange for an agreement that the bill to be voted on would be limited to the $250 million Lockheed loan guarantee.

There was no clear pattern to the final votes. Opponents included both liberals and conservatives who opposed on principle any type of government bailout of a failing business. Senators and congressmen from areas where Lockheed and its contractors were major employers supported the measure; those from areas where Lockheed competitors were influential generally opposed passage.

The tipping point, according to Sen. Lowell P. Weicker, Jr. (R-Conn.), who opposed the bill, was the fear of increased unemployment.

$1 Billion This Year:

House Votes Funds For Jobs Program

ever, the urgency of getting the program under way dominated the House debate on the appropriations bill. Amendments to change the Labor Dept.'s apportionment formula were rejected by votes of 213-172 and 114-101.

An attack from the other side, by a hard core of budget-cutters who sought to kill the entire appropriation, was easily beaten on a 321-76 vote.

Key members of the House Labor Committee, including the bill's original sponsor, Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.), contended that the legislation clearly required the Labor Dept. to pass out the bulk of the money directly to local governments on a formula based on the total unemployment in the state in relation to national unemployment and the unemployment in the community in relation to the state unemployment.

Instead, the department imposed a new factor keyed to what it termed "severity of unemployment" and delegated to state governors the distribution of funds to cities and counties with less than 75,000 population.

The latter point, especially, came in for sharp criticism. Rep. William D. Ford (D-Mich.) saw it as a backdoor attempt to translate the jobs program into the "special manpower revenue-sharing" program that the Administration has proposed but Congress has not approved.

And Rep. Charles A. Vanik (D-Ohio) said bluntly what a number of congressmen had complained of privately: "It is not by coincidence that the provision added by the Secretary of Labor provides an increased authorization to 11 states, 10 of which are headed by Republican governors."

Nevertheless the full funding of the program—and the request for the entire $1 billion by the Administration—was seen as a major victory, particularly in view of the fact that Pres. Nixon last year vetoed a public service jobs bill in caustic language.

The Senate was expected to approve the House bill intact before the congressional recess.

In other congressional developments:

- The Senate hammered out a compromise campaign financing bill, accepting a series of bipartisan amendments in the hope of avoiding a second presidential veto.

Last year, Pres. Nixon vetoed a bill limiting the amount that a candidate could spend on television and radio broadcasting.

The new bill sets a ceiling of 10 cents for each potential voter for advertising expenses—of which not more than 6 cents could be used for either political broadcasts or advertising in printed media such as newspapers.

It also repealed the equal time provision for all candidates for federal office and limited the amount of money a candidate can spend from his own pocket for his campaign. Contributions from members of his family are included in the limitation.

An anti-labor amendment by Sen. Peter H. Dominick (R-Colo.) was beaten, 58-36. It would have prohibited any political spending by labor organizations from dues collected under a union shop contract.

Another amendment, by Sen. Paul J. Fannin (R-Ariz.), to cancel the tax exemption of any union that even puts on a voter registration campaign, was ruled out of order.

- The House voted 370-4 for a "sense of Congress" resolution asking that all Public Health Service hospitals, outpatient clinics and research centers remain open and fully funded. The resolution termed them "an integral part of the national health care delivery system."

The Senate earlier passed a similar resolution in an effort to block Administration plans to close down the health facilities that serve the nation's merchant seamen and other groups.

- Congress was put on notice that Pres. Nixon will veto a pay reform bill for federal blue-collar workers that passed the House by a big margin and is pending in the Senate.

The bill would provide additional pay steps and give unions a stronger advisory voice in setting ground rules for the prevailing wage system. It would also bring additional groups of workers under the wage board system.

Nixon vetoed a similar bill just two hours before the 91st Congress adjourned early in January—too late for action on overriding the veto.

The President told a news conference on Aug. 4 that he has "determined that an increase in the blue-collar wage scale would not be in the interests of our fighting the inflation battle."

'Substantial' Joblessness Spreads in Major Areas

Spreading joblessness lengthened the Labor Dept.'s list of areas with substantial unemployment.

Fifty-four of the nation's 150 largest labor areas had "substantial" unemployment in July, one more than the previous month and more than double the 24 on the list one year ago.

The latest addition was New Orleans, with a current jobless level of 6.7 percent. An area is put on the list when it has a jobless rate of 6 percent or more, with the rate expected to continue for at least two more months.

Unemployment also rose among the nation's smaller labor areas, with an increase of 23 in the "substantial" unemployment category over the month and a rise of four in the more extreme "persistent" unemployment listing. There are now 751 smaller areas in these two categories.

One of the few large labor areas with "low" unemployment of under 3 percent—Houston—moved to the higher "moderate" unemployment level in July. That leaves only six of the 150 major areas with less than 3 percent joblessness as compared with 24 in July 1970.

Griner, Jennings Delegates to TUC

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has announced that the federation will be represented at the 1971 British Trades Union Congress by Pres. John F. Griner of the Government Employes and Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

The two AFL-CIO vice presidents will serve as fraternal delegates to the TUC Congress, Sept. 6-10, at Blackpool, England.

Senate Rejects Attempted Raid On Meat Law

An Administration effort to open a loophole in the federal meat inspection law was beaten back in the Senate after AFL-CIO unions sounded an alert.

The Senate voted 52-38 against a motion to allow state-inspected meat and poultry to be sold in interstate commerce — competing with meat products that have been checked at every stage of preparation by federal inspectors.

Sen. Charles McC. Mathias (R-Md.) proposed the measure as an amendment to a relatively noncontroversial bill increasing the federal government's share of the cost of state meat inspection.

He read a letter from Agriculture Sec. Clifford M. Hardin declaring that the Administration would favor a higher payment to the states only if it were coupled with an OK for interstate sales of state-inspected meat.

Under present law, only federally-inspected meat can be moved across state lines.

While strongly supporting improved state inspection, consumer and labor groups have warned that health and quality safeguards would be lowered if packers and processors were able to shop around for the most lenient type of inspection.

The Mathias proposal had been rejected by the Senate Agriculture Committee. But the Meat Cutters, joined by the American Federation of Government Employes, which represents federal meat inspectors, swung into action when it was learned that the loophole amendment would be offered on the Senate floor. Telegrams were sent to senators; legislative representatives of the AFL-CIO and other unions joined Arnold Mayer of the Meat Cutters and Carl Sadler of the AFGE in buttonholing senators, and the move was decisively blocked.

First All-Women Class Gets AIFLD Diplomas

Twenty-four Latin American women from 13 countries became the first all-female class—the 37th—to graduate from the American Institute of Free Labor Development's training program.

The unionists were praised by AIFLD Director William C. Doherty as one of the hardest-working classes in the nine-year history of the AIFLD training program.

Daniel L. Horowitz, special assistant to the Secretary of State, told the women that "too frequently we try to solve the problems of women's rights with laws" when in many cases they might best be solved by the women themselves through their activities in such areas as trade unions.

Women make a basic contribution to "the modernization of their societies," Horowitz said, "by representing a humanizing force in these activities."

He urged the graduates to return to their countries and their unions and continue their struggles for equality and development, stressing that "institutions are no better than their leadership."

Horowitz praised trade unionists generally as having known for years that investment is not the only element in the development of a country, something economists have only just begun to realize.

There is more than one dimension to the modernization of a society, he said, and "economic development needs a framework to build on."

As a final note, he pointed out to the female unionists that "any contribution you make is a contribution to your country as a whole."

Fanny Zendron of Uruguay spoke for the members of the class saying, "in view of the complex problems of our times there is no question as to the role that women should play in the social and economic life of every country. In this respect we fully realize the scope and value of the training acquired here and its potential for the future."

Denise C. Thiry of the International Federation of Free Teachers addressed the graduation luncheon. She told the class that they were evidence that women are an integral part of both the work force and the trade union movement.

The graduates were also saluted by Lenore Quintana, director of women's activities of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers.

2 Unionists Appointed To Jobs Study Group

Heads of two AFL-CIO unions have been named to a Dept. of Labor advisory panel on professional, scientific and technical manpower.

Pres. Floyd E. Smith of the Machinists and Pres. William T. Cleary of the Technical Engineers were named to the 22-member group which will advise the Labor Dept. on programs and legislation to aid jobless engineers, scientists and technicians.

Job 'Disaster' Aid Bill Clears Senate Panel

- Medical services without regard to ability to pay.
- Loans to business enterprises which have the potential to be major sources of employment.
- Grants to communities to replace losses in property tax revenues.

Jackson said the bill would provide emergency relief for communities suffering from the "man-made economic disasters" resulting from "the economic policies of the Nixon Administration."

Magnuson termed it a recognition that federal government policies "harshly affect certain communities throughout the nation" and deprive workers of the ability to make a living "through no fault of their own."

'Do-Nothing' Administration Hit:

Minimum Wage Hike Tops Labor Agenda for Congress

San Francisco—Labor looked to Congress to overcome the handicap of the "do-nothing" Nixon Administration and act this year on legislation needed to strengthen the nation's economy.

An AFL-CIO Executive Council statement gave the first session of the 92nd Congress a passing grade to date.

It contrasted the "diligence" of Congress with the "stalling tactics" of the Administration, the vetoes and veto threats of the President and the White House refusal to spend appropriated funds.

But "much remains to be done" before Congress adjourns, the council stressed.

It listed an AFL-CIO legislative agenda topped by the need to improve the Fair Labor Standards Act, through an increase in the minimum wage to at least $2 an hour and extension of coverage to all workers still outside the law.

"We will flatly oppose the establishment of special, sub-standard minimum rates for young workers," the council said. And it urged that the principle of "equal pay for equal work" regardless of sex "be extended to administrative, executive and professional employes."

The council strongly urged the House Ways & Means Committee to start action this year on the National Health Security bill—"this badly needed and long-overdue national program for financing the comprehensive health care of all Americans."

Likewise, it urged a prompt start of congressional hearings "to meet the critical need for trade legislation." Legislation should follow based on "the AFL-CIO's nine-point program designed to halt the export of jobs."

Separate council statements dealt with the welfare reform-social security bill before the Senate and with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission legislation the House will take up in September.

Other high priority items listed in the council's legislative statement included:

- Creation of an urban development bank and greater availability of mortgage money at low interest rates. Also backed was a House bill to build low and moderate-income housing in the suburbs.
- A two-year extension of the Office of Economic Opportunity's anti-poverty program, coupled with provisions for a comprehensive day-care program, creation of a non-profit legal services corporation, and a strict limitation on OEO funds for experimental "educational vouchers."
- Enactment of emergency school aid legislation providing funds for desegregation programs.

Jobless Rate Turns Up, Reaches 5.8% in July

By Tom Castor

High unemployment continued to plague the American work force in July with the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate jumping from 5.6 to 5.8 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

And additional figures issued by the BLS painted a bleak picture of the job market:

- At least 5.3 million workers were unemployed during July, only a slight drop from the June figure of 5.5 million, which set a 10-year record.
- The proportion of the labor force unemployed 15 weeks or more was at its highest level since August 1963.
- Manufacturing jobs were at their lowest point since November 1965, reflecting the loss of more than 1.5 million factory jobs in the economy between late 1969 and last April, with little sign of recovery.

Administration officials nevertheless saw the July unemployment figures as "good news"—because the jobless rate didn't

Rebukes Inaction On Nation's Needs

By Saul Miller

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO took a new and updated look at the Nixon Administration and indicted it for creating an economic mess, frustrating tax justice, thwarting congressional intentions and stalling on legislative programs.

The findings came in a series of statements adopted by the federation's Executive Council at a two-day summer meeting here.

The council was sharply critical also of the Federal Communications Commission for its failures on enforcement of the fairness doctrine and related policies, especially in recent strike and bargaining situations. (Story, Page 8.)

And it reaffirmed the federation's strong support for legislation to strengthen fair employment practices and to remedy in the Senate the many weaknesses and omissions in the House-passed welfare reform and social security measure.

The international situation also got top council attention with the adoption of a statement calling on the Administration to "consider anew the question of Chinese Communist membership in the United Nations" in light of a complete lack of evidence that the country had in any way changed to make it eligible for membership. (Story, this page.)

The Administration was urged also to take the initiative in demanding that the Communist-built Berlin Wall come down as an indication of Soviet intentions to ease world tensions. (Story, Page 3.)

This is how the council evaluated the Administration:

- The country is in an economic mess as a result of 2½ years of "gross mismanagement by the Nixon Administration" which is undermining public confidence by a "chorus of patently untrue economic forecasts." (Story, Page 2.)
- The Administration "has relentlessly pursued tax policies which would heap more of the tax burden upon the shoulders of wage and salary workers and redistribute still greater shares of the nation's wealth and income to those who need it least." (Story, Page 2.)
- The President has refused to spend funds appropriated by Congress and has reacted to positive Congress programs by using the veto and the threat of the veto. The Administration also has been "guilty of deliberate stalling tactics" on legislative programs.

The council also took note of and voiced its opposition to a Labor Dept. move, in effect, to drop the provision for overtime after eight hours a day for workers on government contracts. (Story, Page 3.)

In a series of legislative statements, the Executive Council:

- Termed the House-passed 5 percent raise in social security benefits inadequate and urged a 15 percent increase. The Senate also was urged to restore House cutbacks in the Medicaid program and Medicare benefits.
- Asked the Senate to upgrade the House version of the family assistance program so that "long-overdue" welfare reforms won't result in new hardships to the nation's needy. It asked a higher basic family allotment, a guarantee against reduction of current state payments and minimum wage guarantees for job referrals. (Story, Page 3.)
- Pressed for quick action on a minimum wage bill providing at least $2 an hour and expanded coverage. The council's "much

Nixon Urged to Weigh China Policy Decision

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO Executive Council urged the Nixon Administration to examine closely and "consider anew the question of Chinese Communist membership in the United Nations."

The council cautioned the Administration not to move too fast, to take a good look at the facts that had led four previous administrations to oppose UN membership for Communist China.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a press conference that the statement on Communist China was approved by a 25 to 4 vote with one abstention. He said the thrust of the statement was that the council did not think there has been a change in Chinese Communist policy and there is a real question whether that country can meet the requirements for UN membership as stated in the UN Charter.

He warned also against trading off principle for "reality," pointing to the history of the League of Nations and the fate of Ethiopia, the futile attempts to appease Hitler and the Nazis.

Meany said he had reservations about anything useful coming out of Pres. Nixon's announced plan to visit Peking. He termed the Nixon

Backing Asked For Strikers At Chair Firm

San Francisco—Full support for strikes of 1,000 Furniture Workers against the La-Z-Boy Chair Co. was urged by the Executive Council. A statement by the council urged all federation affiliates to "do everything in their power to help these strikers in their campaign" for a "measure of economic justice at the bargaining table."

The council noted that "after five fruitless months of contract negotiations," UFWA members in Monroe, Mich., and Florence, S.C., were forced to strike "to gain reasonable wages and working conditions."

The company, which makes recliner chairs and other products in 10 plants, has refused wage levels that would "merely meet increases in living costs," the statement charged. It added: "The company's refusal to agree to an acceptable contract and its accompanying campaign to undermine the union is designed to frustrate union organizing activities at other company plants" in Neosho, Mo., Redlands, Calif., and Newton, Miss.

UFWA Pres. Fred Fulford said management of the newly organized plant at Florence gave 500 union members an offer of 10 cents an hour more, "take it or leave it." In Monroe, where another 500 workers have been under union contract for 15 years, management boasted it had made a "liberal" offer, but "the liberal offer didn't even equal the rise in the cost of living," Fulford said.

Company profits last year totaled $10.5 million, according to Fulford.

The strikes started Aug. 2 in Monroe and Aug. 3 in Florence. La-Z-Boy products have been put on the unfair list of the AFL-CIO Union Label and Service Trades Dept., the union said.

Unions Urged to Support Minority-Owned Banks

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO hailed the development and expansion of minority-owned banks and urged all segments of the labor movement to give the program consideration.

The Executive Council applauded those international and local unions "which are supporting these minority-owned and operated banks."

It noted that there are now 33 such banks in existence, participating in the federal government's minority bank deposit program and helping to meet the economic needs and development of minority communities.

"Deposits from every sector of the economy, including organized labor, can improve the ability of these minority banks in processing home mortgages among members of minority groups and in providing loans to minority business enterprises," the council said.

Labor Renews Demand For Income Tax Justice

San Francisco—Despite improvements in 1969, the federal income tax "is still rigged against the workers' paycheck and in favor of unearned income," and tax justice remains high on the nation's agenda of unfinished business.

That view was spelled out by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in a statement that sharply assailed Administration tax policies as designed to "heap more of the burden upon the shoulders of wage and salary workers and redistribute still greater shares of the nation's wealth and income to those who need it least."

The need for tax justice, the council said, is especially acute because of the "unrelenting needs for increased public investment" while billions of dollars escape full taxation because of loopholes of special tax privilege for the wealthy and the corporations.

The Tax Reform Act of 1969, the council noted, "was a step along the road toward tax justice" because it removed from the tax rolls millions below the poverty level, provided some tax relief to moderate and middle-income Americans and trimmed some loopholes.

But the federal income tax, it stressed, is "still rigged against those who depend on wages and salaries, while there are numerous gilded tax-havens for those with wealth and taxpaying ability."

The council singled out the Administration's policies of a gigantic giveaway to corporations through "tax depreciation gimmickry." It noted that Administration spokesmen "have continually threatened new consumer taxes, such as the so-called value-added tax, or additional corporate tax giveaways" such as the business investment tax credit or the proposed subsidy for export corporations.

The depreciation giveaway alone will cost $37 billion in revenue over the next decade.

Tax justice, the council said, will increase the amount of federal funds "needed to eliminate the public investment shortages that are a source of many of America's critical social problems." Effective loophole closing, the council added, would also enable a "reduction in the relative tax burden of low and moderate-income families."

And beyond all this, the council stressed, it is essential to give the American people "confidence in the way federal revenues are obtained."

'Gross Mismanagement':

White House Scored On 'Economic Mess'

San Francisco—The country is in an "economic mess" because of 2½ years of "gross mismanagement by the Nixon Administration," the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

Assessing the state of the economy, the council emphasized that "while most economic indicators turn sour, the White House continues to make believe that America is in good shape." The Administration's "chorus of patently untrue economic forecasts are undermining public confidence," the council charged.

The council reaffirmed the federation's oft-stated position, first set forth in 1966, that "we are prepared to cooperate with mandatory government controls, if the President decides they are necessary, provided such controls are even-handed and across the board.

"But we are opposed to any and all attempts at one-sided curbs on workers' wages, without effective curbs on prices, profits, interest rates and other incomes. One-sided curbs on workers' earnings are neither a balanced and effective stabilization program nor a workable policy in a free society."

The council's views were spelled out in a statement that drew the dimensions of the nation's economic problems: more than 5 million unemployed, several million more working less than full-time; unchecked rises in living costs washing out buying power; 54 major and 751 smaller job areas in economic distress; the number of full-time jobs in the private economy dropping one million in the past two years; industry operating at only 73 percent of capacity; rising profits and interest rates. (Excerpts, Page 5.)

The council urged immediate action in four areas:

- Release of the $12 billion in appropriated funds frozen by the President, because "there is no time for further politically inspired delays in the expenditure of appropriated funds."
- Full funding by Congress of government programs to meet the nation's public investment needs as well as accelerated short-term public works construction in areas of high unemployment.
- An increase in the federal minimum wage to at least $2 an hour immediately, and extension of the wage-hour law coverage to millions of low-wage workers now excluded.
- Rapid expansion of money and credit, at lower interest rates to stimulate economic expansion and ease inflationary pressures.

In reaffirming its willingness to cooperate if the President determines that stabilization measures and controls are necessary, the council stressed:

"We are prepared to sacrifice as much as anyone else, as long as anyone else, so long as there is equality of sacrifice. We will do our patriotic duty but we will not be the scapegoat for the economic failures of this Administration."

Stronger Job Bias Law Sought 'Without Delay'

San Francisco—Legislation to strengthen the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission by giving it enforcement powers and exclusive jurisdiction has the AFL-CIO's strong support, the Executive Council declared.

A council statement reaffirmed labor's opposition to an Administration bill that would leave enforcement of the ban on job discrimination up to federal courts and would "worsen the existing overlap and confusion" of jurisdiction.

The AFL-CIO-supported Hawkins-Reid bill, scheduled to reach the House floor in mid-September, is also backed by the leading civil rights organizations.

It would extend coverage to establishments with eight or more employes, as compared with the present 25, and would for the first time cover state and local government employes.

The public employe coverage, the council said, is "particularly needed . . . because some state and local governments are among the most flagrant discriminators."

Under the Hawkins-Reid bill, the EEOC would be given enforcement powers patterned after those of the National Labor Relations Board. And it would also take over from other government agencies, including the Department of Justice, Civil Service Commission and the Labor Dept.'s Office of Contract Compliance, responsibility for acting against all forms of employment discrimination.

Under the present divided jurisdiction, the council noted, the same case has sometimes come before three different government bodies with each agency taking a different position.

"Centralization of responsibility is highly desirable from the standpoint of unions and employers as well as of members of minority groups," the council noted.

It urged Congress to enact the legislation "without delay" and to reject the expected attempt to substitute the Administration bill.

N.J. Unit of 3,900 Votes for AFTE

Trenton, N.J.—State employes in a unit of 3,900 operations, services and maintenance workers have chosen the Technical Engineers to represent them. The result of the state-wide election brought to 6,000 the number of public employes represented by AFTE in New Jersey, Pres. William T. Cleary said.

The union asked Gov. William F. Cahill (R) to direct an early start of negotiations. It reminded him that petitions for a vote among three bargaining units were filed more than two years ago. After months of litigation on appropriate units and a strike for recognition by the employes last September, the state finally agreed to the election.

announcement of the visit as the "number one stunt of the number one stunt man of our time."

To the query about establishing contact with Communist China and its importance in world affairs, Meany noted that there had been no contact for 20 years and it perhaps would be more dangerous to have Communist China on the UN Security Council with the veto power and the prestige of high UN membership than not having contact.

The council noted the statement by Sec. of State William Rogers that the Administration would no longer oppose and would actively support UN membership for Communist China and asked what had changed to overturn the policies of the Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson Administrations.

The council raised the question of whether Communist China has provided any proof that "it is now qualified for UN membership" in terms of the guiding principles set out in the UN Charter.

The statement cited the record of China's aggression in Korea, Indochina, Tibet and its plans for subversion in Indonesia.

In view of this record, the council asked, "why does the Nixon Administration believe that peace in our time and for future generations would be served by according the Mao Tse-tung regime membership in the UN, on its Security Council with the right of veto power over decisions of the United Nations? And would the Administration be prepared to go along with the expulsion of the Republic of China, a founding member of the United Nations and long-time ally of the United States? These questions must also be seriously considered by the Administration before the final decisions are made by the UN."

Council members voting against the statement were Vice Presidents A. Philip Randolph, Jacob S. Potofsky, Joseph Curran and Jerry Wurf. Recorded as abstaining was Vice Pres. Frederick O'Neal. Five vice presidents were absent.

Condemns Inaction On Nation's Needs remains to be done" legislative agenda also urged congressional committees to begin action this year on urgently-needed National Health Security and trade legislation. (Story, Page 1.)

● Warned that the Administration's proposed substitute for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission bill would "worsen the existing overlap and confusion" of jurisdiction over anti-discrimination programs and would leave the EEOC without effective enforcement powers. (Story, Page 2.)

AFL-CIO affiliates were urged to consider depositing funds in banks owned and operated by Negroes and other minority groups, so as to improve their ability to finance home mortgages and business loans to help meet the economic needs of minority communities. (Story, Page 2.)

Member unions also were urged by the council to give full support to strikes by the Furniture Workers against the La-Z-Boy Chair Co., whose "take-it-or-leave-it" bargaining tactic was linked with its campaign "to undermine the union." (Story, Page 2.)

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson, accompanied by Assistant Sec. W. J. Usery and Federal Mediation Director J. Curtis Counts, met with the council and discussed economic developments, various conferences on productivity, state and local labor relations, delay in construction projects because of environmental problems, and getting the Occupational Health & Safety Act under way.

On unemployment, Hodgson told reporters that the 150,000 jobs provided in the public service jobs bill plus Administration plans to stimulate the economy should improve the economic outlook.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told reporters later that the session with Hodgson had been "low key," that the Secretary tried to paint a more optimistic picture of the economy.

Meany said the key to improved productivity is full employment and he did not think that an upcoming September conference on productivity would accomplish very much.

At other press conferences during the sessions Meany:

● Made it clear that all affiliates and unions in the AFL-CIO, including the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, must observe the Federation's rules and policies on boycotts. Under those rules the UFWOC-called boycott against Heublein products cannot be endorsed or supported by the federation because the company has long and good labor relations with a number of AFL-CIO unions including the Brewery Workers, Glass Bottle Blowers, Distillery Workers and others. He noted that the federation has helped the Farm Workers in every conceivable way in the successful grape boycott and in working out problems with the Teamsters in the lettuce areas and gives it continuing and substantial financial support.

● Emphasized that the AFL-CIO does not support the Administration's benefit level in the welfare reform bill, but believes that the immediate figure for a family of four should be $2,800, with the ultimate goal being the government-level poverty figure, now about $3,900.

● Said the President is carrying out his pledge to disengage the U.S. from the war in Vietnam and helping provide the South Vietnamese with the ability to defend themselves.

● Announced that the council had aproved the purchase of a permanent site in the Washington area for the Labor Studies Center pending approval of necessary zoning changes.

The council approved requests for change in titles for several unions, stipulating that the change in names did not in any fashion involve changes in jurisdiction. The unions included the Newspaper Guild, Metal Polishers and the Stereotypers.

The council also voted funds for the Joint Council on Economic Education, Jewish Labor Committee, League for Industrial Democracy and the United Negro College Fund. It urged affiliates to support the Eisenhower College fund drive and voted continued support for the Smithsonian Folklife Festival in Washington.

The next council meeting is scheduled for Nov. 17, 1971, in Bal Harbour, Fla.

WORKING SESSION of AFL-CIO Executive Council tackles a broad range of issues, from pending legislation to international relations to strike report. Council statements are the framework for the federation's policies between biennial conventions.

Labor Stands Firm On Eight-Hour Day

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO called on the Labor Dept. "to reject the current proposal to drop the requirement of time and one-half pay for over eight hours of work per day on government contracts" under various federal laws.

The federation's Executive Council declared "we support union and management efforts, through collective bargaining, to reduce working hours and to reschedule work-week arrangements, to their mutual satisfaction.

"However, the eight-hour day standard was achieved after decades of trade union efforts and we believe that federal laws, covering work on government contracts, must continue to protect workers against excessive hours of work per day, as well as excessive working hours per week."

U.S. Initiative Urged to Unite Divided Berlin

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO called on the U.S. government to take the initiative "in demanding that the Berlin Wall come down" as the key to any real intentions by the Soviet Union to initiate action leading to a meaningful easing of world tensions.

The federation's Executive Council noted the 10th anniversary of the erection of the Berlin Wall by the East German government in the heart of the city and said no just and peaceful settlement of any phase of the German question is possible "as long as this division of Berlin continues."

The wall is part of a pattern of Communist assaults on freedom of individuals and nations, the council stressed, pointing to the invasion of Czechoslovakia and the pouring of thousands of military personnel into the Middle East. "Clearly all these Soviet acts of aggression are of one piece."

The council urged the U.S. government "to guard against the new maneuvers by the Soviet Union and its East German puppet which aim to turn West Berlin into a so-called independent 'political entity,' into a sort of 'third Germany.'" It called also for an implementation of a 1951 United Nations resolution on investigating the feasibility of free elections throughout all of Germany.

Senate Asked to Raise Family Assistance Level

San Francisco—The Senate was urged by the AFL-CIO to upgrade the House-passed family assistance and social security bill so that "long-overdue" welfare reforms won't result in new hardships to the nation's needy.

An Executive Council statement listed the major pluses and minuses of the 687-page bill passed by the House in June and now before the Senate Finance Committee.

Its social security amendments include "many desirable improvements," the council noted. But with living costs soaring, the "mere 5 percent increase in cash benefits" is inadequate, and the Senate was urged to boost it to at least 15 percent.

On Medicare, the AFL-CIO strongly supported the House-passed extension of benefits to 1.5 million disabled persons under 65. But it urged the Senate to reject a cutback in hospital benefits.

As for Medicaid—the federal-state program of assistance to persons of all ages who can't afford to get seriously sick—the Executive Council registered a strong dissent to cutbacks voted by the House. It urged the Senate to strengthen the program instead.

The council welcomed the House provisions for increased federal welfare aid to the aged, blind and disabled.

But while backing the principle of a basic federal allotment for needy families, including both the "working poor" and those unable to work or find jobs, the AFL-CIO statement criticized the adequacy of the House bill.

The basic benefit amount is tied to the family size, with a family of four entitled to $2,400 in federal funds.

This, the council stressed, is "less than the amount being provided in most states" under present federal-state matching allotments and would be "totally inadequate."

The basic federal grant initially "should be at least $2,800 and raised to no less than the poverty level within a few years," the federation said.

The council reiterated labor's position that no beneficiary should receive less under the new law than he is presently receiving. And "to insure this, states should be required, with assistance from federal matching grants, to make supplemental payments to at least equal current benefits, including food stamps."

As to a provision in the bill for 200,000 federally-financed public service jobs to provide work opportunities for welfare recipients, the council strongly insisted that the jobs pay either the prevailing wage rate or the federal minimum wage, whichever is higher.

And "no mother should be referred to work in the absence of adequate child care facilities," the AFL-CIO urged.

In the shift to federal assumption of welfare administration, the AFL-CIO said, there must be firm protection for the job rights and employment conditions of state and local government employes who presently administer welfare programs.

Urging the Senate to move towards full federalization of welfare, the council noted that under the present "mess," the cost to taxpayers is increasing at the same time that "the plight of those forced on welfare is deteriorating."

U.S. Unions Aid Ethiopians in Job Training

Addis Ababa, Ethiopia—The Confederation of Ethiopian Labor Unions is expanding its three-year-old vocational training program to graduate 200 skilled workers annually.

New workshops will be opened in Asmara and Dire Dawa and an additional workshop is being constructed in Addis Ababa. The CELU launched the training program three years ago in Addis Ababa in collaboration with the African-American Labor Center.

The courses to be offered at Asmara and Dire Dawa include auto-diesel mechanics, wood work, electricity, general motor work, plumbing, welding and general shop work. There are currently 75 building trades trainees attending the 1971 session in Addis Ababa.

Ato Mesfin Gebre Michael, director of the CELU education and information department, reported that the AALC has pledged continued support of the training programs for the next two years. He expressed "deep gratitude" to the AALC, "without whose assistance our education programs would not be as they are."

Wage-Hour Bill Tops Agenda for Congress

● Completion of action on legislation to meet "the nation's crisis in higher education."

● Establishment of an independent consumer protection agency.

● Senate approval of the House-passed bill improving the pay structure of the federal government's blue-collar workers. The legislation would also bring employes of self-financing government programs into the wage board system and would give unions a more effective voice in setting wage policies.

● Hearings and action on labor-sought improvements in both the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers Compensation Act and the Federal Employes Compensation Act. Both programs deal with compensation for job-related injuries and illnesses.

● Passage of "long overdue bank reform legislation." House hearings have already exposed interlocking directorates, conflict of interest situations and other abuses that hurt both the consumer and the depositor.

The council's general assessment of the legislative outlook credited Congress with having worked "with reasonable diligence to meet the nation's critical economic problems."

Delays, it charged, have often come about because of "deliberate stalling tactics" by the Administration.

The council statement declared that "while Congress has not always acted as quickly or decisively as the AFL-CIO would have liked, our basic quarrel is with the President and his do-nothing Administration."

Tax Justice

JUSTICE IN the federal tax structure remains high on the agenda of the nation's unfinished business. Despite unrelenting needs for increased public investment, billions of dollars escape full taxation through loopholes of special tax privilege for wealthy people and corporations.

The Tax Reform Act of 1969 was a step along the road toward tax justice. That law removed from the federal income-tax rolls those whose incomes are below government-defined poverty levels and it provided a measure of tax relief to moderate- and middle-income Americans who shoulder far more than their fair share of the tax burden. In addition, many of the loopholes and gimmicks in the tax structure, which provide preferential and unfair tax treatment for wealthy individuals and corporations, were trimmed, at least slightly.

Nevertheless, the federal income tax is still rigged against the workers' paycheck and in favor of unearned income. It is still rigged against those who depend on wages and salaries, while there are numerous gilded tax-havens for those with wealth and taxpaying ability.

Rather than furthering the goals of tax justice, the Administration has relentlessly pursued tax policies which would heap more of the tax burden upon the shoulders of wage and salary workers and redistribute still greater shares of the nation's wealth and income to those who need it least. The most shocking example has been the Administration's $3-$5 billion annual tax giveaway to corporations, through tax depreciation gimmickry. As a result of this action alone about $37 billion of business tax revenue will be wiped out in the coming decade—$37 billion that could be used for urgently needed public facilities and services.

What is more, Administration spokesmen have continually threatened new consumer taxes, such as the so-called value-added tax, or additional corporate tax giveaways, such as the reinstatement of the tax-credit subsidy for business investment and the proposed tax subsidy for export corporations.

The Administration has added to the existing inequities in the tax structure. Billions of dollars of potential tax revenue that could be used for rebuilding urban areas and expanding mass transit, education, health care, pollution controls and other needed public investments are beyond the reach of the federal government.

WE BELIEVE that quick and effective achievement of tax justice is essential to strengthen the performance of the nation's economy and to increase the amount of federal revenue needed to eliminate the public-investment shortages that are a source of many of America's critical social problems.

America needs the added tax revenues and improved public facilities that tax justice could provide—rather than continued and expanded windfalls for the rich. Effective loophole-closing would also raise sufficient additional revenue to enable a reduction in the relative tax burden of low- and moderate-income families.

We urge the Administration and the Congress to complete the unfinished business of tax justice and to reject schemes which would erode federal revenues and move the tax structure further away from the principle of ability to pay.

A Word Edgewise:

Escape from Cares of World Marred by Raccoon Menace

By John P. Roche

CHILMARK, MASS.—First you wonder if you will ever get packed. Then you wonder if the game is worth the candle—there are so many things to do before getting off. In our case, for instance, there are the two cats, Seamus & Maria, who permit us to live under their sovereignty. We can't take them with us, but the thought of dumping them in one of those animal jails for a month is intolerable. (We did it once and they didn't speak to us for weeks.) So a reliable cat-sitter must be found. Luckily I have a graduate student of whom the cats thoroughly approve. OK, check that one off.

However, one by one the details somehow fall into place and finally, thoroughly exhausted, we climb in the car and start for the ferry at Woods Hole. For the first hour you are on auto-pilot, the slow car on the road at 70, wondering how anybody can deny that we live in an Age of Faith as fallible machines go whizzing by at 85. Then, suddenly, the road leaves the oaks and maples and begins to cut through pine barrens and salt swamps and the salt air starts its magic of invigoration. By the time you get off the ferry on Martha's Vineyard, life seems to be starting up again.

The "salt air sickness" merits scientific analysis. Its symptoms are paradoxical: on one hand, men and women who haven't had any honest physical exercise for months find themselves bounding into the water and cavorting on the beach; on the other, they start going to sleep about 8. The other night we were sitting in the barn talking after dinner—everybody started to yawn, my wife went to sleep, and I peered at my watch (thinking it must be midnight) only to discover it was 9:30! One can sleep for 10 hours a night without even trying. As a visitor said in a startled way, "Why, it's better than Seconol!"

We live in a special subculture dedicated to getting a vacation. Also on the island one can, I'm told, find a permanent floating cocktail party. Allegedly its members move up en masse from Cambridge and Manhattan, glasses in hand. But they live in a different world from us hermits.

I ran into a New York acquaintance at the Post Office a while back. He said he had just bought a house in Gay Head after renting for several years, suggested nicely that he hoped we would learn to like the island, invited us for a drink, and—as an afterthought—said, "Have you been up before?" "Yes," my wife said with a slight edge on her voice, "but only for 20 years."

SO INSTEAD of gathering over the ice cubes to evaluate the Pentagon Papers, we and our friends are worrying about raccoons. You may think this is trivial, but a night or so ago there was a racket out back that sounded like a barroom fight in South Boston. I got the flashlight and discovered a platoon of raccoons working through the garbage and rubbish cans. They may be "cute," but what a mess. Not only are they fiendishly ingenious at infiltrating garbage defenses; they have been decimating ground birds, both wild and domestic. I constantly worry about the family of whippoorwills that crank up at 8:30 every night, and people who raise chickens have had a hard time.

Some nameless benefactor (several have been accused of the crime, but this is not the place to spread rumors) decided Martha's Vineyard needed raccoons to fill out its agenda of resident fauna. A few years back he deposited a couple who set to work with a vengeance and now the little rascals are everywhere. What do you do? Hunting, trapping, and poison are out, and the basic problem is that the fox, the raccoon's natural enemy, is not among the animals native to these parts.

Somebody suggested that maybe we should import foxes, but it was quickly noted that this in turn would require the introduction of foxhunters. Since nobody wants dogs, hunters and horns roaring through the moors, this contingency plan was rejected. The proposal that a grizzly bear be placed on the property of the raccoon importer was tabled, subject to reconsideration. It may yet come to this unless some experienced raccoon-hand can help us out of this ecological box.

Stereotypes Refuted:

Profiles of 'Middle Americans' Offer Antidote to Elitist Bigotry

By Msgr. George G. Higgins

(H)ENRY (H)IGGINS' famous question, "Why can't a woman be like a man?" was thought (even by some women) to be rather funny when it was first put to music in "My Fair Lady." Since the advent of Women's Lib, however, a mere man would have to be rather foolhardy to ask the same question in mixed company. He would be held up to wrathful scorn (even by his male peers) as an insensitive male chauvinist, and, by today's standards, of course, that's almost as bad as being called a fascist pig. In other words, male bigotry, once so respectable, is now verboten in polite society.

There is another, more elite form of bigotry, however, which is still very respectable and very "chic" in upper and upper-middle-class society in this country. Michael Lerner, a young journalist turned political scientist, described it not so long ago as follows: "An extraordinary amount of bigotry on the part of elite, liberal students goes unexamined. . . . Directed at the lower middle class, it feeds on the unexamined biases of class perspective, the personality predilections of elite radicals and academic disciples that support their views. . . .

"In general (Lerner continued) the bigotry of a lower-middle-class policeman toward a ghetto black, or of a lower-middle-class mayor toward a rioter, is not viewed in the same perspective as the bigotry of an upper-middle-class peace matron toward a lower-middle-class mayor, or an upper-class university student toward an Italian, a Pole or National Guardsman from Cicero, Illinois—that is, if the latter two cases are called bigotry at all. . . . Yet the two bigotries are very similar."

Lerner says that the hidden liberal-radical bigotry toward the lower-middle-class is "stinking and covered" and argues that its consequences are tragic. "Not until the upper-middle-class learns to deal with its own hidden bigotry," he concludes, "will it be in a position to help destroy lower-middle-class bigotry as well." ("Respectable Bigotry," The American Scholar, Autumn 1969).

During the two years which have elapsed since Lerner wrote the searing indictment of upper-class bigotry, the popular media and a number of independent scholars representing a variety of disciplines have, at long last, discovered Middle America and are trying, with mixed results, to find out what the millions of ordinary people who comprise this vast segment of American society are actually like, what they are thinking at the present time, and what it is that really makes them tick. Of the many articles and books which have been written about Middle America during this short period of time, the best, in my opinion, are those which bear the name of Robert Coles.

Coles is a practicing psychiatrist with a profoundly sensitive social conscience and a wide-ranging grasp of the social sciences. He has spent the better part of the last five years interviewing—and thereby getting to know and respect and even to love—a generous sampling of middle and lower-class Americans. His most recent book, "The Middle Americans," (the text of which is supplemented by a series of excellent photographs by Jon Erikson) is the perfect antidote to the upper-class bigotry so severely criticized by Lerner in the article referred to above.

Coles does not pretend to have written a scientific sociological study in the technical sense of the word. He and his collaborator, Erikson, look upon themselves "as observers, that alone." Their task has been to see and hear, in so far as they could, "how certain families live, families headed by men who are policemen, firemen, factory workers, bank tellers, or lower-level bank officers, school teachers, telephone repairmen, construction workers, clerics and typists and small farmers and small storekeepers and on and on."

What they have seen and heard has compelled them to realize that any attempt to stereotype Middle Americans into a single monolithic mold would be tragically wide of the mark.

The aim of their book, then, is to make the "human actuality" of Middle America come across to the reader. In this writer's judgment, they have succeeded in doing so to a remarkable degree.

COLES AND ERIKSON, in other words, are totally free of snobbery and self-righteousness. Their purpose "is not to criticize these people (Middle Americans), argue with them, praise them as America's answer to anything and everything, or use them as a means of advancing certain values or purposes we happen to have." They simply accept Middle Americans as fellow human beings with the same mixture of virtue and vice which characterizes every other segment of American society.

It is this quality of humaneness—the quality of tolerance and sympathetic understanding—which makes their book required reading for the liberal critics of Middle America. One has the impression, incidentally, that Coles and Erikson wrote their marvelous human book primarily for the instruction of the so-called liberals.

It is their hope that the liberals will not, "in their rush to understand yet another 'problem,' indulge themselves in endless hysterical and foreboding conclusions about the very same people whom, from the other direction, conservatives are likely to see excitedly and not always with reason as their new-found allies and saviors."

This is another way of saying that Middle America, with all its faults and imperfections, deserves better than to be flattered and wooed, on the one hand, by the George Wallaces of this world, and, on the other hand, to be made fun of pharasaically by self-righteous students and intellectuals, who are experts at detecting the moat of bigotry in the eye of the hardhat, for example, but have yet to recognize the beam in their own.

By Punishing Families:

Chamber of Commerce Drive Threatens Rights of Strikers

THE RECENTLY-MOUNTED push by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to ban public aid to strikers' families would, if successful, seriously weaken the right of workers to withhold their services from an unfair employer, an AFL-CIO spokesman warned.

Actually, strikers and their families have been receiving public assistance for more than 25 years, provided they "meet such eligibility requirements" as specific waiting periods and proof of need, said Leo Perlis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services. He said that the current drive led by the Chamber of Commerce is "aided and abetted by employers . . . who want to punish strikers" by imposing new restrictions on a system that is intended to help citizens who are in need, regardless of the cause of their need.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Perlis rejected the contention that workers "go on strike with the idea that they are going to get some money from the government" or public agencies.

"Workers want to work at decent wages," he declared, and "they strike only as a last resort. A striker's goal, he added, is to "get off (public assistance) and go back to work as soon as possible."

Perlis agreed that there is a need to reform the welfare system, but charged that too often critics of the system "direct their fire against people in need . . . against the mothers of children . . . against the poor," rather than the system itself. He said they seem to feel that "it's perfectly all right for mismanaged corporations to be subsidized . . . with tax write-offs" and other measures.

"But as soon as you try to subsidize a hungry person, they yell blue murder," he declared, and that "makes no sense."

Questioning Perlis on the public affairs production of the AFL-CIO were Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc. The interview program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual Radio.

Nixon Policies Scored:

Council Statement On U. S. Economy

The following is excerpted from a statement on the national economy by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Aug. 9, 1971.

AS A RESULT of 2½ years of gross mismanagement by the Nixon Administration, the country is in an economic mess.

More than 5 million workers are unemployed. Several million more are working less than full-time because of production cutbacks. All Americans are the victims of unchecked rises in the cost of living, thus washing out much of their buying power.

The number of full-time jobs in the private economy has dropped about 1 million in the past two years.

Industry is operating at only 73 percent of its productive capacity, which results in large fixed costs and productive inefficiencies that apply upward pressures on prices.

Despite these conditions and despite their soaring profits of recent years, the banks have been raising interest rates.

While most economic indicators turn sour, the White House continues to make believe that America is in good shape. Instead of inspiring public confidence, this chorus of patently untrue economic forecasts is undermining public confidence.

The time for action and not slogans is long overdue. Therefore, the AFL-CIO Executive Council:

1. Again urges the President to release the $12 billion of appropriated funds he has frozen. This action would create jobs and boost sales by expanding essential government programs. . . . The unemployed, the underemployed and the nation's distressed communities should not be compelled to wait for the opening of the 1972 election campaign before the Administration boosts economic activities.

2. Urges the Congress to provide full funding of government programs to meet the nation's public-investment needs in such areas as low- and moderate-income housing, community facilities, education, health care and pollution controls.

3. Urges the Congress to raise the federal minimum wage to at least $2 an hour, immediately, and to extend the Fair Labor Standards Act's coverage to millions of low-wage workers.

4. Urges rapid expansion of money and credit, at lower interest rates, to stimulate economic expansion and ease inflationary pressures.

AS PUBLIC CONFIDENCE in the Administration's handling of the economy diminishes, a variety of programs for halting inflation have been suggested. To make our position clear, we restate the policy we first adopted in February 1966:

If the President determines that the situation warrants extraordinary overall stabilization measures, the AFL-CIO will cooperate so long as such restraints are equitably placed on all costs and incomes—including all prices, profits, dividends, rents, and executive compensation, as well as employes' wages and salaries.

Wages are only one factor in the cost of any product and actions which would freeze only wages and not other cost factors, would create economic chaos.

So we are prepared to sacrifice as much as anyone else, as long as anyone else, so long as there is equality of sacrifice. We will do our patriotic duty but we will not be the scapegoat.

In another related economic area, we want to make our position clear. We urge the Labor Department to reject the current proposal to drop the requirement of time and one-half pay for over eight hours of work per day on government contracts, under the terms of the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act and the Contract Work Hours and Safety Standards Act.

We support union and management efforts, through collective bargaining, to reduce working hours and to re-schedule work-week arrangements, to their mutual satisfaction. However, the eight-hour day standard was achieved after decades of trade union efforts and we believe that federal laws, covering work on government contracts, must continue to protect workers against excessive hours of work per day, as well as excessive working hours per week.

THE U.S. CHAMBER OF COMMERCE is leading a drive to "punish" the families of union strikers by banning them from public assistance during industrial disputes, AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis, center, charged on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Harry Conn, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times.

Luna Credits UTU Solidarity In Rail Victory

Miami Beach—The United Transportation Union's first convention since its creation by a four-union merger opened in an air of victory generated by the recently won wage-rules agreement with the railroads as more than 1,800 delegates gathered here.

Retiring UTU President Charles Luna praised the membership in his keynote address as "the real force" behind the contract settlement won on the rails.

"This was a real battle, we had our bread and butter on the line," he told the convention, "and I'm proud to say you fellows came through."

Luna made it clear that he felt "the right to strike selectively, which the UTU won in federal court and had confirmed in the Supreme Court, put the punch back into collective bargaining."

"We can now return to negotiations as a way of life instead of begging or taking the carriers' dictates," he said.

Reviewing other union achievements, Luna cited the passage of the Railroad Safety Act as the "strongest safety bill ever passed by Congress."

He also referred to the saving of passenger service through the creation of Amtrak and the reduction in the 16-hour maximum railroad work day.

Luna called Amtrak "the best we can do at this time," but predicted a revitalized passenger service and a bright future for Amtrak.

Luna, who will retire as the union's first president at the end of this year, headed the Railroad Trainmen at the time of the 1969 merger with the Firemen & Enginemen, the Conductors & Brakemen, and the Switchmen out of which grew the 260,000-member UTU in 1969.

The 19-day convention also will elect successors to Assistant Pres. H. E. Gilbert, who headed the Firemen & Enginemen before the merger, and Vice Pres. Homer L. Ellis, who are also retiring.

Oil Union Convention Backs Per Capita Hike

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A per capita increase of 50 cents a month to meet increasing costs of operation, including a wage increase for union employes, was voted by delegates to the biennial convention of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers. The increase was from $3.60 a month to $4.10.

The convention re-elected four top OCAW officers and voted a change in the union constitution to give Canadian unions more autonomy.

Returned without opposition for their fourth term were Pres. A. F. Grospiron and Sec.-Treas. B. J. Schafer. Vice Presidents Elwood D. Swisher and Anthony C. Sabatine were re-elected in a three-way contest with H. J. McClain, director of the union's Great Lakes district.

Swisher was first elected in 1955, when the Oil Workers merged with the Gas, Coke & Chemical Workers. Sabatine has been a vice president since 1965.

The amendment affecting Canadian members provides for the election of a Canadian national director as chief spokesman for OCAW members on all Canadian affairs. North-of-the-border delegates unanimously elected their incumbent director, Neil C. Reimer, of Edmonton, Alberta, who had been holding the post by appointment.

Another change authorizes the Canadian District Council of OCAW to enunciate all policies regarding national and governmental affairs of the dominion.

Convention speakers included William L. Kircher, AFL-CIO director of organization; Vice Pres. Joe Morris of the Canadian Labor Congress; Sen. Harold Hughes (D-Ia.); Dir. Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, and Ralph Nader, consumer affairs activist.

Rustin drew applause when he criticized both blacks and whites for their divisions. He scored black separatism but drew appreciative chuckles from delegates when he asked, "If we blacks could tolerate the Ku Klux Klan for 100 years, why do you whites get so excited about Stokely Carmichael?"

Nader complimented convention delegates for a resolution on environmental protection which he called "the strongest statement on this subject by any organization." Also he praised OCAW for its help in obtaining passage of the Occupational Safety & Health Act of 1970.

Newly elected to the executive board were George Hopkins of Santa Maria, Calif., Floyd Massey, Kansas City, Kan., and Al Perry, St. Paul, Minn. Re-elected were Rex Donohue of Kearns, Utah; W. E. Trapp, Oak Ridge, Tenn.; Frank Arnaud, Port Arthur, Tex.; Kenneth Eddleman, Lowell, Ind.; Angelo Augustino, Niagara Falls, N.Y., and Andrew D. Tuttle, Weyburn, Sask.

College Student Grants Approved by Senate

Legislation aimed at eliminating financial barriers to a college education won a 51-0 bipartisan endorsement from the Senate.

The bill it sent to the House would authorize nearly $6 billion a year for higher education, including vocational education programs.

Existing programs would be continued, and in some cases expanded. In addition, a new program of basic federal education grants would make up to $1,400 a year available to students from families that can't afford the full cost of a college education.

The amount of money—an outright grant, not a loan—would be computed under a formula tied to family income, number of children and unusual family expenses such as heavy medical costs. If fully funded, it would provide financial help in the middle-income as well as low-income ranges.

A companion program would give colleges grants of up to $500 for each student attending on a federal grant.

Needy students would also be eligible for various scholarship grants, subsidized loans and work-study allotments provided under present law.

Even if the House approves the bill, however, the scope of federal aid for higher education will probably be less than the legislation authorizes.

The Senate joined the House in passing intact a $1 billion appropriation to finance the emergency public service employment program for its first year. The appropriation was for the full amount authorized, and the President signed it into law.

Also in the fully-funded category was a $61 million appropriation for the National Foundation on the Arts & Humanities.

A statement by the AFL-CIO Council of Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes termed the action "most gratifying" to professional performers and other union members interested in expanding the nation's cultural resources.

A traditional compromise between the House and the Senate brought some progress in a labor-supported effort to increase federal funds to carry out the job-safety program.

The House had voted the $32.5 million for the program that the Administration had requested in the Labor Dept. budget.

The Senate boosted this figure by $10 million and a House-Senate conference committee settled on a $5 million increase.

Deck Officers' School Gets New Director

Dr. Arthur A. Limouze, president of the Massachusetts Maritime Academy, has been selected as director of the Maritime Institute of Technology & Graduate Studies, a labor-management educational project sponsored by the Masters, Mates & Pilots Division of the Longshoremen.

The institute is situated in Anne Arundel County, Md., and offers refresher training in ship radar and advanced navigation systems, meteorology and other subjects.

5-Year Program:

New Goals, Funds Voted by Plumbers

Denver, Colo.—Delegates to the 30th convention of the United Association of Plumbers & Pipe Fitters gave a vote of confidence to their newly elected president, Martin J. Ward, on his proposals for moving the union forward over the next five years.

The 3,000 delegates gave approval to Ward's programs, most notably a $1 increase in per capita payments, part of which will be used for increased organizing activity.

The additional dollar will be allotted as follows: 45 cents to the general operating fund, 25 cents to the burial fund, 15 cents to the convention fund and 15 cents to a newly established organizing fund.

Ward also was empowered to reallocate surplus organizing funds to the operating funds should the need arise.

Earlier, Ward and his entire slate of officers were elected by acclamation as the 52-year-old pipe fitter succeeded Peter T. Schoemann as head of the 320,000-member union.

Schoemann, who is 78 and had headed the union since 1955, was named president emeritus of the union and a voting delegate to all future conventions by a unanimously supported resolution.

In all, delegates considered more than 270 pieces of legislation. Among the actions they approved were:

- The addition of eight more international representatives to work in the field.
- Creation of a long-range planning and advisory committee to counsel the international president. Members of the committee are to be officers of local unions, in keeping with Ward's emphasis throughout the convention on making greater use of "grass roots" talent and experience.
- An increase of 1 percent a year in each of the next five years in the pension contributions made by local unions.
- An increase in death benefits, which are based on a sliding scale.

The convention also approved resolutions designed to strengthen the international's ties with its Canadian members and meet competitive and technological changes in the construction industry.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, in an address to the delegates, declared that no segment of the economy has been harder hit by the Nixon Administration's economic policies than the construction industry.

"The people who need houses, and the people who build them, have been sacrificed to tight money and to the misguided economic theories of obsolete academics," Kirkland said.

He denounced the current high interest rates—the high cost of money—for throwing hundreds of thousands of construction workers into unemployment lines and fattening the profits of bankers.

Kirkland said high interest rates are "like Robin Hood in reverse—they rob the poor to feed the rich. Perhaps that is why this Administration finds them so tolerable, for—make no mistake about it—this is a rich man's government."

He said a sense of commitment on the government's part to the "plain people" was lost in 1968 along with the presidential election and that this sense of commitment must be restored in 1972.

"The dismal, abstract economists who are calling the shots for this Administration must be replaced by men who will put the interests of the people of the United States above the interests of speculators and moneylenders," Kirkland told the convention.

COPE Director Al Barkan outlined a three-point program for victory in 1972: voter registration, voter education and financial support for labor's friends.

Barkan characterized the economic straits the nation is in today as the price of defeat in 1968.

"The only way you can reverse the sad course of political history is at the ballot box," he said.

Election Test Stressed At Potters Conference

Las Vegas—A united labor movement will demonstrate at the polls next year that it knows "how to distinguish our friends from our enemies," the Pottery Workers were assured by James Gildea, executive assistant to the AFL-CIO president, at the union's first educational convention here.

Of Pres. Nixon's economic "game plan," Gildea said "I don't believe it's going to work. I don't believe American workers will accept wage restraints, on top of recession and inflation, unless and until exactly the same restraints are applied to every other form of income."

From now until election day, Gildea said labor "does not intend to be stampeded or intimidated or diverted from our goal. That goal is to win an adequate standard of living for every man and family in the nation." He added:

"We do not measure adequacy by the Consumer Price Index alone. Our goal is a better life, as well as a better living, for all Americans."

Unions and their members "have a great deal of work to do on Capitol Hill and in the legislatures to work toward that goal," Gildea said.

Nearly 225 delegates from 100 local unions in the United States and Canada attended.

After Gildea's talk, the delegates formed five classroom groups to study and discuss organizing, labor law, job evaluation, incentives, public relations, communications, local union administration and record-keeping.

All the officers headed by Pres. Lester H. Null, Sr., and Sec.-Treas. George Barbaree, along with all international union representatives participated in classroom demonstrations in organizing, conducted by AFL-CIO Director of Organization William L. Kircher and in international labor law, conducted by Joseph E. Finley, the union's legal counsel.

The delegates chose Montreal as the site of the 1972 conference. By vote of 1970 convention delegates, the next constitutional convention will be held in 1974.

At 113th Convention:

ITU Urged to Study Single Pension Plan

Hollywood, Fla.—The Typographical Union's new industrial pension program has grown so rapidly that members should consider absorbing into it the ITU's older fraternal retirement program, Pres. John J. Pilch told the union's 113th convention.

Pilch reported that assets of the industrial plan will reach the $90 million mark within 90 days, as against not quite $12 million in the fraternal plan. He recommended that the executive council be authorized to submit an absorption proposal to the 1972 convention in Milwaukee and, if it is adopted, send it to a membership vote.

"The day is at hand when we can evaluate the feasibility of shifting the burden of providing pension benefits for all our members—those already retired and future retirees—to the employers in the industry we serve," Pilch said.

Individual members pay the full cost of the fraternal pension program. The industrial program, negotiated by local unions and employers, now covers nearly 50,000 of the ITU's 106,203 journeymen members, including retirees. It was launched nearly five years ago.

Pilch reported the start of construction of a new building to house the pension plan offices. Ground was broken recently at union headquarters in Colorado Springs.

The convention is scheduled to act later on Pilch's recommendation for a 10 percent increase in pension benefits for members retiring on or after Jan. 1, 1972.

The officers reported that classes at the ITU training center in Colorado Springs are getting bigger as more plants convert to cold type and offset methods of production. The center will operate at peak capacity for the balance of 1971, they said.

The report to the 350 delegates also noted that during the past year the union's contract bureau processed more than 2,500 contract proposals, negotiated agreements and signed contracts which were submitted by local unions for approval by ITU international officers. Still unsettled are two prolonged lockouts in labor disputes—in Toronto and Los Angeles—and strikes at the Pittsburgh Press and the Post-Gazette, at the San Rafael, Calif., Independent Journal and the Richmond, Va., Times-Dispatch and News Leader.

Sec.-Treas. William R. Cloud said an increase in average weekly earnings of working members—from $188.23 to $198.11—raised total earnings of 87,652 journeyman members by $28.6 million—from $874 million to $903 million in fiscal 1971.

The convention was scheduled to remain in session through Aug. 13. Guest speakers at early sessions included Pres. John Connolly of the Bookbinders; Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.); Miles Patrone, chairman of the labor relations committee of the American Newspaper Publishers Association; Pres. Charles Harris of the Florida AFL-CIO; Lieut. Gov. Tom Adams and Judge Joseph Boyd of the Florida Supreme Court.

Paper Mill, Union Set Ecology Panel

Fort Edward, N.Y.—The Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers established a joint union-management environmental protection committee with the Kamloops Pulp & Paper Co., Ltd., in British Columbia.

The committee is the outgrowth of a model contract clause adopted by the union last year that incorporates a six-point action plan for pollution abatement.

Fourteen members make up the committee that was agreed to by the union's Local 572 and the company. It is made up of six representatives each from union and management and two other optional choices.

The objective of the committee is to educate Kamloops employes on pollution problems and to recieve information, review environmental conditions and make appropriate suggestions, the union reported.

JOB EVALUATION AND TIME STUDIES are conducted in workshops at the 14th annual Union Industrial Engineering Institute held at the University of Wisconsin. The two-week course drew 39 full-time representatives of 13 unions for continuing study in the field of industrial engineering and its relationship to collective bargaining. The institute is sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research and the university.

Molders Elect Doyal President, Back Call for Organizing Push

Cincinnati—The Molders elected Draper Doyal to his first full term as president at their 35th convention and approved a dues increase from $5 a month to a minimum of $6 for the union's 75,000 members.

Doyal had been serving as president by appointment since June 20, when former Pres. William A. Lazzerini resigned a few days before his death. Doyal is the 112-year-old union's 15th president. His term of office is five years.

The delegates heard Sec. Reginald Bigsby read the president's report prepared by Lazzerini before his death. Also they approved their new president's call for intensified campaigns of organizing, political action and affiliation with AFL-CIO central bodies.

Doyal pledged manpower and funds for every local union that needs help in organizing its industry and area.

Membership has dropped somewhat because of the Nixon recession and automation, and the union must "move full speed ahead just to stay even," he declared.

Bigsby was returned for another term, as were Treas. Roland Belanger, Editor Edward Wulf and other officers. Eight vice presidents were re-elected and Charles Boyd of Bridgeton, N.J., was picked to take a vice presidency created by Doyal's elevation.

Belanger reported that the union spent more than $3.5 million in the last five years for the relief of strikers. The delegates voted to raise dues 50 cents a month for that fund, and to allot another 50 cents for local union expenses, including salaries.

The convention also voted to reduce the mandatory retirement age for officers and staff by one year every year until 1976, when 65-year-olds must step down.

Among major speakers were Ohio Gov. John J. Gilligan (D), Pres. Gilbert Jewell of the Allied Industrial Workers, Pres. Barney Weeks of the Alabama AFL-CIO, Paul Ornburn of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., Directors William L. Kircher of the federation's Dept. of Organization, Walter Davis of the Dept. of Education and Fred K. Hoehler of the Labor Studies Center, and Paul J. Burnsky, new president of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. Another was Sheldon Samuels, director of occupational health, safety and environmental affairs for the Industrial Union Dept.

The convention opened with a multimedia presentation by films, slides, live music and narration of the story of the labor movement. It was prepared by the University of West Virginia, with additions on the history of the Molders.

Doyal had been the union's first vice president for 11 years when Lazzerini resigned. He joined the Molders in 1930 in Gadsden, Ala., and held his card during depression years when there were not enough jobs in the trade.

He was employed in a Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. plant when the Rubber Workers were organized in 1933-36. He was named to a committee headed by Sherman Dalrymple, later URW president, to meet with management, and was fired the next day.

Doyal found work in the Somerville Iron Works in Chattanooga, Tenn., and became an active member of Molders Local 8. He served as local vice president, president, steward and central council delegate. He helped form the union's Soil Pipe Council for the South, became president of the Chattanooga Conference Board until he was named an international organizer in 1941. He has been an international officer of the union for 25 years since his election as ninth vice president at the 1946 convention.

DRAPER DOYAL

Jobless Rate Moves Up to 5.8% in July

jump as high as some economists had predicted.

A hefty increase had been expected after unemployment dropped sharply to 5.6 percent in June from May's 6.2 percent, a rate which matched the nine-year high reached in December. The BLS had indicated that the dramatic drop was a statistical quirk because the June survey week occurred before most students and graduates entered the labor force.

"The President thinks it's good news," said White House Press Sec. Ronald Ziegler of the July figures. "We have confidence in the course we are pursuing."

Although the number of workers with jobs rose during July—on both an adjusted and unadjusted basis—the increase wasn't enough to offset the increase in the labor force, the BLS said, and the jump in the jobless rate resulted.

Even though the number of unemployed workers dropped on an actual basis by about 160,000, these workers represented only a fraction of a civilian labor force which increased to 86 million.

After seasonal adjustment, unemployment rose from 4.6 million to 4.8 million.

Employment increased on a seasonally adjusted basis from 78.4 to 78.9 million, and the civilian labor force jumped from 83.1 to 83.8 million on an adjusted basis.

The BLS reported that the number of workers jobless 27 weeks or longer has climbed by more than 40 percent in the last 12 months, but on a seasonally adjusted basis, this category showed no change in July.

The number of workers unemployed 15 weeks or more totaled 1.3 million during July, up 140,000 from June. This total represented 1.6 percent of the labor force, the highest level in eight years.

The average duration of unemployment showed a decline from 12.7 to 11.6 weeks.

The BLS reported that nonfarm payroll employment declined by 190,000 to 70.5 million in July, and in manufacturing, employment fell to its lowest point in more than five years, with 132,000 fewer persons working than in June for a seasonally adjusted work force of 18.5 million.

About two-thirds of the July decrease took place in the durable goods industry. Employment fell sharply in primary metals, the BLS said, due largely to a cutback in steel production and to the copper strike.

The unemployment rates for adult men, married men, and women 20 years and over remained almost unchanged in July, but the rate for teen-agers, those in the 16-19 age group, jumped to 16.2 percent, after dropping to 15.8 percent in June.

The jobless rate for blacks edged up to 10.2 percent in July compared to 9.4 percent in June and 10.5 percent the previous month. The rate for white workers, at 5.3 percent, was basically unchanged.

Unemployment among part-time workers jumped from 7.6 percent to 8.7 percent while the rate for full-time workers was 5.2 percent, its lowest level since October 1970.

In its July report, the BLS added a special section on the status of Vietnam-era veterans in the 20-29 age group, noting that there were 3.8 million returning GIs in the civilian labor force last month.

Unemployed Vietnam-era veterans number 310,000, about the same level as in June, but 75,000 more than a year ago. Their unemployment rate, at 8.2 percent, was a full point higher than it was a year ago, and also a full point above the jobless rate for nonveterans in the 20-29 age group.

Seasonal adjustment factors cannot be applied to statistics on Vietnam-era veterans because the series has not been recorded long enough to evaluate seasonal trends.

The average workweek for rank-and-file workers on private nonfarm payrolls declined by two-tenths of an hour during July to 36.9 hours, seasonally adjusted.

In manufacturing, the average workweek was 39.9 hours, down one-tenth of an hour. Factory overtime also declined one-tenth of an hour to 2.9 hours.

Average weekly earnings fell 35 cents over the month to $127.22 due partly to the telephone strike. And in manufacturing, average weekly earnings showed a $2.18 drop to $141.33.

Compared with July 1970, average weekly earnings for all workers, however, were up by $5.77, or 4.8 percent. During the 12 months ended in June, consumer prices rose 4.5 percent.

Ravaged by Unemployment:

Senate Approves Aid For 'Disaster' Areas

The Senate voted 71-9 to authorize emergency federal aid to communities and workers hit by the "economic disaster" of soaring unemployment.

The premise of the labor-backed bill is that a sharp rise in joblessness can be as devastating as floods, drought, hurricanes and other natural disasters.

Federal law already permits the President—at the request of a governor—to designate areas as eligible for federal disaster relief.

Under the legislation sent to the House, the President could similarly proclaim areas, communities and neighborhoods as victims of economic disaster.

To be eligible, a community must have had unemployment at least 50 percent above the national average for six of the past 12 months, or else its unemployment rate over the past year must have doubled to at least 6 percent.

The jobless rise must be attributable to "the loss or curtailment of significant sources of employment or employment opportunity." The bill's sponsors interpret that last phrase to mean that unemployment caused by a general recession would qualify an area for assistance. The Senate voted 58-28 to reject a more restrictive amendment by New York Conservative-Republican Sen. James L. Buckley. He proposed to limit aid to communities where the high unemployment could specifically be tied to shutdowns or mass layoffs by major employers.

The final decision on whether an area is eligible for disaster relief would be up to the President. If he accepted a governor's recommendation, unemployed workers in the designated area would be eligible for:

- Up to one year of unemployment benefits. All jobless persons in the designated area would be entitled to jobless compensation, even if they had exhausted their regular benefits or were not covered by the state's unemployment compensation law.
- Mortgage or rental payments to prevent foreclosure or eviction.
- Surplus food and food stamps.
- Medical services for those unable to pay because of unemployment.
- Financial assistance in relocating to jobs elsewhere.

In addition, communities would be eligible for grants to maintain public services, and enterprises which could provide a substantial number of jobs would be eligible for federal loans not to exceed $1 million.

Congress holds the purse strings on the disaster relief program in a unique manner.

The Office of Emergency Preparedness, which administers disaster relief programs, has only a modest operating budget. But when the President proclaims a disaster, it is authorized to borrow money and services from other government agencies to conduct the assistance program. It then goes to Congress for a special apropriation to cover the cost.

Despite suggestions of a possible presidential veto, the final version of the bill mustered strong bipartisan support. Only a hard-core of conservative Republicans plus Virginia's Sen. Harry F. Byrd, Jr., voted against passage.

But Sen. Robert P. Griffin (R-Mich.), assistant GOP leader, warned that unless the House reshapes the bill into "more acceptable" form, "I believe a veto by the President can be expected."

The drive for the legislation began in May when the AFL-CIO Executive Council urged the concept of disaster assistance to communities affected by high unemployment, and prototype bills were introduced by the two senators from the state of Washington—Henry M. Jackson and Warren G. Magnuson.

The Senate Public Works Committee, under Sen. Jennings Randolph (D-W. Va.), and its Economic Development subcommittee, headed by Sen. Joseph M. Montoya (D-N.M.), gave the legislation high priority, and it was cleared for the Senate floor with unusual speed.

Montoya served as floor manager for the legislation, leading the fight against amendments that would have seriously weakened the bill and accepting modifications necessary to assure bipartisan support.

HUMANITARIAN AWARD of Histadrut, the Israeli Federation of Labor, is presented to Machinists Pres. Floyd E. Smith, right, for "outstanding efforts in fostering a sympathetic understanding between the people of the United States and the people of Israel." Leon H. Keyserling of the National Committee for Labor Israel made the presentation.

Machinists President Honored by Histadrut

San Francisco—Machinists Pres. Floyd E. Smith was honored with the Histadrut Humanitarian Award at a dinner attended by more than 700 well-wishing trade unionists.

Smith became the 14th American to receive the award, joining such notables as Harry Truman, Eleanor Roosevelt, George Meany and Walter Reuther on the list of Americans honored by the Israeli Labor Federation since 1950.

In accepting the award, Smith praised Israel and its labor movement saying that "the least they can teach us is that a nation with a purpose, a people with a commitment, can overcome any obstacle."

He said Histadrut "provides the workers and the people of Israel with a superb mechanism for participating in the nation's economic, social and political decsions."

"This too," be added, "is something which we in America can learn from."

The Humanitarian Award is presented for outstanding efforts in fostering sympathetic understanding between the people of the United States and the people of Israel and encouragement of the cause of Histadrut.

Presenting the award was Leon H. Keyserling, noted economist and president of the National Committee for Labor Israel.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland praised Smith for his contributions "to the free trade union movement both here and abroad," and said that of all the AFL-CIO's close fraternal ties with the labor movements of other nations, "I know of none that is closer than our tie with Histadrut."

Kirkland said the goals of Histadrut and the AFL-CIO are much the same for the workers they represent and went on to charge Treasury Sec. John Connally with "defeatism" for suggesting that unemployment could not be kept below 4 percent in peace time.

The effect of that statement, Kirkland said, was to tell Americans that "they have to get used to the idea of seeing 3.5 million of their fellow citizens barred from making a contribution to the society they live in, barred from the marketplace, barred from the hope of sharing in the good life that America promises."

"The argument that a free economy cannot thrive except on suffering, that its choices are only war or unemployment is not true when the Marxists say it," Kirkland asserted, "and it is not true when Secretary Connally says it."

He charged that other Administration spokesmen argue along the same lines saying, in effect, that "America cannot thrive unless some Americans accept substandard wages and living conditions."

Kirkland ended his remarks with the declaration that poverty and misery are inconsistent with the American ideal and a call for an Administration that would eliminate these evils instead of "one that counsels acceptance of them."

Copper Talks Resume with Last Holdout

San Francisco—Negotiations between copper unions and the American Smelting and Refining Co. resumed here after a break of more than a month following management's refusal to grant a cost-of-living clause and other contract improvements.

Asarco is the only one of the Big Four copper producers that has not reached agreement at any location in the strike of 35,000 workers that began July 1. The strikers are represented by the Steelworkers and 25 other cooperating unions.

A pattern for settlement was achieved several weeks ago but the Big Four and large independents have been accepting it on a piecemeal basis. The latest to accept were the Phelps Dodge Mining Co. for 538 steelworkers at the El Paso, Tex., refinery, and the U.S. Metals Refining Co. for 1,600 USWA members who stayed out a month to win a new three-year agreement at a copper refinery in Carteret, N.J.

The Carteret terms parallel the wage gains made in the can, aluminum and steel industries, the union said. An additional 20 cents an hour was added to "restructure" the wage rates, with 7.5 cents the first year for the mechanical trades and 12.5 cents the second year for production jobs.

The 26-union coalition said the first round of settlements in 1971 copper negotiations will be "virtually completed" when Asarco comes to terms and 6,000 workers win an acceptable pact in Montana from the Anaconda Copper Co.

FCC Prodded to Broaden, Enforce 'Fairness Doctrine' for Broadcasts

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO called on the Federal Communications Commission to "broaden and liberalize its fairness and related doctrines" and undertake "effective enforcement programs to make them a reality."

"It is high time," the federation's Executive Council declared, "for the FCC to stop being the handmaiden of the (broadcast) industry and to start concerning itself with the rights of the public."

The council cited the recent decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ordering the FCC to set up guidelines governing the fairness doctrine and the sale of air time for editorial advertisements.

The statement pointed out that during the recent rail and telephone strikes the companies involved broadcast "commericals disguised as institutional advertising which argued the employers' side" and that the stations did not offer the unions time to answer. It cited the refusal of two major networks to sell time to CWA to explain terms of the contract to its members and the upholding of this action by the FCC.

The FCC has also been "derelict in failing to adopt and implement principles which would give private individuals and groups a fair opportunity of access to the airwaves to present their views on public issues," the council said.

The agency's record in enforcement of the fairness doctrine and the personal attack rule "is even more shocking than its restrictive interpretation," the council charged. The FCC, it pointed out, has no aggressive enforcement program of its own, it simply sits back and waits for complaints and then sometimes undertakes enforcement "usually of a feeble sort."

The council concluded:

"We join the Court of Appeals in hoping that the commission's announcement of a broad-ranging inquiry into these matters means that it is at last awakening from its decades of slumber; and that it will not only broaden and liberalize its fairness and related doctrines but will undertake effective enforcement programs to make them a reality.

"The airwaves belong to the public and it is the public interest, not the licensees' profit from the use of this public property, which should be the commission's prime concern. We believe it is high time the FCC faced up to the task and acted responsibly."

Gleason Is Appointed To Pollution Board

Longshoremen's President Thomas W. Gleason has been appointed to the Water Pollution Control Advisory Board for a three-year term by Pres. Nixon.

Peter Nash Confirmed As NLRB Counsel

The Senate confirmed the nomination of Peter G. Nash as general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board.

Nash had been solicitor of the Labor Dept. before Pres. Nixon named him to the NLRB post. The nomination was routinely approved before the congressional recess.

Georgia Drive Launched for Health Security

Atlanta — A united labor - civil rights-community committee has been established here to push for enactment of National Health Security, a comprehensive health care program for all Americans.

The Georgia Committee for National Health Care wrote the members of the state's congressional delegation of the "desperate need to support substantive change in the existing medical care system."

Max Fine, executive director of the Committee for National Health Insurance took part in the group's first meeting.

Members of the steering committee include Herb Mabry, secretary of the Georgia State AFL-CIO; John Wright, president of the Atlanta Labor Council, and Andrew Young, civil rights leader.

Labor Rips Nixon Freeze, Tax Giveaway to Business

Order Wraps Nation, OEP In Confusion

By Tom Castor

A government agency designed to handle natural disasters—or the American economy in the event of nuclear attack—was given the task of assuring compliance with Pres. Nixon's 90-day wage-price freeze.

That agency, the Office of Emergency Preparedness, was groping and feeling its way around its new duties amid the economic shock waves and general disorder that attended the President's Aug. 15 Executive Order.

Phones rang incessantly in the Washington and New York branches of the OEP as it began its new operations with a notable lack of preparedness. There was heavy emphasis on responding to inquiries from the public as the OEP began establishing offices in 10 metropolitan areas across the nation.

In its first days of monitoring wage-price compliance and making pronouncements on who was affected by the executive order and who wasn't, the OEP made a number of contradictory statements.

For example, OEP first said that state and local public employes were covered by the order, then it said they were not. Again it backtracked and said they were.

But if the OEP wasn't immediately sure of the correct answers on the new economic plan, it could take comfort in the fact that no one else was, either.

It wasn't until an Aug. 18 meeting of the newly created, cabinet-level Cost of Living Council, that the official pronouncement was ORGANIZED LABOR's rejection of Pres. Nixon's economic proposals is detailed for newsmen by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. The federation president relayed the Executive Council's belief that Nixon is unable to manage the economy for the benefit of the majority of the nation's citizens.

'Foreign to American Concept':

Strike Ban Rejected As 'Dictatorial' Move

The AFL-CIO Executive Council flatly rejected the Nixon Administration's contention that it has the power to outlaw strikes during the 90-day wage-price freeze and said organized labor "will not abide by any such dictate."

"In peacetime, this is an assertion of dictatorial powers completely foreign to the American concept of freedom," said a council statement which AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany read to newsmen.

"Even in wartime, no other President asserted such a right.

"We will not abide by any such dictate and we will advise our members to resist any such attempt," the statement said.

The council advised all federation affiliates that if "as a result of the President's action, contractual provisions are impaired and members suffer losses, that those contracts have been nullified by the President of the United States."

"Such contracts should be subject to renegotiation at the first opportunity," the council said.

"Collective bargaining is the instrument workers use to establish a just relationship between the work they perform and the goods and services they have to buy," the statement added.

"We intend to see that the injustice imposed by the President is corrected at the collective bargaining table."

When newsmen asked Meany if workers whose contracts were nullified would then be free to strike, he replied: "In my book, they would."

Meany emphasized in his news conference that the Executive

Calls on Congress To 'Assert Control'

By John M. Barry

The AFL-CIO denounced Pres. Nixon's 90-day wage freeze as "unequitable, unjust, unfair and unworkable" and called on Congress to "assert control over the economy."

The federation's Executive Council, summoned to an emergency meeting Aug. 19 by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, declared in a unanimously adopted statement:

"We have absolutely no faith in the ability of Pres. Nixon to successfully manage the economy of this nation for the benefit of the majority of its citizens." (Text, Pages 4 and 5.)

It blamed the Administration's past policies for the nation's current "economic mess" and condemned the new game plan as "Madison Avenue gimmickry" that relies on "the infamous 'trickle down' theory."

The statement noted that the President proposes to give "huge sums of money belonging to the people" to big corporations in the form of a 10-percent investment tax credit and said:

"He would do this at the expense of the poor, the state and local governments and their employes, the federal government's employes and wage and salary earners. He froze wages and salaries. He forbade employers to limit the earnings of business, investors, moneylenders or speculators."

As for the President's contention that his program will create jobs and halt the rise in living costs, the council declared: "Neither of these claims is true."

It pointed out that the freeze provides "no effective machinery" to enforce the price controls and "no machinery at all to insure equity on the wage front or to correct manifest injustice."

The statement cited Administration efforts to outlaw strikes during the 90-day freeze and said:

"We flatly reject . . . the Administration's contention that it has any such power." (Story, this page.)

The council suggested to affiliates that where, "as a result of the President's action, contractual provisions are impaired and members suffer losses, that those contracts have been nullified by the President" and should be considered "subject to renegotiation at the first opportunity."

Meany, responding to questions at a news conference following the session, stressed that the AFL-CIO is not "advocating defiance" of the President's executive order.

Phone Pact Ratified, Beats Wage Deadline

Ratification of a new contract between the Bell Telephone System and the Communications Workers came just in time to avoid Pres. Nixon's wage freeze for most of the 500,000 workers involved, the union announced.

The only apparent exception was a unit of 21,000 New York Telephone Co. plant workers who voted, 11,405 to 9,734, to refuse the terms ratified by members of 22 other CWA units in the Bell System.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne said "we got in just under the wire." The Office of Emergency Preparedness, the agency which will monitor the freeze, notified Beirne that the basic wage increase agreed to as a first contract step, including retroactivity to the expiration of the prior contract, will not be barred by the freeze.

The only exception, the agency said, is the New York plant unit which rejected the contract offer and is still on strike. The freeze applies to that unit, but not to the other Bell and Western Electric units that ratified the settlement and returned to work after staying out for six days.

Government Employes Held 'Sacrificial Goats'

Government Employes Pres. John F. Griner charged Pres. Nixon with making "sacrificial goats" of 2.3 million federal employes by imposing on them a heavy share of the burden all workers will bear under the Administration's emergency economic measures.

Griner said Nixon gave federal employes a "slap in the face" when he ordered a 5-percent cut in the government workforce and a six-month postponement in a "catch-up raise" that 2.2 million white-collar workers were to receive Jan. 1.

Nixon had indicated prior to his executive order that he would veto legislation now in Congress that would give wage increases to about 700,000 blue-collar government workers.

Griner noted that the legislation authorizing the "comparability" increase for civil service employes also gives the President authority to suspend it in time of emergency.

Nor is the President required to ask Congress for approval of his decision to cut the federal workforce.

"The 100,000 federal employes who will be thrown out of work or forced to retire through the . . . 5-percent work force reduction will scarcely share in any rosy prosperity the President says his new economic game plan will

WHEN FLASH FLOODS and heavy rains created an emergency in Baltimore recently, the local AFL-CIO Port Council responded to the call for help in the relief operations by using their emergency mobile sound truck to assist in reaching and caring for the victims of the floods. Freeze Catches OEP Unprepared, Answers Filter Through Confusion handed down on state and local civil servants. The council said they were covered and their wages were frozen along with those other workers.

It is the OEP's primary function to monitor the freeze.

It is the Cost of Living Council's job to administer it—under the chairmanship of Treasury Sec. John B. Connally.

It is the task of the Justice Dept. to enforce the freeze, and it set aside a team of eight lawyers for that purpose. Federal injunctions and $5,000 fines are provided for violations of the freeze on wages, prices and rents.

Nixon appointed Prof. Arnold R. Weber as executive director of the Cost of Living Council which, besides administering the freeze, will make recommendations for programs to stabilize the economy after Nov. 12 when the freeze is scheduled to end.

Weber, who had just resigned from the government to return to the University of Chicago when he was offered the appointment, described himself as "strictly a 90-day wonder," adding that "I am leaving at the end of that time" whether or not the freeze is ended.

An all-day session of the Cost of Living Council at the White House cleared the picture somewhat on how the wage-price freeze will affect American workers.

The council ruled that the nation's 13 million federal, state and local civil servants are affected by the freeze, even though public employe union heads had warned earlier in the day of possible legal challenges and that some of their local affiliates might be disposed to take "economic action."

The council ruled that most of the nation's 2 million teachers also come under the freeze, stating they will not receive wage increases when they return to the classroom this fall unless those increases were negotiated in contracts taking effect before Aug. 15.

Ironically, in some instances this meant that first-year teachers would be earning more than their second-year colleagues. Some school officials indicated that the contract-date separation would mean an accounting nightmare.

In the case of recently negotiated increases in the basic steel industry, it appeared that Steelworkers would receive the first year's increment of its Aug. 1 settlement with nine companies.

That agreement provided 50 cents an hour in the first year of the three-year pact and 12.5 cents in each of the remaining years for 350,000 employes.

The Steelworkers union said it believed the first-year increment would not be affected, but there was some fear that another 100,000 to 200,000 workers not yet covered by the pact would be left out.

A union spokesman said several steel companies have not let implemented the new wage scale or have "lag-date" contracts.

But the Cost of Living Council had not issued official rulings on steel wages, or on the question of wages contained in apprenticeship contracts approved by the Labor Dept. or in the case of wage increases won by the Communications Workers for workers in the Bell system.

The OEP, however, did issue opinions in two of the areas.

It said that Bell system employes would receive their pay increases because their new contract—won after a week-long nationwide strike—went into effect the day before Nixon issued his freeze order.

On the question of apprenticeship contracts, the OEP said that such wage increases may be permitted only in accordance with the terms of apprenticeship agreements certified by the Labor Dept. up to, and including, the top step of the agreement. Increases beyond that step, the OEP said, are prohibited under the freeze.

Nixon Move Held Slap At Federal Employes

create," said the AFGE president.

Griner said the 5-percent cut in federal employment would mean not only the loss of jobs but also a loss of $600 million in wages and salaries that "would have fed a lot of purchasing power into the economy and created a very large number of private sector jobs."

With the cutback in employment and the postponement of the white-collar increase, about $1.8 million will be lost in wages and salaries.

The wage freeze also bars in-grade step-up increases based on length of service, according to the Office of Emergency Preparedness.

The second-stage increase of $250 a year scheduled for postal workers under their recently concluded agreement also is blocked by the freeze.

Griner pointed out that the white-collar raise was designed only as a "catch-up" measure for federal workers—an attempt to put their pay scales on a par with those for similar jobs in private industry.

And, he noted, "what the President neglected to mention is that the Jan. 1 pay raise would be based on salary comparisons collected between last March and June" when both wages and prices were considerably lower.

"Couple all this bleak reality with the tax breaks the large corporations are going to enjoy, and I don't really see how the President can expect the employes of the Executive Branch to be very enthusiastic about a new economic plan in which they are tethered out as sacrificial goats," Griner said.

"Frankly, the bugaboo of inflation does not seem to be such a terrible spectre, after all, to a person with a family and children who has no income at all, and that's exactly the future the President is offering to about 75,000 white-collar employes and 25,000 more blue-collar employes who will be caught up in the . . . work-force reduction."

As for the government's military personnel, a $2.4-million pay increase was scheduled for Oct. 1, linked to a new draft law now before Congress.

But the OEP said Congress must exempt the armed forces specifically from the wage freeze in order for the pay increase to take effect.

The New Game Plan

The following are the major points of Pres. Nixon's new economic plan:

Wage-Price Freeze—Pres. Nixon's Aug. 14 order freezes all wages, prices and rents for 90 days, or until Nov. 12, at levels not to exceed the rates prevailing during the month ended Aug. 14. Acting under the authority granted him by the Economic Stabilization Act of 1970, the President ordered that all increases in prices—with the exception of raw agricultural products—rents, wages and salaries not be paid in the next 90 days even if they were scheduled to take effect under existing contracts.

The freeze covers all wage increases, including those scheduled for seniority, longevity, merit and cost of living.

Treasury Sec. John B. Connally was named as chairman of a newly created, cabinet-level Cost of Living Council which is charged with general administration of the freeze.

In addition to Connally, the council will include the Secretaries of Commerce, Labor and Agriculture, the director of the Office of Management & Budget, the chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, the Special Assistant to the President for Consumer Affairs, and the director of the Office of Emergency Preparedness.

Monitoring of the freeze will be done by the Office of Emergency Preparedness, which the government said, "has a continuing responsibility for the planning and implementation of economic stabilization programs."

Besides administration of the freeze, the Cost of Living Council has the responsibility of recommending to the President "additional policies, mechanisms and procedures to maintain a stable level of prices and costs and minimize unemployment when the freeze expires."

The Justice Dept. will enforce the freeze and has named a team of eight lawyers for that purpose. Violators may be enjoined in federal courts, and will be subject to $5,000 fines.

Federal Employes—Pres. Nixon ordered a 5-percent cut in the federal civilian work force and postponed a Jan. 1 "catch-up" raise for 2.2 million white-collar workers until July. White-collar government employes will not be given step-up increments they normally would have received during the 90-day period.

Personal Income Tax—The President asked Congress to advance to Jan. 1, 1972, a $50 increase in personal income tax exemptions that had been scheduled for Jan. 1, 1973. This would be in addition to a $50 increase in personal exemptions already scheduled for the beginning of next year. Nixon also asked that the standard deduction be raised next Jan. 1 to 15 percent, with a $2,000 maximum, advancing that measure by one year, also.

Auto Excise Tax—Congress also was asked to repeal the 7-percent auto excise tax, effective after Aug. 15.

It was estimated that this action would mean a reduction of $200 on the purchase price of a new car, and a decrease in federal revenues totaling $2.3 billion.

Investment Tax Credit—The President asked Congress for a 10-percent tax credit for businessmen on the cost of new machinery and equipment produced in the United States and put into service on or after Aug. 16. This tax credit would drop to a permanent level of 5 percent one year later. A credit for public utility property would be allowed at one-half the rates for other property.

Federal Budget—To offset the resultant loss of $4.2 billion in federal revenues accompanying his programs, Pres. Nixon ordered federal budget cuts totaling $4.7 billion.

Besides cutting the federal work force and postponing federal wage increases until the end of Fiscal 1972, the President plans to slash the budget further by deferring for one year his welfare reform proposal and for three months the effective date of his revenue-sharing proposal to aid states and cities. Neither of these measures has been approved by Congress.

Imports—The Administration imposed a 10-percent surcharge on all imports except those not subject to duty now or limited by import quotas. Imports not subject to duty, and therefore excluded from the surcharge, ordinarily are products not available in the United States. Notably, this exclusion would generally exempt coffee, fish and raw materials such as ores.

A White House explanation of the import action said that most of the products covered by mandatory quotas also are subject to tariffs.

"Since imports of these products are already limited, the surcharge will not cover these items. The most important items in this category are crude oil, petroleum products, meat, sugar, dairy products and cotton textiles," the statement said.

Imports subject to the surcharge represent about 50 percent of the value of total imports.

Monetary Policy—Pres Nixon devalued the dollar by suspending the convertability of foreign-held dollars into gold. The effect of the action is to "float" the value of the dollar with respect to the currencies of other countries in world markets.

AFM Record Fund Rises to $7 Million

New York—Musicians who play for phonograph recordings will be eligible for payments totaling $7 million this year, AFM Pres. Hal C. Davis announced.

Payments into the Phonograph Record Manufacturers Special Payments Fund were up by $1.5 million, or 27 percent, over the $5.5 million distributed last year, Davis said. Payments to eligible musicians will be made beginning in September.

The fund, administered by a trust company, makes annual payments to all musicians who participate in recording sessions in proportion to the number of sessions they have played.

Council Condemns Nixon Wage Freeze

Assails Tax Giveaway to Business As Workers, Poor Pay the Price

"We are just saying we will not cooperate, that's all."

He said it would be up to each union to decide for itself when to seek renegotiation of its contract.

Meany made these other points in answers to reporters' questions:

- Labor will ask Congress to "nullify the tax giveaway that the President plans for big business" and to restore the $600 million in catch-up wage increases due federal white-collar employes "that has been taken away from them by Pres. Nixon."
- He has "no idea" how long the freeze will last but there is "every indication" that something of a permanent nature will replace it. "Actually, it smacks to me of a program that means an eventual attempt to impose government control on industry and labor, because in the final analysis, they can't control labor alone. They will have to control the whole works, if that is the road they are going to take."
- It would "make some sense" to put in escrow the deferred wage increases frozen by the President's order but "we have heard nothing from the Administration."
- Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson's suggestion that workers in the shops favor the President's program by as much as 4 to 1 doesn't square with the AFL-CIO's findings, and a newspaper poll that morning reported 65 percent opposed to the freeze.
- He had received a telegram from Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock supporting the AFL-CIO stand, and the Executive Council had unanimously instructed him to reply that the federation would be delighted to work with the UAW or any other union in this emergency. (Story, this page.)

The council adopted its statement after hearing and questioning George P. Shultz, director of the Office of Management & the Budget and one of the top advisers to the President who helped draw up the new economic program. Shultz was accompanied by Hodgson, Assistant Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., and Arnold R. Weber, a former Shultz aide who has been named executive director of the new Cost of Living Council set up to administer the freeze.

In voicing its lack of faith in the President's ability to manage the economy, the council urged Congress to "assert control . . . to provide an effective, equitable and enforceable economic stabilization program and to reject any and all administration proposals that would benefit only one sector of the economy at the expense of all others. . . .

"We will insist that controls on prices and wages be made equitable, and that all other forms of income—profits, interest rates, executive compensation, expense accounts, the prices of stocks and bonds—be brought under equal restraints.

The statement noted that the AFL-CIO has since February 1966 pledged to cooperate if such even-handed, across-the-board controls were deemed necessary.

"The President's program simply does not meet that test of equity," the council declared.

On other aspects of the new Nixon plan, the council said it supported elimination of the auto excise tax "provided there is effective machinery to insure that the consumer receives the full benefit."

It said the 10 percent border tax the President has imposed on imports "is at best a temporary stopgap" which exempts many products and "does very little to meet the major foreign trade problem created by the U.S.-based multinational corporations and international banks. . . ."

The council backed Nixon's actions in devaluing the dollar to curb speculation, but renewed labor's call for a thorough congressional investigation of the speculation, "including the activities of American-owned international companies and banks, and the profits they made from undercutting their nation's currency."

Summing up the President's action as "a new bag of tricks," the council charged that Nixon had ignored other options that were available to him that would be "more equitable, more constructive and more effective." Among these alternatives it listed:

- Channeling of public money to people, not corporations.
- Freeing the $12 billion in federal funds for needed projects that he has frozen.
- Controls on interest rates, "the greatest single contributor to inflation."
- Action to halt the export of American jobs and to curb the export of American technology and capital.
- Extension of unemployment compensation for jobless workers whose benefits have run out.
- Action to promote public employment by implementing badly needed federal construction, conservation and environmental programs.
- Controls on stock-market speculation and the channeling of investment away from speculative enterprises and toward housing for low and middle-income families.

LABOR'S PLANS in light of wage-price freeze are mapped out by AFL-CIO vice presidents meeting in special session at federation headquarters. Executive Council members were adamant in their intention to correct through collective bargaining the injustice imposed by the President.

Move to Outlaw Strikes Rejected as 'Dictatorial'

Council was not advising federation affiliates to strike in defiance of the law, but he vowed that when the freeze is over "the unions are going to say to the employer, 'Mister, we want that money you took from us. We want that money that you promised us, that you agreed to give us.' And they are going to look for new contracts that will get them that money as soon as they are free to do it through collective bargaining."

Two days before, the Administration had issued a thinly veiled threat to the 150,000 workers currently involved in work stoppages, asking them to return to work "voluntarily" and insisting that they faced injunctions and fines of $5,000 if they did not.

Organized labor also was asked by Federal Mediation Director J. Curtis Counts not to call any strikes during the 90-day period. Counts told newsmen:

"We are not holding a club over them." But he added he was not ruling out the possibility of direct back-to-work orders enforced by fines.

Later, Justice Dept. spokesmen warned that repeated violation of the no-strike pronouncement could bring fines ranging to hundreds of thousands of dollars.

On the day of the Executive Council meeting, Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson said the government had no present intention of imposing sanctions on strikes, because it expected strikers to return to work voluntarily.

Some 35,000 striking members of the Communications Workers in New York City have indicated they have no intention of returning to work until their dispute is settled. The unaffiliated West Coast longshoremen's union, which has been on strike for nearly two months, announced its walkout would continue.

During the freeze period, contracts affecting more than 200,000 aerospace and airline workers are scheduled to expire along with those covering 80,000 coal miners.

Meany, Woodcock Seek United Front on Challenge

Following is the text of telegrams exchanged by Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany:

"UAW, by unanimous action of its Executive Board, stands with AFL-CIO in its opposition to the unfair and discriminatory Nixon economic proposal. We are ready to join with you and all of American labor in necessary action to obtain an economic policy in the interests of the broad mass of the American people.

"Leonard Woodcock, President, International Union UAW"

"By unanimous action, the AFL-CIO Executive Council asked me to convey to the UAW its appreciation for your expressions of support for the position of the AFL-CIO in its opposition to the Nixon economic orders. I will be happy to meet with you to discuss and develop a program of cooperation in dealing with this challenge, and suggest this be done as soon as possible. Will call you shortly to arrange a mutually agreeable time.

"George Meany, President, AFL-CIO"

Auto Workers' Board Vows Contract Action

Boston—The Auto Workers put the Nixon Administration on notice that if the union's contracts are not permitted to operate as written, "we will consider them terminated and will act accordingly."

The UAW executive board, meeting here, said that under the circumstances of the wage freeze, "the workers are clearly entitled to reopen the contracts in order to restore the balance of equities reached in the course of negotiations."

The UAW board characterized Nixon's action as "outrageous."

It postponed a special UAW convention from Sept. 11 to Nov. 20 in Detroit and said the agenda at the convention will include "all necessary action to protect the integrity of our contracts, the collective bargaining rights of our members and the economic future of both the United States and Canada."

Meeting here in special session to consider the 90-day wage-price freeze, the board warned that "we will not permit abrogation of the wage provisions—the cost-of-living and annual improvement factor clauses — of our agreements."

The UAW board said that its current agreements were won only after "long strikes involving great sacrifices by hundreds of thousands of workers and their families and at a cost of almost $200 million in strike benefits."

In addition, the board said that aerospace and other workers represented by the UAW and now without agreements must be protected in their right to win—through collective bargaining — protection of the same principles.

The board authorized UAW Pres. Leonard Woodcock to propose to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Teamster Pres. Frank Fitzsimmons joint action to mobilize American labor against the Nixon order.

The UAW policy statement condemned Nixon's actions across the board except for his proposed ending of the auto excise tax which the union said it would support "provided the tax savings are passed on to consumers."

"But, the President's 5-percent cut in government employment will wipe out more jobs than would be provided directly and indirectly, even if the combination of excise tax cuts and the import levy were to increase demand for domestically produced cars by as much as 500,000 units."

The statement condemned the President's "discriminatory treatment of wage earners in contrast to the tenderness shown by the Administration for property income—profits, interest, dividends and even dirty gains from speculation against the dollar," and said this discrimination is underscored by "the expressed intention of the Administration to apply the freeze to wage increases coming due during the 90-day period under contracts signed previously."

"This is nothing short of outrageous," the board said, noting that "it was not done even during the Korean War when the UAW's cost-of-living and improvement-factor wage increases, and similar increases negotiated by other unions, were permitted to be put into effect as acceptable stabilization policy despite sweeping controls on prices and wages."

IUD Data Unit Offers Survey Of Major Pacts

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has made available to its affiliates a new computerized analysis of 101 major collective bargaining agreements as an aid to union negotiators.

The analysis is contained in the first revision since 1969 of the IUD Data Center's Major Contract Survey. Copies of the survey have been sent to IUD affiliates. Individual copies are available to local unions and their members at a cost of $2 from the IUD Data Center, 815 - 16th Street, N.W. Washington, D.C.

The surveyed contracts cover bargaining units embracing about 2 million employes during periods of normal employment, and their patterns affect a total of about 3.5 million workers.

Covered in the analysis are such items as wage increases, cost-of-living provisions, work rules, grievance procedures and a wide range of other matters common to collective bargaining contracts.

Text of Executive Council Statement

Statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Washington, D.C., Aug. 19, 1971.

When Pres. Nixon took office on Jan. 20, 1969, America was in the 95th month of the greatest period of sustained economic expansion in history. The unemployment rate was 3.4 percent, the lowest in 15 years.

Mr. Nixon had based his campaign for the presidency on two issues: the war in Vietnam and the dangers of inflation. He told the American people that the inflation rate of 4.2 percent then existing was unacceptably high. He promised to control inflation and stabilize the economy without unfairly burdening any one segment of the economy and especially without increasing unemployment. He promised, in fact, to pursue policies that would create 5 million new jobs during his term.

One month after taking office he reiterated, in a letter to the AFL-CIO Executive Council, his pledge to curb inflation "without asking wage earners to pay for stability with their jobs."

Pres. Nixon undertook to cool the economy by tightening the money supply and reducing expenditures.

His self-styled game plan has proved an unmitigated disaster.

Because of Mr. Nixon's economic mismanagement, the number of unemployed workers has nearly doubled over the last 2½ years. More than 5 million workers are without jobs; 14½ million Americans are on the relief rolls; the number of persons living in poverty has risen to 25½ million—the first increase in 10 years. More than 800 communities are economic disaster areas.

At the same time, instead of reducing inflation, the Administration's misguided policies actually accelerated it. The 4.2 percent inflation rate rose to 5.4 percent in 1969, Mr. Nixon's first year in office. It climbed to 5.9 percent in 1970, the highest rate in 20 years, and the end is not in sight.

Month after month, as unemployment mounted to 6 percent, the use of industrial capacity declined to 73 percent and interest rates soared to the highest level in a century. Mr. Nixon refused to take effective action to strengthen the economy. He vetoed recovery measures proposed by Congress. He impounded more than $12 billion appropriated by Congress for constructive, socially useful programs. He ignored powers given him by Congress to impose ceilings on interest rates. He refused to channel credit and investment into badly needed public programs. He opposed efforts by Congress to arm him with powers to stabilize the economy.

In the face of clear evidence to the contrary, the Administration insisted that its game plan was working, that inflation was declining, that employment was improving and that all was well. In fact, the President of the United States deliberately sought to mislead the people of the United States about the condition of the economy.

On Aug. 15, the President unveiled his new "game plan." Even then, he lacked the courage to admit that his tight-money policy had failed, and the honesty to admit that his previous game plan had led to America's economic mess.

Instead of sound solutions, the President offered a new bag of tricks; instead of programs to provide employment and meet the real needs of the American people, he resorted to Madison Avenue gimmickry.

Instead of extending the helping hand of the federal government to the poor, the unemployed, the financially strapped states and cities, and to the inflation-plagued consumer, the President decided to further enrich big corporations and banks.

STANDING ROOM ONLY was available at AFL-CIO headquarters as Federation Pres. George Meany read newsmen an Executive Council statement denouncing the Nixon Administration for in effect nullifying hard won contracts and attempting to outlaw strikes.

Continuing his campaign of deception, the President sought to make the public believe that his program will create jobs and halt the rise in the cost of living. Neither of these claims is true.

Mr. Nixon's program is based on the infamous "trickle-down" theory. It would give huge sums of money belonging to the people of the United States to big corporations. He would do this at the expense of the poor, the state and local governments and their employes, the federal government's employes and wage and salary earners. He froze wages and salaries. He forbade employers to implement wage increases already negotiated; he took no action to limit the earnings of business, investors, moneylenders or speculators.

He provided no effective machinery to enforce price controls and no machinery at all to insure equity on the wage front or to correct manifest injustice.

Following is our detailed analysis of the President's action:

Wage-Price Freeze

The AFL-CIO has, since February 1966, said that if the economic situation warrants extraordinary overall stabilization measures, the AFL-CIO would cooperate so long as restraints were equitably placed on all costs and incomes—including all prices, profits, dividends, rents and executive compensation, as well as employes' wages and salaries.

We said repeatedly that we were prepared to cooperate with mandatory government controls—if the President decided they were necessary—provided such controls were even-handed and across-the-board. But we have opposed any and all attempts at one-sided curbs on workers' wages, without effective curbs on prices, profits, interest rates and other incomes.

The President's program simply does not meet that test of equity.

All workers' wages are frozen for 90 days. During that period all cost-of-living adjustments are prohibited. Seniority, longevity and merit increases due workers are barred. Productivity increases are nullified.

However, not all prices are frozen. There are exemptions and loopholes through which prices may be increased. Eggs, fruits and vegetables —which every housewife must buy for her family— are exempt from the freeze. The 10 percent border tax on imports will be passed on to the consumer.

Executive compensation, through a variety of gimmicks such as deferred income, stock options and expense accounts, remains wide open for abuse.

New products and new housing—for which no price is now set—will not be effectively controlled.

With no machinery for enforcement of a price freeze, the consumer is at the mercy of corporate pricing systems and unscrupulous businessmen.

Wages, on the other hand, are effectively frozen because the individual employer has complete control over paychecks. The burden of the freeze falls on workers with highly visible collective bargaining agreements.

Specifically exempt from any freeze are interest rates, profits, stocks, the price of land, capital gains and dividends, except for the Administration's pious hope that dividends will not be increased.

The freeze is unequitable, unjust, unfair and unworkable.

Prices are at record levels and will surely continue to rise while wages have been frozen at a real earnings level below 1968.

Workers have been bearing the burden of both inflation and recession for 2½ years. And now they are being forced to bear the additional burden of a freeze.

The effect of the President's freeze is to nullify every collective bargaining agreement in private industry which provides a wage or salary adjustment during the 90-day period. Of course, employers will thus pocket additional profits; for their prices already reflect wage increases that are due, but which the President says cannot be paid.

The AFL-CIO pledge to cooperate with mandatory controls was based on the absolute essential of fairness, equity and justice. None of these is contained in the President's wage-price freeze.

The President contends that his wage-price freeze is preferable to wage-price controls because, he says, effective controls would require the creation of a major new bureaucracy.

This is a poor excuse for failing to give the country a stabilization program that would be equitable and enforceable.

The President argues that effective enforcement machinery would require a massive bureaucracy of the World War II size. This is not so. Controls during the Korean War did not require a massive bureaucracy, simply because there was no rationing.

The number of federal employes the President would strike from the government payroll is many times the number that would be needed to effectively enforce controls.

Taxes

We are amazed at the President's manifestly hypocritical label of "job development tax credit." Madison Avenue gimmickry cannot hide a blatant tax giveaway to big business at the expense of the average taxpayer.

We will fight this giveaway in the Congress.

There is no evidence that this kind of a tax break will even make a dent in America's unemployment problem. In fact, businesses that take advantage of it can be expected to invest in highly automated machinery which will not create jobs but only eliminate them.

The accelerated depreciation allowance which the Administration gave business in January was wrong. It will cost the federal treasury between $3 and $5 billion a year with a 10-year estimated cost of $37 billion.

To tack on a new tax break to business that will add another $4 billion a year in lost revenue is incomprehensible.

The President contends that the average taxpayer would get a comparable tax break by acceleration of personal exemptions by one year. For a $10,000 family of four that would be a tax saving for the year starting Jan. 1, 1972, of $57. Of course, the President's tax break to business would take effect retroactively to Aug. 15, 1971.

What America needs is tax justice, not expanded tax windfalls. Effective loophole-closing—especially in the area of capital gains, depreciation, tax-free municipal bonds, depletion allowances and the like—would permit expansion of public facilities and raise sufficient additional revenue to enable a reduction in the relative tax burden of low- and moderate-income families.

Instead, the Administration has chosen to give more tax breaks to wealthy corporations. This raid on the federal treasury would be financed by delaying welfare reform, postponing promised help to financially-strapped states and cities, cutting federal employment by 5 percent, and forcing federal employes to wait until July 1, 1972, for a wage increase they have already earned.

The 10½-month delay in the pay increase for federal white collar workers is a signal that the President does not intend to end the freeze in 90 days.

Local taxes are set on the basis of mandated wage increases for public employes which the President bars them from receiving for 90 days. However, the tax will be collected for that period. So the taxpayer and the public employe both suffer a manifest injustice.

Despite the President's contentions that his program is designed to promote employment, we firmly believe the net result will be fewer jobs.

Auto Excise Tax

We support the elimination of this inequitable tax provided there is effective machinery to insure that the consumer receives the full benefit.

However, stimulation of the auto industry alone is not the key to improving employment. There remains a large, unfilled need for public investment and expanded public services.

Many of these needs would have been met by the Accelerated Public Works Act of 1971, which the President vetoed. State and local governments need federal assistance in mass transit, air and water pollution controls, sewage facilities, water supply, health facilities, hospitals, schools and libraries. The President's new economic program contains nothing which will expand or improve public facilities, which merit priority in the allocation of resources.

Foreign Trade

The border tax, which the President has placed on imports under existing powers, is at best a temporary stopgap.

It is not a 10-percent tax on all imports as the President indicated to the people. Many goods are exempted, and the full tax will not be levied on those goods which already are taxed at a rate currently less than 10 percent. For example: imported cars are currently taxed at 3½ percent. The increased tax will only be 6½ percent.

The border tax does very little to meet the major foreign trade problem created by the U.S.-based multinational corporations and international banks, which have accounted for most of the export of American jobs.

Taxes on licensing and patent agreements and on overseas profits of U.S. corporations are the way to approach this problem and the President studiously avoided them.

The Administration proposes to permit corporations to establish export subsidiaries—Domestic International Sales Corporations—whose profits would not be subject to the federal corporate income tax, until such a time as they are returned to the parent corporation in the form of dividends.

The yearly loss of federal revenue is estimated at from $630 million to $925 million. This loss in revenue would have to be made up by other taxpayers—primarily by middle- and low-income taxpayers.

The DISC loophole provides no incentive to increase U.S. exports. The tax deferral would flow to all firms for all their exports, so long as the exports are conducted by DISC subsidiaries—regardless of whether such exports increase, decline or remain stable.

The important issue of the deteriorating U.S. position in world trade needs direct government action rather than tax subsidies for big business.

Devaluation of the Dollar

We support the President's actions on the dollar; however, we believe honesty and candor would have been best served if the President had admitted that his actions amounted to a devaluation of the dollar on the international money market. There is nothing to be gained by playing word games with the American people.

We agree that actions had to be taken to curb international money speculators. But it is important to know who these speculators are. Therefore, we renew our call for an early and thorough Congressional investigation of international speculation against the American dollar, including the activities of American-owned international companies and banks, and the profits they made from undercutting their nation's currency. This must never be allowed to happen again.

Options the President Ignored

Other options—more equitable, more constructive and more effective—were available to the President, but he ignored them.

In fairness to the American people, the President should channel public money to people, instead of to corporations.

He should free the $12 billion in federal funds that he has frozen.

He should act to control interest rates, the greatest single contributor to inflation.

He should act to control stock-market speculation. Instead, through uncontrolled capital gains, the very people who pay little or no taxes are receiving huge new windfalls through speculation in the stock and bond markets. Wall Street is not a barometer of the nation's true economic health.

He should channel investment away from speculative enterprises such as resort hotels and gambling casinos and toward housing for low and middle-income families.

He should act to halt the export of American jobs and to curb the export of American technology and capital.

He should act to extend unemployment compensation for those whose benefits have been exhausted through prolonged unemployment.

He should act to promote public employment by implementing badly needed federal construction, conservation and environmental programs, and by speeding action to put money in the hands of state and local governments.

He should, at long last, begin planning for reconversion from wartime production to a peacetime economy.

Of course the President's contention that unemployment during his administration was caused solely by the winding down of the war is not true. Yet he has not established a single viable program for finding jobs for veterans or for those previously employed in defense industries.

Above all, he should implement programs to create jobs, in both the public and private sectors instead of siphoning off more and more public funds for the benefit of rich corporations.

The AFL-CIO Position

We in the AFL-CIO take no satisfaction in the fact that we have warned the Nixon Administration throughout its term in office that its actions were going to achieve the kind of economic mess the nation is in today.

The record will show that we repeatedly and publicly suggested programs and policies to the Administration that would have curbed inflation and achieved full employment. The President ignored them or refused to adopt them.

We have absolutely no faith in the ability of President Nixon to successfully manage the economy of this nation for the benefit of the majority of its citizens.

Therefore, we call upon the Congress to assert control over the economy, to provide an effective, equitable and enforceable economic stabilization program and to reject any and all administration proposals that would benefit only one sector of the economy at the expense of all others.

Specifically, we urge the Congress to reject the President's proposals to further enrich the corporations at the expense of the poor and needy and the public treasury.

We will fight to block his discriminatory attack on the jobs and the wages of federal employes.

We will insist that controls on prices and wages be made equitable, and that all other forms of income—profits, interest rates, executive compensation, expense accounts, the prices of stocks and bonds—be brought under equal restraints.

We have never recommended and do not now recommend defiance of lawful orders. We do suggest and recommend to our affiliates that where, as a result of the President's action, contractual provisions are impaired and members suffer losses, that those contracts have been nullified by the President of the United States. Such contracts should be subject to renegotiation at the first opportunity.

The Administration is attempting to outlaw all strikes during this 90-day period.

We flatly reject the Administration's contention that it has any such power. In peacetime, this is an assertion of dictatorial powers completely foreign to the American concept of freedom. Even in wartime, no other President asserted such a right. We will not abide by any such dictate and we will advise our members to resist any such attempt.

Collective bargaining is the instrument workers use to establish a just relationship between the work they perform and the goods and services they have to buy. We intend to see that the injustice imposed by the President is corrected at the bargaining table.

We reiterate the pledge we have made on numerous occasions since February 1966. We will cooperate with fair, equitable, across-the-board mandatory controls on all costs, prices and incomes including profits, interest rates, dividends and executive compensation as well as workers' wages and salaries. The President's program does not meet that test. We will not be a party to deceiving the American public into believing that the President's program is fair, equitable or workable.

'Tell You What I'm Gonna Do . . .'

Agenda for Action

WHEN THE CONGRESS returns from its August recess, it will face a full agenda. Much remains to be done before adjournment time if national programs aimed at strengthening the economy and otherwise improving the quality of life in America are to be enacted without further delay.

The AFL-CIO legislative agenda for the remainder of the first session of the 92nd Congress includes:

● Passage of Fair Labor Standards Act improvements providing a minimum wage of at least $2 per hour and extending coverage to all workers still denied the law's coverage. We will flatly oppose the establishment of special, sub-standard minimum rates for young workers. In addition, we believe the principle of "equal pay for equal work" regardless of sex should be extended to administrative, executive, and professional employes.

● Action by the House Ways & Means Committee on H.R. 22—the bipartisan National Health Security bill. Congress must begin, immediately, to give serious consideration to this badly needed and long-overdue national program for financing the comprehensive health care of all Americans.

● Immediate action to meet the critical need for trade legislation. Congress should seize the initiative and hold hearings, leading to legislation, on the AFL-CIO's nine-point program designed to halt the export of jobs.

● Congressional creation of an urban development bank and the greater availability of mortgage money for the house buyer and the home builder. These actions represent the best means of providing housing for all at low interest rates. We will also support the metropolitan housing authority in H.R. 9688 which is designed to build low- and moderate-income housing in the suburbs.

● Passage of a two-year extension of the Office of Economic Opportunity's anti-poverty program. Included within this legislation should be provisions for a comprehensive day-care program, creation of a non-profit legal services corporation, and a strict limitation on funds that can be used by OEO for experimental programs such as "educational vouchers" and performance contracts.

● Enactment of emergency school aid legislation providing school districts with badly needed funds for desegregation programs. Without such funds, school districts will be unable to comply with court orders and HEW Title VI guideline requirements. Funds also are needed by those districts developing voluntary integration programs.

● CONGRESSIONAL ACTION on new legislation dealing with the nation's crisis in higher education. Passage of amendments to the Higher Education Act are badly needed if the opportunity for education beyond the secondary level is to be available to all on the basis of quality.

● Establishment of an independent consumer protection agency. Legislation has been introduced and hearings held in the House to establish, by law, an Office of Consumer Affairs.

All of these are high priority items. Each is concerned with a vital area of need. All these goals can be—and should be, achieved by this Congress in this session. We will do everything in our power to push this agenda for action.

'You Call That a Clear Picture?'

A Word Edgewise:

Dying Elm Falls in Legal Snarl After Living for a Coon's Age

By John P. Roche

MARTHA's VINEYARD, MASS.— First of all, I want to thank all the readers who took the time and trouble to send advice on handling raccoons. It is hard to believe that so many raccoon experts exist in the land, and—since the sheer bulk of advisory opinions makes individual responses impossible—you all should know that we are grateful. Indeed, the Chilmark Committee for a Sane Raccoon Policy (CCSRP) met last night and is beginning to experiment with a number of the suggestions that came in.

At the moment the coons seem to be preoccupied with a jurisdictional dispute with the skunks, who have traditionally viewed the island as their turf. Reportedly there was a battle-royal down in West Tisbury a while back. The results are unknown: the massive chemical warfare employed by the skunks drove all human beings from the vicinity.

The saddest event of the summer, however, has been the condemnation of the elm tree which has for years provided shade for the barn. I suppose it was inevitable, but somehow we all assumed that since our elm had survived and flourished, it was immune to the Dutch blight. Now, as this is being typed, the tree men with their chain saws are cutting it down.

For the benefit of young readers (it came as a terrible shock to learn that half the population of the United States has been born since World War II) a few words on the former status of the elm might be in order. When I was a kid, one of the features of New England towns was a spectacular collection of wineglass elms. I'm sure they were found all over the northern United States, though the only ones I saw were in Connecticut. An urban youngster, I was flabbergasted: they were enormous and beautiful shade trees, unlike anything that grew in Brooklyn or Long Island.

Then like the Black Plague the blight hit, and—despite desperate efforts to discover a remedy—the elms began to wither and die. This summer we have witnessed at first hand this awful process. At the beginning of the summer, the elm came out with its usual lush foliage. Early in July someone noticed that sections seemed to be very dry and yellow—leaves began to fall. There has been very little rain, so we optimistically attributed this to the drought. But self-deception was futile. We called a tree expert.

The tree expert doubles as the tree warden, still an elected office in New England, and when he arrived, he almost wept. Like a good old-fashioned family doctor, he tried to be reassuring—perhaps it was the drought. He had samples cut off and sent to the lab on Nantucket and went firmly about his duty, which was to provide due process of law for our elm.

This was my first encounter wtih due process of law for elms, and it was fascinating in a sad way. On the tree, with official sanction, the warden nailed a sign that read "SUSPECT," followed by an admonition that removal of this accusation could result in legal pains and penalties under Massachusetts statute. For a week we waited, hoping against hope that the news would be good.

BUT LUCK had run out: the warden returned, removed the SUSPECT sign and replaced it with a poster that announced in large red letters "CONDEMNED." Again there was a warning that the sign could not be removed and that the tree must be disposed of according to law. This, of course, required expert handling; the elm had a diameter of about three feet and could not be taken down by amateurs. So we found a tree man and now he is at work.

In all this we found only one source of amusement. According to the law governing disposal of diseased elms, they must be burned completely and totally.

However, as of July 1, the Great and General Court—our legislature—absolutely banned outdoor burning as a technique of rubbish, and presumably tree, disposal. This leaves the man who is taking out the elm in a peculiar legal bind, but we have enough problems of our own. He will just have to work it out with the solons in Boston.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

FCC Pressed on Enforcement:

TV, Radio Fairness Doctrine Held Vital to Public Interest

The following is from a statement on the Federal Communications Commission and its Fairness Doctrine by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, issued Aug. 10, 1971, in San Francisco.

THE FEDERAL Communications Commission has announced that it is instituting "a broad-ranging inquiry into the efficacy of the Fairness Doctrine" and other related commission policies.

The AFL-CIO joins the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in hoping that this inquiry will result, as the court put it, in "proposals to reform the commission's Fairness Doctrine and invigorate its enforcement, so lackluster in the past." For we agree with the court that the Fairness Doctrine is in need both of substantive reform and of much more effective enforcement.

The fact that the United States has, as the FCC announcement puts it, "a commercially based broadcast system" tends to the neglect of public issues in favor of commercial advertising and, moreover, facilitates the slanting of programs by the commercial interests who pay for the programs.

During the recent rail and telephone strikes programs sponsored by the Association of American Railroads and the Bell System broadcast commercials, disguised as institutional advertising, which argued the employers' side of the pending labor disputes. The stations which carried this employer propaganda did not offer the unions time to answer.

Moreover radio stations have sometimes broadcast commercials soliciting listeners to patronize a store whose employes were on strike, and have then refused to sell the union time for an appeal to listeners to respect the picket line. These breaches of the Fairness Doctrine were sustained by the FCC, and it is only by order of the Court of Appeals that the commission is now reconsidering these decisions, along with other aspects of the Fairness Doctrine.

The same networks and stations which have permitted private corporations to use commercials to publicize their points of view on controversial public issues have rejected applications by non-profit organizations and groups to buy time for the discussion of public issues on the ground that it is contrary to the policy of the network or station to sell time for the discussion of public issues.

Here again the FCC supported the networks and stations, and once again the Court of Appeals has reversed the commission.

The court recently ruled in a case brought by the Democratic National Committee that a flat ban on all editorial advertising is not permissible, and it has directed the FCC to develop guidelines spelling out the obligation of broadcasters to sell reasonable amounts of time for editorial advertisements.

We agree with the Court of Appeals: it is particularly important that representative community groups have a reasonable opportunity for access to the airwaves since newspaper proprietors claim an absolute discretion to accept or refuse advertisements at their pleasure.

Newspaper proprietors may have such a right under the First Amendment, but it is clear that radio and TV stations do not. In the Red Lion case the Supreme Court declared: "There is nothing in the First Amendment which prevents the government from requiring a licensee to share his frequency with others and to conduct himself as a proxy or fiduciary with obligations to present those views and voices which are representative of his community and which would otherwise, by necessity, be barred from the airwaves."

Notwithstanding the ruling of the Court of Appeals in the Democratic National Committee case, the FCC has again, since that ruling, sustained the refusals by NBC and CBS to sell time to CWA, following the settlement of the recent telephone strike, to explain to its members the terms of the contract that had been negotiated.

THE FCC's RECORD on enforcement of the Fairness Doctrine, and its offspring, the personal attack rule, is even more shocking than its restrictive interpretation. For the FCC has no affirmative, aggressive enforcement program of its own. It simply sits back and waits for complaints and then, sometimes, undertakes some sort of enforcement action, usually a feeble sort. Blatant violations of the Fairness Doctrine which would warrant license cancellation draw, instead, a $1,000 fine.

Large metropolitan areas sometimes contain groups with the know-how and resources to do the commission's job for it, but that is not true throughout most of the country. The result is that over wide areas of the nation the airwaves are flooded with right-wing propaganda programs, often syndicated and often libelous of any public figure to the left of Sen. Goldwater. This picture has prevailed for many years, yet the FCC has never developed any effective enforcement program to ensure even minimum enforcement of the fairness and personal attack rules.

We join the Court of Appeals in hoping that the commission's announcement of a broad ranging inquiry into these matters means that it is at last awakening from its decades of slumber; and that it will not only broaden and liberalize its fairness and related doctrines but will undertake effective enforcement programs to make them a reality.

The airwaves belong to the public and it is the public interest, not the licensees' profit from the use of this public property, which should be the commission's prime concern. We believe it is high time the FCC faced up to the task and acted responsibly.

Federal Standards Pressed:

Jobless Crisis Stirs Demand To Improve Unemployment Aid

IMMEDIATE FEDERAL ACTION is needed to update the unemployment insurance system to meet the severity and duration of the nation's unemployment crisis, AFL-CIO social security specialist James O'Brien declared.

Despite the rise of unemployment during the economic sag of the last two years, "few states have responded to the President's plea . . . to enact legislation" raising maximum benefits to two-thirds of the "state-wide average weekly wage," said O'Brien, assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Social Security. He pointed out that only about half the unemployed are covered by the present system, and that every week, some 160,000 of those exhaust their benefits before they have found employment.

O'Brien said the unemployment compensation amendments extending the period of protection adopted by Congress last year still haven't become reality for unemployed workers in most states. He noted that although states could have adopted measures to activate the extended benefits program as early as last October, only 18 have, so far.

Appearing on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System, O'Brien stressed that the growing need to improve and standardize unemployment compensation throughout the country stems from the changing makeup, as well as the growth, of the jobless rolls.

O'Brien renewed the call for federal standards for coverage, amount and duration of benefits that would apply to unemployment compensation in every state. He said the AFL-CIO has urged the Administration to include federal standards in the bill it sent to Congress two years ago, but the Administration failed to do so.

The time has now come, he said, for "the President to propose legislation that will eliminate this great diversity in the benefits structure of the program, and provide more meaningful and immediate help to the unemployed."

By Press Associates, Inc.

A FEW WEEKS AGO Interior Sec. Rogers C. B. Morton announced "initial plans for a proposed program to develop oil shale resources on federal lands in three Western states."

The announcement got little if any attention in the press and has more or less dropped into limbo. Yet, it is of tremendous importance to the American people.

Either the American people are going to profit by oil shale development or private interests—some of them already quasi-monopolies—are going to take the oil shale lands over and use them for their own private advantage.

Oil shale is a very finely grained sedimentary rock that contains enough organic matter in the form of hydrocarbon to yield oil when properly processed.

A problem with oil shale is that it is a great deal more expensive to produce and refine than free oil and gas deposits in oil-bearing regions of the world. Its tremendous economic importance, however, lies in the fact that it represents a vast oil reserve in a world that is increasingly using up normal oil and gas deposits. The day, too, may well come when it is more competitive than it is now. Giant oil corporations are not unaware of this.

In any event the value of U.S. deposits has been estimated in the billions of dollars. The stakes, therefore, are large. No hard and fast policies have as yet been laid down and the Morton announcement of a "prototype program" for oil shale development therefore is of the utmost importance.

The Secretary has taken a gingerly approach to the problem, obviously in recognition of the intense emotion that surrounds it. His program would involve public and industry participation in selecting up to six oil shale tracts, two each in Colorado, Utah and Wyoming, to be offered for lease by sealed, competitive bid late in 1972.

He has said that no final decision will be made to proceed with the leasing program before mid-summer of 1972 and that no program will be approved that does not meet strict "environmental integrity" standards. The amount of land to be leased to any one company will be limited. If the six leases are eventually offered and sold, they will "comprise only a fraction of 1 percent of federal holdings in the region." Nevertheless, there are still many unanswered questions.

ORGANIZED LABOR has long been deeply concerned with what happens to the oil shale lands. In fact, without its strong opposition, these immensely valuable national possessions might long since have been turned over to private interests.

Back in 1967 when the question of exploitation of oil shale lands last became a major public issue, the AFL-CIO warned that it was determined to fight any development of these lands "that did not bring the broadest possible benefits to the public welfare, to strengthen the economy, to insure constructive competition, to prevent private monopoly over major natural resources and to protect the affected environment."

The attitude of organized labor in general was, and still is, that the oil shale lands shall not be developed until environmental problems have been clearly solved, that strip mining be banned, and that future development should be along the lines of the Tennessee Valley Authority, thus providing a "yardstick" against which other competitive fuels can be compared.

Morton's plans for his "prototype program" are along the lines of 1967 Interior Dept. proposals which were then strongly opposed by organized labor. The Secretary stresses "environmental protection," but makes no mention of a TVA type of approach to future development.

The public as well as organized labor has an infinitely greater stake in oil shale than the Morton "prototype program" contemplates.

THE SCOPE, severity and duration of the nation's unemployment crisis have outstripped the capacity of the present unemployment insurance system to protect jobless workers, James O'Brien, center, told reporters Alex Uhl, left, of Press Associates, Inc. and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine on Labor News Conference. The AFL-CIO produced public service interview is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

How to Buy:

Auto Tire Guarantee Essential Against Defects, Tread Wear

By Sidney Margolius

AS WE RECENTLY REPORTED, the tire safety law of 1966 directed the government to promulgate grade standards for tires under such simple designations as grade 1, 2, 3 or 4, so that you can compare values more readily. But establishing such grades has proved difficult. Meanwhile, the tire business is still a jungle of unreliable designations established by manufacturers themselves such as "premium," "first line," and so on, and of widely-varying prices.

Checking 20 dealers in one Eastern city recently, we found a range of prices on tires sold as first line all the way from $18.49 to $31. The average was $26.80. For polyester cord tires, the range was somewhat narrower, but it still went from $24.75 to $36, with an average of $30.44. For second-line tires the range also was remarkable; from $16 to $30, an average of $22.34.

Guarantees vary too, and it is important to compare them because the kind of guarantee is one of the values in buying a tire. Consumers often are unhappy about the size of additional adjustment charges they may have to pay when exchanging a defective tire.

Most warranties or guarantees provide a pro-rate allowance on another tire if the one you bought has failed within the terms of the warranty; but not actual replacement. The terms themselves can vary from a guarantee of so many months, to a guarantee for the life of the tread, which may or may not include all road hazards.

But in addition, the guarantee may provide that the exchange will be based on the higher "list" price, not on the lower "sale" or reduced price which you may have paid. If based on the "list" price, which actually may be an artificially high price, the guarantee has less value to you.

Federal Trade Commission rules supposedly require that whenever ads refer to guarantees, the ad must disclose "clearly and conspicuously" the price basis on which adjustments will be made. Yet the Detroit Better Business Bureau recently reported in 1971 that it had found many ads offering "lifetime," "36-month" or "48-month" guarantees without qualifying explanations.

You also need to distinguish between what the advertising may seem to imply and what the written guarantee actually promises. One consumer complained to the Michigan Consumers Council that TV commercials for a brand of "super tires" suggested that they were good for 40,000 or 50,000 miles. But his wore out at 18,000 miles and it cost $87 to replace them.

IN SHOPPING for tires we found four kinds of guarantees usually offered:

1. Guarantees for a specified number of months, against defects and road hazards, with no guarantee on tread wear, and adjustment prorated by months. (This kind of guarantee appears most useful for heavy users who might wear out a tire relatively quickly.)

2. Mileage guarantees against wearout plus defects and road hazards, with adjustment prorated by number of miles traveled. (This is a better guarantee, but usually is found only on costlier tires.)

3. Guarantees providing for adjustment prorated on tread wear (usually best for the low-mileage driver).

4. Complete replacement at no cost during part of the guarantee period, usually if used for less than 20, 30 or 40 percent of the guarantee period. After that, the adjustment is pro-rated by any of the above methods. (This is a relatively good type of guarantee, but not many sellers use it; most pro-rate from the start.)

But that is only part of what you have to look for in the guarantee. The second part, as previously indicated, is the base price. Any of these guarantees may be based on the "list price" which is usually the least-beneficial base price to the consumer; or on the "replacement price," usually about 15-20 percent of the list price.

Actually some of the better guarantees found were those offered by large discount department stores and other big retailers and mail order catalogs on their own brand tires.

While we did not check the guarantees of all the large oil companies who sell their own brand tires, those we did check tend to adjust on the basis of remaining tread depth, and calculate the allowance on their regular prices rather than sale prices. Typically, if a $19.95 tire is damaged beyond repair, the guarantee allows $1.81 for each 1/32nd of an inch of tread remaining beyond the legally required remaining tread (such as 2/32nds of an inch).

CONSUMER-INFORMATION PICKET LINES were set up by members of the Clothing Workers at the Hecht Co. department store in Washington, D.C., and stores in three other cities last week to dramatize protests against the sale of clothing imported from low-wage countries. More than 200 Clothing Workers picketed the Washington store while others manned lines at Hecht's in Baltimore and at Alexander's in New York and Milford, Conn.

Human Needs:

Strategy Outlined For Social Gains

HOW DO CITIZENS go about "righting a wrong, solving a problem, advancing a social theory?" Picketing and demonstrations can dramatize needs, and can win immediate demands; but for long-term social change, setting a social policy—and acting on it—is a more effective strategy.

Some of the critical questions for the 1970s and the techniques for developing social policies around them are outlined in a new Public Affairs Pamphlet, Social Policy—Improving the Human Condition, by John McMahon.

The 1970s, McMahon believes, will see increasing debate on such issues as "war and peace, poverty, a healthy environment, race and racism, humanizing technology, the evolution of new values among the young, creating a meaningful old age—all are in the realm of social policy. . . .

"Poverty amid plenty," he points out, "is deeply etched in American life as a result of decades of indifference, although poverty—when defined as simply a lack of money—would seem to be amenable to cure by transfusions of cold cash. Among professional and citizen groups that have been studying this problem, the concept of a minimum income as a basic right is today widely accepted." How it can best be achieved is the question to be tackled.

Deteriorated housing, one of the most visible of urban problems, is another area of concern. And here the issue seems to be not simply "dwelling units" but the variety of services residents need.

Many of the current problems affect people at all economic levels. Mass transit is one clear example.

"Transportation is not just a problem for the affluent commuter but also is a real dilemma for the aged and the impoverished . . . transportation to clinics, state employment offices, and shopping centers is too expensive or literally unavailable in many areas. . . . Intelligent social policy . . . is long overdue."

Health care reflects a similarly "disordered, inequitable, and very expensive nonsystem" that results in "equally erratic care."

EVERY CONCERN the author touches on—alcoholism and drug abuse, crime, education, racism and discrimination, environment, the cultural climate—presents the challenge of setting desirable goals and working toward them.

Explaining how social policies are articulated, McMahon traces the several steps to be taken, from identifying the problem to the final drafting of a policy statement. After that comes "social action." This means working with a variety of groups such as legislative bodies, administrative departments, or organizations in the private sector—"any target group with sufficient power and authority to adopt your social policy."

McMahon does not ignore the tough question of when, and when not, to compromise. While he recognizes that some degree of compromise is inevitable, he warns that "the persuaders [should] be wary of diluting the proposal. An unsatisfactory compromise that looks like progress can indefinitely postpone a valid solution. The only time early compromise is fully justified is when it serves as a trade-off to win another effort of much higher priority."

It is a never-ending process, he stresses. "Priorities on the social agenda will change as the world changes, but issues affecting people and the quality of life—and the need to act on them—will always be with us."

Soup to Nonsense:

Your Personal Identity Fades Into Limbo With Lost Wallet

By Jane Goodsell

TO LOSE YOUR WALLET is an existentialist experience. You feel loosely attached to the universe, isolated from the mainstream of life and doubtful that you really exist. Having lost all tangible proof of your identity, you begin to wonder if maybe you have dissolved and you scan the obituary columns half expecting to find yourself listed.

Like Oedipus Rex bemoaning his fate, you think wistfully back to the days when you were a person of substance with credit cards, charge plates, membership cards, driver's permit and fishing license. Now, bereft of supportive evidence that you are the person you claim to be, you are an anonymous soul adrift in the world.

When you try to cash a check and are asked for identification, you are so acutely aware that you are likely to be taken for a crook that you find yourself acting like one. You avert your eyes and shuffle your feet as you stammer out an explanation: "Well—uh—you see, I lost my wallet with all my identification cards, and my new ones haven't come through yet, so I guess you'll just have to take my word for it that I'm me. That is, I'm a law abiding citizen and a taxpayer. Honest. Cross my heart."

During the first couple of days after losing your wallet, you wait hopefully for a telephone call asking, "Are you the party who lost a yellow billfold?" But hope dwindles as the days pass.

Gradually, like someone emerging from a coma, you awaken to the realization that you can't just sit there lamenting your fate, and you set about the job of re-establishing your identity. In less time than it takes to have a baby, you have bought a new wallet, replaced your identification cards and assumed your rightful place in the world as a real person.

Having accomplished that, you are assailed by an irrepressible hunch that now—when it's the last thing in the world you want—your old wallet is sure to turn up.

At Construction Conference:

ILO Stresses Policy Of Full Employment

Geneva—A 29-nation conference sponsored by the International Labor Organization on the construction industry called on governments the world over to maintain a "full-employment growth economy" to avoid joblessness.

The call was sounded in a report adopted by the worker, employer and government delegates to the two-week session held here by the ILO's Building, Civil Engineering & Public Works Committee.

The views of American workers were put to the conference by Pres. Joseph T. Power of the Plasterers & Cement Masons and Sec. Richard E. Livingston of the Carpenters.

Following the sessions, the two American worker delegates stressed the "insight" they had gained to the problems confronting fellow craftsmen in other parts of the world.

"We certainly have a better appreciation of the conditions with which workers in the developing countries must cope," Power commented.

"We were surprised to learn that the construction trades are held in low esteem in many countries," Livingston said. "It is hard to realize that workers in these trades do not enjoy everywhere the fair labor laws and other guarantees we take for granted."

In its report, the conference underscored the need to insure the free play of "negotiation and collective agreement" to establish pay rates that "guarantee basic wage conditions and provide protection to workers."

Special attention was given to the problems raised for building workers by the increasing trend toward prefabrication in the construction industry.

The conference noted that in all countries there is "danger and concern that technological change will lead to reduced opportunities for employment."

In the report, which goes to the ILO Governing Body for follow-up action, the conference urged that a "full-employment growth economy" be sought through the "establishing and financing of flexible, long-term, continuous rolling programs of housing and public construction."

Such programs would make for a "balanced construction industry," the conference said.

Emphasis was also given to the provision of educational and retraining opportunities throughout the construction worker's active years to enable him to cope with constantly changing skill requirements.

In this connection the conference adopted a separate resolution asking the ILO to give special consideration to construction workers in the studies it has already scheduled on the question of paid educational leave.

But the delegates specified in their recommendations that workers undergoing retraining should suffer no loss of income. Similarly, when changing jobs, they should be given allowances to meet the cost of moving, new tools and related expenses, it was stated.

The conference made the point that the shifting of work from the construction site to the factory should be accompanied by such improvements in working conditions as more regular hours, better sanitary and welfare conditions and improved safety provision.

Building Trades Set Convention Nov. 8-10

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. will hold its biennial convention Nov. 8-10 in Bal Harbour, Fla., as a prelude to the federation's convention, which begins Nov. 18.

The Metal Trades Dept. convention, which was earlier listed for Nov. 8-10, will convene Nov. 11-13 in Bal Harbour.

The Brewery Workers' 1971 convention will be held at the Carillon Hotel, Miami Beach, Fla., Sept. 27-Oct. 1.

Five state federations also announced dates for conventions They are: Maine, Sept. 22-24 in Bangor; Wyoming, Sept. 23-25 in Casper; Vermont, Sept. 24-26 in Bennington; Delaware, Oct. 22-23 in Dover, and North Carolina, Aug. 31-Sept. 3 at Ashville.

"THE UNION ARTIST," the third annual exhibit of painting and sculpture by Los Angeles area unionists and their families, is shown in a panoramic view at the California Museum of Science and Industry. The exhibit is sponsored by the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor and drew more than 300 entries from union members and their families. The lower photo shows Los Angeles AFL-CIO Pres. Irvin Mazzei (third from left) with judges William Vaughn, designer; actress Martha Scott, and Harry Finley, art director.

Single Issue Separates 4 Shopcrafts, Railroads

Leaders of four railroad shopcraft unions reported that chances appear good for an agreement on new contracts in their protracted negotiations with major U.S. carriers. They represent more than 78,000 craftsmen.

The union negotiators met Aug. 19 to review the latest offer made to the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept. in bargaining that started more than 18 months ago. Agreement has been reached on all issues except one, they reported.

Union bargainers met with Pres. James E. Yost of the department and Edward J. Hickey, Jr., legal counsel, to assess the effect on contract terms of Pres. Nixon's wage-freeze order. It seemed likely, they said, that increases for the period of Aug. 14, 1971, to Nov. 12, 1971, must be deferred under the order, subject to later review.

The unions are the Machinists, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Railway Carmen and the Boilermakers & Blacksmiths. The unions and carriers are reported ready to agree on the same 42-percent wage increase and July 1, 1973, expiration date that other unions have accepted as the 1971 pattern. No work rules are at issue.

The shopcraft talks have been in mediation since June 4, with David Stowe, a member of the National Mediation Board, assisting the negotiators.

Still unsettled are contracts covering 36,000 other rail workers—5,500 members of the Sheet Metal Workers, 17,000 in the Firemen & Oilers and 13,000 members of the Signalmen. All are negotiating separately.

Oct. 1 marks the expiration of a law passed by Congress on May 18 that broke a two-day strike by the Signalmen but gave members of the union a first-step pay raise of 12.5 percent for top-paid workers, pending further negotiations.

Alabama Labor Sues Banks for Credit Gouge

Birmingham, Ala.—The Alabama AFL-CIO has filed suits against six banks in the state seeking $10 million in refunds for holders of Bank Americard and Master Charge credit cards on the ground that interest rates charged card holders violate usury laws.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Barney Weeks said the legal action is based on a federal law permitting a person charged usurious interest by a national bank to recover double his money back.

"Although 8 per cent is the maximum legal rate of interest in Alabama," said Weeks, "holders of credit cards across the length and breadth of this state are being charged 18 per cent.

"Some retail merchants actually make more profit from interest charges than from the products they sell."

The Alabama AFL-CIO said in a statement that although it is powerless to stop many illegal practices the state labor body is determined to put a halt to credit card usury. The council said it hoped to focus public attention on the practices of the credit card business so that additional enforcement measures could be brought to bear. The suits were filed against banks in Birmingham, Mobile and Montgomery, and Weeks indicated that others might follow.

Mediation Association Elects Jersey Unionist

George Meisler, president of Retail Clerks Local 21 in Newark, N.J., was elected first vice president of the Association of Labor Mediation Agencies. Meisler is a member of the New Jersey State Board of Mediation.

Maryland-D. C. Labor Presses Voter Drive

The Maryland-District of Columbia AFL-CIO's eighth convention put major emphasis on register-and-vote campaigns in 1971 and 1972.

The convention, held in Washington, heard Pres. Charles A. Della stress that "we have a big job ahead" in getting 18-year-olds registered and in getting union members to exercise their voting rights. "We must tighten up our whole program" and do a "man-sized job" on registrations, Della declared.

Unions affiliated with the council recently helped get a change in the Maryland laws to give more authority to the state supervisor of elections. That change led to the use of mobile units and appointment of deputy registrars to make registration easier for persons who must work all day.

"We hope to spread those units into every part of the state," Della said following a report from COPE Director Martin Bond of the D.C. Central Labor Council.

The state council officers also reported to the more than 300 delegates on several successful programs supported by labor. They cited, among others:

- The AFL-CIO Appalachian Council which has helped put some 950 unemployed workers into jobs after training financed by the Office of Economic Opportunity.
- Another program under OEO and AFL-CIO auspices which trained more than 300 students from correctional institutes to do useful work.
- Improvements in state laws governing workmen's compensation and rehabilitation.

More than 80 percent of the released prisoners kept their jobs, a reversal of the average experience with prisoners, Della reported.

On workmen's compensation, he said Maryland has an outstanding law now instead of being in the bottom group of states, as it was less than 20 years ago. The state workmen's rehabilitation program provides up to two years of training and $40 a week maintenance expenses. A new training center is being built near Montebello State Hospital in Baltimore, he said.

The delegates issued 36 policy statements on current issues. They called for the establishment of international fair labor standards in world trade, plus an orderly marketing mechanism to regulate the flow of imports that destroy U.S. workers' jobs.

The convention voted to support collective bargaining rights for workers in non-profit hospitals. It called for a balanced transportation system in the Washington area with adequate employe protections, urged full home rule for the District of Columbia and commended action by labor groups in support of strong air pollution control measures.

Harry Goldberg Named To UNESCO Group

Harry Goldberg of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs has been appointed by Sec. of State William P. Rogers to the National Commission for UNESCO—the United Nations Educational, Scientific & Cultural Organization.

Goldberg had previously served on the 100-member commission from 1960-65. His current term will expire at the end of the year.

Jennings Hits GE for Shift To Singapore

General Electric's announcement of plans to build another plant in Singapore, this one to manufacture hermetic motors for sale in the United States, was denounced by Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers as "a cynical and irresponsible blow to GE's American employes and to this nation."

Jennings reported that a company newsletter had claimed that "if we are able to produce more motors at a considerable savings in Singapore, we feel that we can protect jobs at our three domestic plants." This, he said, was an insult to the intelligence of the workers in the plants at Holland, Mich., Tiffin, O., and Fort Wayne, Ind.

"IUE members at the three plants know better," Jennings declared, "and they are insulted by the company's assumption that they are stupid enough to believe such a piece of blatant foolishness."

Government figures show a rising trend in small motor imports, but they still amount to only a small portion of the total market for motors in this country, the IUE observed.

It noted that GE already has a specialty motors plant and an appliance controls plant in Singapore. The company also has motor building plants in Turkey and other countries as well as licensing agreements with numerous foreign companies.

The IUE reported that these arrangements have already cost 1,500 jobs at the Fort Wayne plant and that another 200 workers face a possible layoff. About 3,000 workers are still employed in the hermetic motor departments of the three U.S. plants.

The union charged that although competing imports are GE's excuse for going abroad, the real reason is profits.

"Who is competing with whom?" asked IUE-GE Conference Chairman John Shambo. "They have over 80 foreign manufacturing facilities in 24 nations."

The IUE said it had learned that the new Singapore facility will have a capacity for more than 2 million motors per year with profits expected to reach $8 million over the next 10 years on sales running well over $80 million by 1981.

Glass Workers Hit by Imports To Receive Aid

The Labor Dept. has certified about 220 members of the Glass & Ceramic Workers as eligible for trade adjustment assistance because they lost their jobs due to sheet glass imports.

The workers were laid off by the PPG Industries glass plant at Clarksburg, W. Va., in 1970 when the company curtailed production of window glass and heavy sheet glass. The production cutback was caused mainly by increased imports, the Labor Dept. said.

Certification was approved by the Labor Dept. after the union filed a request on behalf of the Clarksburg members. Workers who became unemployed or underemployed between Jan. 3 and Feb. 18, 1970, were ruled eligible for weekly payments up to $87.

Payments are normally limited to 52 weeks, but may be extended up to 26 additional weeks for workers to complete approved training courses. Workers over age 60 also may qualify for an additional 13 weeks compensation.

HOME RUN SLUGGER Willie Stargell of the Pittsburgh Pirates accepts a donation of $2,500 from Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers to the Black Athletes Foundation. The funds will aid the foundation's program of education and research on sickle cell anemia, a fatal blood disease which primarily affects members of the black race. The disease, which is not contagious, but is hereditary, attacks the blood cells, and its victims seldom live beyond the age of 20. Neither the cause nor the cure of the disease is known. Stargell is president of the foundation's board of directors.

IUD Focuses on Need For New Trade Policy

"A new, modern and constructive foreign trade policy" is immediately needed by the United States to prevent loss of control over the nation's economic destiny, says the summer issue of Viewpoint, the quarterly publication of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

IUD Pres. I. W. Abel, in the issue's lead article, points out: "Our nation will soon become a permanent debtor in the world market if present U.S. import-export trends continue. . . .

"When this happens, the results will include: (1) inability to finance many of our foreign assistance commitments, (2) loss of an important source of highly skilled, well-paying jobs and (3) most importantly, loss of control over our own economic destiny."

Pointing out that the U.S. share of world exports is shrinking while its volume of imports is ballooning, Abel continues:

"We have now reached the crisis-point. Failure to take heed of the warning signs will soon mean that we have passed the place where loss of capital, markets and technical skills can be reversed. . . . We face the spectres of declining influence for the betterment of world stability abroad and declining ability to improve living standards and maintain social stability at home."

The summer issue of the IUD publication is devoted to the country's world trade crisis and examines its causes, its effect on the national economy and suggestions for solutions. Much of the material comes from a new, exhaustive study of the American trade position commissioned by the IUD.

The magazine notes that the U.S. has, in recent years, vastly increased its imports of the sophisticated manufactures which it traditionally exported to the rest of the world. It points out that a major reason for this reversal has been the growth of multinational corporations, many of them American-based, which export U.S. technology, capital and jobs.

"U.S. corporations are not losing by this transfer of U.S. production to other countries," Viewpoint says. "These corporations are largely responsible for the shift because of their growing investment in foreign subsidiaries.

"The U.S. government, its taxpayers, and American workers who lose job opportunities are bearing the losses, with the greatest burden resting squarely on the American workforce."

In addition, Viewpoint says, the U.S. foreign trade balance suffers from rigid adherence to outmoded foreign trade policies and from subordination of those policies to foreign relations policy. To correct the situation, Viewpoint outlines a program to bring about three needed reforms:

- Making multinational corporations responsive to national goals and the public interest.
- Restoring true reciprocity among trading nations.
- Adherence to the principle of fair competition, especially in the area of international fair labor standards.

New Campus Next Year:

Studies Center Sets Expanded Program

The AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center will begin its third year of operations next month with an expanded curriculum and authority from the federation's Executive Council to complete negotiations for the purchase of a college campus near Washington, D.C.

This year's educational programs will be held at the center's existing facilities in Washington. But with the acquisition of the Xaverian College in Silver Spring, Md., the center is expected to shift operations to the new campus for the opening of the 1972-73 term.

The Xaverian Brothers had operated the Catholic institution since 1932. The college is located on a 47-acre campus about 25 minutes driving time from the AFL-CIO headquarters. It has five large permanent buildings, including a dormitory, cafeteria, and classroom and administration buildings.

The existing facilities on the campus can accommodate about 100 students in the dormitory and classroom, said Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director of the center.

Authority for the purchase of the college was granted by the council with the purpose of continuing development of the AFL-CIO's labor college. It also cited the need to maintain an adult education program for union staffs and members and for the establishment of a community center.

The center currently offers 31 education and training courses ranging from several hours to several weeks. Nearly 1,000 students have participated in the programs during the center's one and one-half years of operation. The students represented 59 federation affiliates and 25 state and local central bodies.

Two new major educational programs will be offered in the 1971-72 school year: a 10-week certificate course and a number of one-week institutes on the new occupational safety and health law.

The certficate course, which is scheduled for both the fall and spring, can be taken either in 10 consecutive weeks or over several years. Students will be required to submit a written report and participate in an oral examination to qualify for the certificate.

It is open only to full time union staff members. Besides a four-week staff development program, the course includes six one-week institutes covering labor law, collective bargaining, arbitration, communications, fringe benefits and federal social programs, and the role of unions in America in the next decade.

The first occupational safety institute, developed with the cooperaton of job safety and health experts of the AFL-CIO and the Industrial Union Dept., will be conducted at the studies center Sept. 21-25.

Subsequent sessions will be offered at 10 university campuses across the country, Hoehler reported. The participating universities are Massachusetts. Cornell, Penn State, Ohio State, Indiana, Michigan State, Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, and California at Berkeley.

Hoehler said that the center is also working with Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland's office to develop a training program for use and operation of computers.

Courses scheduled at the studies center for the first two months of the fall term are:

Labor Law, Sept. 13-17; Occupational Safety & Health Institute, Sept. 21-25; AFL-CIO Intern Training Program, Sept. 27-Oct. 1; Techniques & Trends in Collective Bargaining, Oct. 4-8; Arbitration, Oct. 12-16; Effective Reading for Union Staff in the Washington Area, Oct. 12-Nov. 11; Communications, Oct. 18-22, and Staff Development Program, Oct. 26-Nov. 19.

New York AFL-CIO Opens Drive To Counter Low-Wage Imports

New York—A massive campaign to counter the rising volume of low-wage-produced imports was launched by the 14th convention of the New York State AFL-CIO here.

The delegates also approved an increase in per capita payments to the state labor body from 3 cents a month to 5 cents, and increased annual dues of other affiliates from $15 to $25. The increases are designed to provide the economic strength for a broadened political education drive for 1972, as well as to overcome operating defficits of the past two years.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Raymond R. Corbett, in his keynote address to the 1,492 delegates and 455 alternates, outlined the voter registration and education campaign, declaring:

"We have to see to it that next year we elect as our representatives in Washington and Albany—and in the White House—those who are responsive to the needs of the nation and the state.

"In 1972, we all know, we are going to need the fullest cooperation of every local . . . every central body and . . . every member at every level of our organization for effective political action."

Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) warned the delegates that leftist elements are trying to take control of the Democratic Party and that if they succeed, the Democrats will be in trouble for years.

Jackson also scored elements in the party who "intentionally or not, have turned their backs on the working man."

"They ignore the fact," Jackson declared, "that in the last two decades unions have been in the forefront of everything decent in this country—from civil rights to education to national health insurance."

The convention acted on the executive council's resolution on the need for action to halt the inroads against American jobs caused by imports, plus the export of U.S. corporate capital, know-how and jobs. Some 15 other resolutions were submitted on economic problems.

The delegates overwhelmingly approved a proposal that the state body immediately set up a special imports committee to deal with all aspects of the problem.

Corbett also scored the 1971 conservative coalition in the state legislature for having "completely disregarded the people's needs" at the recent session. He cited the increase of the sales tax from 3 percent to 4 percent, restriction of Medicaid, reduction of welfare aid and application of the sales tax, "even to the poor man's sandwich, the hot dog," by extension of the tax to meals under $1.

He charged legislative neglect in failing to give labor relations rights to farm workers and refusing to raise unemployment insurance or workmen's compensation benefits.

In other actions, the convention called for an increase in the state minimum wage to $3 an hour from the present $1.85, legislative approval of public employe pension agreements which had been denied at the 1971 session and restoration of full enforcement programs for job safety.

The delegates voted to support, as major job creation measures, a proposition and two constitutional amendments to be acted on at the November 2 election. They call for a new $2.5 billion transportation bond issue and changes to end restrictions on community development programs and financing of sewer systems.

The convention pledged to keep pressing Congress for enactment of National Health Security.

Luna Retiring:

Chesser Elected UTU President

Miami Beach—Al H. Chesser, legislative director of the Transportation Union, was elected president of the UTU at its first convention since the merger of four rail unions formed the UTU in 1969. He succeeds Charles Luna who will step down at the union's mandatory retirement age of 65.

Chesser, 57, was the legislative director of the Railroad Trainmen for nine years and assumed the same post for the UTU at the time of the merger.

Meanwhile, concern over Pres. Nixon's wage-price freeze overshadowed other convention business and dominated off-floor discussions among the delegates.

Luna, joining a solid front of labor leaders in opposition to the President's action, described the freeze as unfair because it left profits, dividends and interest rates free to climb.

In Washington, Assistant Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., who had helped mediate the recent UTU settlement with the nation's railroads, said that the initial pay raise of 4 percent retroactive to April would be allowed when and if the union ratifies the contract. But he also said that a 5 percent increase due in October would not be allowed to take effect until after the freeze is lifted.

Following his election, Chesser pledged to the delegates that he would "continue the tradition of unity and dedicate my lifetime to the membership of this great union."

He began his railroad career as a Sante Fe brakeman in June, 1941, at Wellington, Kan. One month later, he was transferred to Amarillo, Tex., where he became a member of the old BRT. He holds his membership in UTU's Local 883 in Amarillo.

After holding several local offices, Chesser was named to the BRT's Texas legislative staff in 1952. He was appointed as the BRT's legislative director in 1962 and elected to the post in 1964 and 1968.

In other balloting, delegates reelected Sec.-Treas. John H. Shepherd and Assistant Presidents Clyde Lane and William Myers. Lane headed the former Conductors & Brakemen and Myers was secretary-treasurer of the Switchmen. M. W. Hampton was elected third assistant president, succeeding H. E. Gilbert, who is retiring. Gilbert headed the Firemen & Enginemen. James R. Snyder, UTU Georgia legislative director, was elected to fill Chesser's former position.

Farm Workers Settle Dispute With Heublein

San Francisco—The United Farm Workers Organizing Committee signed a labor agreement here that ends a three-month dispute over the organization of workers employed by the Vinifera Development Corp., a California subsidiary of Heublein, Inc.

The settlement was announced by Bishop Joseph F. Donnelly of Hartford, Conn., chairman of the Committee on Farm Labor of the United States Catholic Conference, which offered its services in mediation June 28. It ends a UFWOC boycott against Smirnoff vodka, Italian Swiss Colony wines, Hamm's beer and other Heublein products.

The contract with Vinifera covers workers on its 2,000 acres of vineyards and provides a basic hourly wage of $2.40 for general labor. A parallel agreement establishes a Farm Services Agency as a Heublein subsidiary to provide union farm workers and other services to independent growers under contracts with the agency.

Bishop Donnelly said the new pact "pioneers an entirely new area in providing an agency which will be of extreme importance to many small growers in the wine grape industry." It will "provide an orderly method of handling the mechanics of labor-management relations in an industry made up principally of small and medium-sized growers," he said.

Printers Vote Support For Health Security Bill

Hollywood, Fla.—Delegates to the 113th convention of the Typographical Union here unanimously endorsed the proposed National Health Security Act, backed by the AFL-CIO and the labor movement. The ITU resolution declared that Health Security "would provide comprehensive medical care for all residents of the United States, regardless of age or income—excellent care based on need and not ability to pay."

The convention also unanimously backed a resolution calling for a seven-hour shift and a 35-hour workweek without any reduction in wages for employes of the Government Printing Office.

The Committee on Organization's report to the convention told the 340 delegates that because of the drastic technological changes in the graphic arts, it will be necessary for the union to change its traditional approach to organization of new members.

"With the introduction of further automation in the printing industry," the committee said, "local unions and their organizing committees should be alert to the possibility that in order to protect the jurisdiction of the ITU it may be necessary to depart from past practices. They must impress upon their members that successful organizational efforts may require organizing across traditional craft lines due to integrated job classifications in many plants."

Sec.-Treas. William R. Cloud reported that the average weekly earnings of members increased from $170.43 to $186.23 during the past year, and that the balance in the Old Age Pension Fund rose over the year from $9,319,861.67 to $11,823,235-.25.

In a spirited three-city competition, San Diego, Calif., was chosen in a run-off to be the site of the 1973 convention. Milwaukee was awarded the 1972 convention last year.

AFL-CIO Convention Set to Start Nov. 18

The Ninth Constitutional Convention of the AFL-CIO will take place in Bal Harbour, Fla., beginning Thursday, Nov. 18, 1971.

The meetings of the convention will be in the Americana Hotel.

Unionists Hold Better Chance To Get Pension

Union membership is a significant factor in whether the protection of a retirement plan is made available to a worker, a Labor Dept. economist observed in the Monthly Labor Review.

Only 18 percent of unionized workers did not have the option of a retirement plan while 58 percent of nonunion workers had no retirement plan available to them, according to a survey on which the article is based.

The author, Emerson Beier, is an economist for the Bureau of Labor Statistics, which publishes the Monthly Labor Review.

Beier also found that the incidence of pension plans or other deferred profit-sharing programs increased proportionately with wage levels and that the incidence of retirement plans varied with types of occupations.

In cases where wages averaged less than $2.50 an hour, eight of 10 workers were in groups with no retirement plan available.

Where wages were $5 or more an hour, however, eight of 10 workers had a pension plan available.

The proportion of workers with no plan available varied from industry to industry.

The survey found that overall, less than 45 percent of the nation's private, nonfarm workers had some type of retirement security available to them.

Carpenters' Contest Picks Top Apprentices

Detroit—Canada and the Middle West dominated the winner's circle at the International Carpenters Apprenticeship Contest here.

The California team of contestants—traditionally strong contenders—wound up in show position with two third place winners.

A tall, slim carpenter apprentice from Victoria, B.C.,—Christopher Cottier of Local 1598—won the top prize of $1,500, plus the Olav Boen Trophy, the International Carpentry Trophy, a collection of tools, and several other awards.

Robert Jacobsen of Calgary, Alberta, picked up $1,000 and other second prizes. C. J. Edward Smith of Winnipeg, Manitoba, took fourth, and William D. Lester of Windsor, Ont., took fifth. The only non-Canadian in the top five was Kenneth Danielsen of Davenport, Ia., who came in third.

Other Midwesterners who fared well in the annual competition were John David Trimble of Moline, Ill., first place in the mill-cabinet contest; Dwight Robert Smith of Toledo,O., third place millwright; and James Wright of Detroit, first place millwright.

A loud burst of applause greeted the announcement at the awards banquet that Wright had taken top honors in the millwright contest. It marked the third time in four years that Millwrights Local 1102 of Detroit had groomed a winner.

Californians among the winners included Bruce Mars of Los Angeles, third place millwright, and Robert Freeman of Stockton, third place mill-cabinet maker.

The competition held in the Light Guard Armory here involved 71 apprentices—40 carpenters, 14 mill-cabinet makers, and 17 millwrights—representing 35 states, the District of Columbia and four provinces of Canada.

Growing steadily since it changed from a western states competition to an international competition in 1967, the contest is sponsored by the Carpenters union, the Associated General Contractors of America, and the National Association of Home Builders. It was given further impetus this year by the National Forest Products Institute, which offered the carpenter and mill-cabinet winners and their wives expense-paid tours of forest-industry facilities.

Carpenters Pres. M. A. Hutcheson told the awards banquet audience that union carpenters have invested heavily in apprenticeship training and that the results of the 1971 competition confirm the value of this investment.

The National Carpenters Joint Apprenticeship Committee announced that next year's competition will be held in Las Vegas Nev.

Lathers Name E. K. Edwards Acting Chief

The executive board of the Wood, Wire & Metal Lathers voted unanimously to name Kenneth M. Edwards of San Francisco as acting president of the union.

Edwards, who was elected last August as third vice president, takes the president's post vacated by Robert A. Georgine, secretary-treasurer since May of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Edwards has been business representative and secretary-treasurer of San Francisco Local 65 of the Lathers for 12 years. He is president also of the San Francisco Building & Construction Trades Council and active in numerous community groups. He assumed his new post Aug. 16.

As Convention Opens:

Teachers Hit Wage Freeze As Severe Blow at Workers

San Francisco—Pres. Nixon's action in freezing wages was condemned by the officers of the American Federation of Teachers as "a devastating blow at teachers and workers" throughout the nation.

The AFT executive board, meeting during the union's 55th annual convention, said the President's actions are "unconscionable" at a time when "underfinanced schools face further disrepair and deterioration from deplorably inadequate numbers of employed qualified teachers" and from a shortage of classrooms, textbooks and teaching facilities.

The council said in a statement: "The AFL-CIO has performed patriotic and historic service in its reminder to the President that a democratic republic in crisis requires equality of sacrifice, and that nothing less will do."

The 21-member council called on all AFT local unions to continue vigorous negotiations for better teaching conditions and salary provisions, and to demand guaranteed wage retroactivity. Also, it advised locals to seek retroactivity provisions in contracts that currently are silent on the subject.

At the convention's opening session Aug. 16, AFT Pres. David Selden reported that the union, with 250,000 members, is now at its greatest strength. He called on the 1,200 delegates and the 250 local unions they represent to take an unprecedented action toward political effectiveness — to endorse a candidate for the presidency of the United States following the Republican and Democratic nominating conventions.

Selden told the convention that Nixon is the only President in history to veto two educational appropriation bills.

"I say that the time has come for the AFT to come down out of the ivory tower, to get behind the most promising of the major candidates for President, and see if we cannot bring about an Administration which will view education as a prime necessity in American life," Selden urged the delegates.

"In mobilizing our national political effort for increased federal aid to education, we must support and coordinate our efforts with those of the AFL-CIO," he stressed.

He called on all local unions to "establish the right of teachers to sign up voluntarily for political action contributions by dues check-off to COPE," the federation's Committee on Political Education.

Selden said that, despite harsh jail sentences and fines levied on peacefully picketing teachers in Newark, N.J., and other cities, the AFT is holding firm to its support of the right to strike. In addition, it will seek to use its political power to negate court injunctions against peaceful strikes, he declared.

In his address, Selden outlined a teacher-based "national strategy for education." He rebuked the National Education Association for its "silence on the mushrooming growth of performance contracts" with school boards and its "softening" position on so-called educational "voucher" schemes.

Union leaders reported at a special press conference that the AFT Research Dept. had uncovered "fraud and deception" in a performance contract in Providence, R.I. In performance contracts, a private company outside the schools is paid a fee tied to alleged improvement in pupil skills, based on test scores.

Selden reminded delegates that the 1970 AFT convention had warned that performance contracting promotes "teaching to the test" with the accompanying danger of "subterfuge and collusion."

The union said it has evidence that a private company in Providence promised to raise the reading levels of pupils but used an instructional program which had the same materials as those in the final tests on which payments to the company were to be based.

Union findings were "independently corroborated by the University of Illinois, the International Reading Association and the project director herself," the union said.

In citing other abuses of the performance contracting system, the AFT detailed events in Texarkana, Tex., Gary, Ind., New York City and Philadelphia.

Executive Director Roy Wilkins of the NAACP was the principal speaker at the union's annual civil rights luncheon. Wilkins scored Nixon for his "continued personal opposition to the busing of pupils." This position, he said, puzzles many Americans who take at face value Nixon's declared intention to uphold the law.

Wilkins was given the AFT's Charles Stillman award—its highest form of recognition—for his leadership of the NAACP and its "profound effect on the transformation of U.S. education."

Dr. Wilson Riles, who with AFL-CIO support ousted Dr. Max Rafferty from the elected position of California Superintendent of Public Instruction, spoke at the opening convention session.

Riles bemoaned the fact that educators have "everything but money to do what has to be done" in the classrooms, and called the national fad for experimentation in education "a cop-out."

Commending the AFT for focusing on the needs of children, Riles urged union teachers to "demand that you have the resources to do a good job for students—then parents will support you."

During its final three days, the convention will elect delegates to the AFL-CIO convention in November and two AFT vice presidents to fill vacancies. Also it will debate resolutions on a variety of subjects including adequate financing of education, the war in Vietnam, drugs, women's rights, violence in the schools, the jailing of Angela Davis and the organization of college teachers.

UNIVERSITY OF OREGON STUDENTS signed a collective bargaining agreement with the school as culmination of a two-year campaign which saw the students organize their own local of the State, County & Municipal Employes and negotiate their own contract. Looking over the agreement are University Pres. Robert D. Clark and student leaders of AFSCME Local 1893, Kris Bruun and Greg Insley.

Phone Pact Ratified, Beats Nixon Deadline

At a special meeting in New York City, presidents of 23 striking locals accepted a federal offer for a new round of bargaining but refused to call off the strike until they get a new contract.

Other Bell employes caught by the freeze during contract negotiations include workers in Illinois, Pennsylvania, Florida and other states who have not ratified new terms. The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers said only about a third of the 80,000 telephone workers it represents settled before the freeze deadline.

The CWA vote nationwide was 196,877 in favor of acceptance, 71,456 opposed. The announcement of the tally declared the strike officially ended except for the New York plant workers —linemen, telephone installers and other craft workers.

"The results of the vote," Beirne said, "indicate that all units except the New York plant accepted the terms of the contract by a significant majority. This means the contract is in full force and effect for all units except the New York plant."

In the latter case, the CWA executive board voted to seek reopening of negotiations with management. If and when acceptable terms are worked out, the terms will be submitted to a vote of members in the 23 locals involved, the union said. A spokesman in New York said plant workers rejected the proposed contract "more for local issues than national issues."

The 1971 pattern contract calls for a total wage benefit package described by CWA as "amounting to more than 33.5 percent over the life of the new three-year agreement."

"It is the biggest package ever won from the telephone industry," said a statement listing major benefits.

They include basic wage increases for workers at the top of the progression schedule ranging from $16.50 a week to $29 for the first year, an additional $5 to $7 the second year, $5.50 to $8 the third year, plus an uncapped cost-of-living clause tied to the Consumer Price Index of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The union estimates that base wage rates plus the living-cost bonus will raise wages by an average of $34.46 a week by the end of the contract term, or 29.5 percent.

Increases beyond the first step, however, are now subject to the terms of the President's wage freeze.

Machinists Score NLRB Decision Barring Strikers Seniority Rights

The National Labor Relations Board in a 3-2 vote denied full reinstatement rights to 1,500 employes of United Aircraft Co. in a decision their union called "the Nixon board's first major reversal of historic court-established law."

The board's three Republican members took a new look at employe seniority rights after an abortive nine-week strike of Connecticut Machinists at five plants of the United Aircraft Corp. in 1960. Reversing a trial examiner, they ruled the company did not act unlawfully when it rehired some of the strikers as new employes without regard for their seniority or experience.

IAM Chief Counsel Plato Papps said that the union will appeal the board decision to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. Papps declared:

"The Nixon labor board has brazenly undertaken to reverse a whole series of board decisions, decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court and half a dozen Courts of Appeals.

"In effect, this board decision, if allowed to stand would destroy all job protection in the labor law for the members of a losing union."

The majority against the employes included Chairman Edward B. Miller, Ralph Kennedy and Howard Jenkins, Jr. The minority, Gerald Brown and John Fanning, wrote a vigorous dissent supporting the IAM members' right to reinstatement.

Miller and Kennedy are recent appointees of Pres. Nixon.

The dispute stemmed from the agreement settling the 1960 strike. The board majority ruled that the company was obligated only to extend the strikers preferential hiring treatment from August 1960 when the strike ended to Jan. 1, 1961, the period covered by the agreement.

More than 1,500 of the striking employes were not reinstated by that date and, if hired thereafter, were treated as new employes.

The IAM contended and Trial Examiner Lee J. Best ruled that the company had violated employes' legal rights of reinstatement by this action.

In their dissent, Fanning and Brown held that the company should have continued reinstatement of employes with full rights until it reached its pre-strike workforce. The point was reached in May 1961.

The IAM also contends that United Aircraft discriminated against another 1,600 employes who were reinstated but placed in lesser, lower-paying jobs.

In a similar case involving the recall rights of strikers, all five board member agreed that another firm used a 1968 strike-settlement agreement to defeat the recall rights of strikers by prolonging their reinstatement.

In the case of IAM Lodge 2350 in New Albany, Miss., the NLRB found the Laher Spring & Electric Car Corp. guilty of discriminating against IAM members to "undermine the union" in the eyes of company employes.

The decisions in the two cases hinged on company conduct. In the Laher case, management acted in bad faith, the board ruled. It ordered Laher to stop discouraging membership in the IAM and to reinstate all workers it had discriminated against.

Irving Leuchter Dies, Counsel for Guild

Verona, N.J.—Irving Leuchter, general counsel for the Newspaper Guild since 1947, died at his home here after a heart attack—the third in recent years. He was 59.

Leuchter had represented the national Guild in major court cases, notably those that involved the right of free speech. He had attended every Guild convention for nearly 25 years.

He was a "most valued, trusted and selfless servant," TNG Pres. Charles Perlik said.

Rotating Strike Wins Contract At Air Canada

Ottawa, Ont.—The "rotating" strike, used for the first time here by Canadian members of the Machinists, helped win a new 25-month agreement for 6,500 employes of Air Canada.

IAM Vice Pres. Mike Rygus reported that short strikes at different locations brought a settlement after seven months of nonproductive negotiations. Members walked out for 24 hours at Toronto International Airport, then returned to their jobs. Another short strike was called at Montreal Airport, and others were being considered when management ended attempts to downgrade existing conditions, Rygus said.

Members have ratified an agreement providing wage increases of 8 percent retroactive to Mar. 1, and an additional 7 percent next Feb. 28; an extra $13 a month for top-scale workers, and a raise of $1.18 an hour for skilled trades workers.

Meany Calls for Action to Create Jobs

Says Nixon Puts Burden On Neediest

What America needs is a program that will create jobs, not a program designed to make the wealthy wealthier, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in his annual Labor Day message.

"The economy has to be made to work for all the people—including the aged, the jobless, the untrained and all the others who need it the most but are getting the least out of it," Meany said.

"These are the very people," he noted, "who are being asked to bear the burden of the President's unfair and unequitable" new economic policies which include a freeze on wages for 90 days and a tax bonanza for big business.

Meany said that the President's proposed "job development tax credit" means that he is taking "an additional $4 billion a year in tax revenue and returning it to big business."

"The cost of this new tax break alone is twice the amount the Accelerated Public Works Act of 1971 would have cost the federal government.

"But the President vetoed that bill," Meany said, indicating that the public works legislation would have meant thousands of additional jobs performing sorely needed services. He charged that there is nothing in the President's new economic game plan that will create jobs.

"The fact is the President ignores every option at his discretion that might increase jobs."

And Meany reiterated organized labor's condemnation of Pres. Nixon's inaction on economic and social problems, charging that the President has refused to:

- Release $12 billion in federal funds which he has sequestered and which are intended for worthwhile, socially constructive programs.
- Control interest rates, which remain at record highs and "are the single greatest contributor to inflation."
- Extend unemployment compensation for those whose benefits have been exhausted through prolonged unemployment resulting from the previous "game plan."
- Present a plan for reconversion of the economy from wartime production to peacetime.

"Mr. Nixon has not established a single viable program for finding jobs for veterans or for those previ-

Labor Maps All-Out Fight On 'Game Plan' Inequities

OVERALL LABOR STRATEGY in approaching the wage-price freeze was discussed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock during a meeting at federation headquarters. Woodcock later told reporters that the UAW would "work cooperatively" with the federation in opposing certain aspects of the Nixon plan.

Unions Act to Guard Rights of Members

By Eugene A. Kelly

Unions all over America are acting to protect the contract rights of several million members hurt by the Nixon Administration's sudden freeze on negotiated wages.

While organized labor prepared to move in the courts, in Congress and at the negotiating table, individual unions took steps to soften the impact of the freeze, and to preserve the right of members to negotiate firm contract terms and to strike, if necessary.

The Bureau of National Affairs, a Washington, D.C., information service, reported that the Nixon wage-price stabilization order blocked deferred increases negotiated months ago for more than 1 million workers in private industry. Also affected are 13 million federal, state, county and city employes including most of the nation's 2 million school teachers.

Among strikes the Administration sought to halt early in the freeze period were the walkout of

White House Weighs Continuing Controls

By Tom Castor

Organized labor closed ranks in opposition to the Nixon wage-price freeze as Administration spokesmen talked increasingly of continuing controls on the American economy after the 90-day freeze's scheduled end on Nov. 13.

Key members of the Nixon Cabinet and other advisers took to the airwaves in a series of appearances on the three major television networks apparently aimed at selling the new economic "game plan" to the nation.

In major developments:

- Lawyers from AFL-CIO affiliates plus the Auto Workers, the Longshoremen & Warehousemen and the Mine Workers met in a closed session at federation headquarters in Washington to consider possible challenges to the freeze.
- Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock conferred with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to map a unified labor approach to the President's action.
- Meany, in a letter to Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.), chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, said if congressional control were asserted over the economy, the AFL-CIO would be glad to come forward with its own economic recommendations, but as things stand labor "must seek to do business with the Executive Branch" and will not now "telegraph" its strategy.

AFL-CIO Gen. Counsel J. Albert Woll said that the lawyers prepared a confidential report to Meany concerning "what labor organizations may do now and in the future" at the end of the freeze period.

"We are exploring the validity

Rulings Show Price Ceilings Lack Teeth

Key interpretations from the Cost of Living Council are bearing out organized labor's position that Pres. Nixon's 90-day freeze will not apply the same rigid scrutiny and controls to prices that are clamped on wages.

Despite the council's refusal to permit previously negotiated wage increases, it has interpreted the President's executive order as allowing increases in the price of steel and insurance.

The President's order never was intended to apply to unprocessed foods—one of the most erratic and inflationary components of the Consumer Price Index during recent months and one of the basic household budget costs.

And Darrell Trent, assistant director of the Office of Emergency Preparedness, told a group of clothing manufacturers meeting in Arlington, Va., that they could increase the price of shirts by sewing

Buchwald on the High Price of the President's Freeze

By Art Buchwald

Here are some questions that you have probably been asking concerning the Nixon administration's wage-price freeze:

Q. Why is there a wage-price freeze in the United States?

A. Because President Nixon's economic game plan didn't work.

Q. What was his economic game plan?

A. To lick inflation by having a reasonable amount of unemployment.

Q. What happened?

A. He was only successful in 50 percent of his goals. He didn't lick inflation, but he did manage to have a lot of unemployment.

Q. Who is affected by this wage and price freeze?

A. Everyone but banks and insurance companies.

Q. Why are they not affected?

A. Because they are hardship cases.

Q. What about school teachers, policemen, firemen and government employes?

A. They are not exempted because they can weather a wage-price freeze much easier than banks and insurance companies.

Q. Did President Nixon devalue the dollar?

A. Absolutely not. He asked Germany, France and Japan to devalue it for him. The dollar is floating.

Q. Where is it floating?

A. Probably at sea. Two things can happen now. The dollar can be rescued or it can sink.

Q. Who will decide what happens to the dollar?

A. The gnomes in Switzerland.

Q. Who are the gnomes in Switzerland?

A. They're tiny little men, three feet tall, who buy and sell dollars all over the world.

Q. Can President Nixon do anything about the gnomes in Switzerland?

A. He can. Just before the elections he will announce that if he is re-elected he will go to Zurich.

Q. Could President Nixon have done anything to avoid a wage-price freeze?

A. Yes. He could have sold Alaska. As a matter of fact there is a rumor he might still do it. That's why he asked Emperor Hirohito to meet him there, so Japan could make him an offer.

Q. How will the wage freeze affect poor people?

A. They have nothing to fear from it. It's been set up in such a way that their poverty will be protected.

Q. Why did the stock market go up so high when the President clamped the freeze on?

A. Many top-flight Wall Street investors and brokers were called back from their vacations. They figured as long as they were there and didn't have to go home to dinner, they might as well buy stocks. As soon as their wives come home they'll probably sell.

Q. If my boss promised me a raise and he can't give it to me because of the wage freeze, what does that make him?

A. The happiest man in the world.

Q. How could this have happened to the dollar when it says right on it "In God We Trust?"

A. God didn't do this to us. It was the Germans, the French, and the Japanese.

Q. But why should God allow this to happen if he knows we put all our trust in him?

A. The President has asked Billy Graham to head up a blue-ribbon panel to find an answer to this question.

Q. When will we know?

A. Next Sunday.

FOOD WORKERS at Detroit's Belle Isle Park took to the picket line to change their employer's mind about using the Nixon "freeze" order as an excuse to refuse a previously agreed-on raise. Hotel & Restaurant Local 705 won a two-day strike after a ruling by freeze officials in Washington. The employer, Ogden Foods, agreed to reinstate pay hikes of at least $8 a week.

Freeze Proves Slushy When Applied to Prices

on an extra pocket or adding a monogram.

Prof. Arnold R. Weber, executive director of the Cost of Living Council, said that seasonal price hikes—such as those in the automobile and hotel-motel industry—may be raised to their 1970 levels.

He noted that prices of cars are lower in the summer months as dealers attempt to eliminate 1971 inventories. Hotels and motels normally increase their rates around the Labor Day holiday, and winter resorts in such places as Florida and Puerto Rico normally institute fall-winter rates, which are higher.

"To qualify," Weber said, "prices and wages must show a distinct fluctuation at a specific, identifiable point in time. There must also be a documented and established practice that has taken place in each of the past three years."

When Nixon issued his Aug. 15 order on the wage-price freeze, it specified that price ceilings would be based on those prices in effect for a "substantial volume" of sales during the 30 days prior to Aug. 14.

But now, it turns out that "substantial volume" means only 10 percent of sales and that price increases may be permitted as long as they were announced any time prior to the order.

This interpretation initially was tailored to fit the needs of the steel industry which had announced an 8-percent increase effective Aug. 5.

The increase is permitted, the council said, because "in the case of increases in posted and effective prices during the (30-day) base period, the base period itself will be considered to have begun at the time of the increase in posted and effective prices."

The same interpretation was later refined to let insurance companies institute deferred increases in premiums for insurance on homes, automobiles and other properties as long as the increases were announced before Aug. 15, even though they were not to go into effect until after the freeze began.

The ruling was a reversal of an earlier council statement that insurance rates would be frozen at Aug. 15 levels.

The AFL-CIO said in a statement that the interpretations prove "that the Administration intends to place the burden of the freeze almost entirely on workers—not on profits, stock dividends, executives' salaries and not even really on prices."

The federation statement warned that prices, already at record levels, "will surely continue to rise while wages have been frozen at a real-earnings level below 1968."

Elsewhere, a Dept. of Agriculture spokesman pointed to a loophole in the Economic Stabilization Act which means that wholesale and retail prices for pork and other commodities could be set at levels higher than those expected earlier.

Recent prices for these commodities have been running behind year-ago levels, and the law on which the President based his action states that wages and prices may be stabilized "at levels not less than those prevailing on May 25, 1970."

Therefore, the ceiling for such commodities would be the levels of May 25, 1970, not the lower levels of July-August 1971.

There is no question about raw farm products because they were exempted from the freeze. The price freeze aplies only to processed foods. So while apples and oranges may be exempt, apple sauce and orange juice are not.

Also exempted are state and local taxes. In cases where surcharges or other sales and excise taxes have been increased, these increases can be passed on to the consumer.

Ex-CWA Editor Al Herrington Dies

Cambridge, Md.—Alfred B. Herrington, retired publicist and editor for the Communications Workers and a founding member of the AFL-CIO International Labor Press Association, died at 65 in Cambridge Hospital. He was stricken with a heart attack while hospitalized for injuries suffered in an auto accident.

Memorial services for Herrington were conducted Aug. 31 at the National Press Club, Washington, of which he had been a member. Eulogies were delivered by John Crull, retired CWA executive vice president, and Norman Walker, public information officer of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Herrington, born in Chicago, was a repairman and lineman for the Illinois Bell Telephone Co. when he joined the union that later became CWA. He was named public relations director for the National Federation of Telephone Workers in 1944, and kept the post when NFTW merged to form CWA. Also he edited the CWA News and served as an ILPA vice president.

Herrington retired in 1961 and did public relations work for the Area Redevelopment Administration until 1966. His wife Edna, three children and 10 grandchildren survive.

Strike Thaws Wages Frozen By Employer

Detroit—Food workers at concession stands on Belle Isle, a city park, won a two-day strike to "unfreeze" previously agreed-on wage increases.

The strikers, backed by a ruling from the Office of Emergency Planning in Washington, D.C., convinced their employer to reinstate a contract calling for wages of at least $2 an hour in 1971, $2.25 in 1972 and $2.50 in 1973, plus a cost-of-living escalator clause in the final year of the contract. The employer is a division of Ogden Foods.

The strike was voted 30-0 by members of Hotel & Restaurant Local 705 when the employer used the Nixon wage freeze "as an excuse to refuse an already agreed-on increase" at its six concession stands, according to union Pres. Mort Furay.

The union contended the freeze did not cover the strikers since their wages were below the May 25, 1970, prevailing rate paid in the Detroit area. The law on which the freeze is based states that wages may not be frozen below those levels.

The contract gives the concession employes wage boosts of $8 a week or more retroactive to Aug. 2, 1971.

Furay told a Detroit Common Council hearing on the walkout that Ogden Foods was "hiding behind the wage freeze order to continue their exploitation of both the public and its employes."

Local 705 strongly supports the AFL-CIO position that the wage freeze bears more heavily on workers than on employers, according to Vice Pres. Myra Wolfgang of the international union.

Broadcasts Feature Key Labor Officials

AFL-CIO officials will appear on one television and four radio broadcasts over the Labor Day weekend.

Pres. George Meany will appear on ABC television's Issues and Answers at 1:30 p.m. EDT, Sunday, Sept. 5.

Meany, Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and Vice Presidents I. W. Abel and Floyd Smith will make nationwide radio addresses on Labor Day, Monday, Sept. 6.

The networks and times set for the radio broadcasts are: Smith, ABC, 7:05 p.m.; Abel, CBS, 7:35 p.m.; Kirkland, Mutual, 9:15 p.m.; Meany, NBC, 9:45 p.m.

All times are Eastern Daylight Time. Local stations should be consulted for exact broadcast times.

At UTU Convention:

Meany Vows Drive To Regain Lost Pay

Miami Beach—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany promised 1,800 United Transportation Union convention delegates that organized labor would push to regain wages lost because of Pres. Nixon's 90-day freeze on wages and prices.

"We in labor do not accept that the President has the power to negate legal contracts," Meany said.

"When we lose a certain amount of money during this period, then that means that we go back and we negotiate to get that same amount back." He said organized labor would recover the losses by seeking higher wages at the bargaining table after the freeze is lifted.

In the meantime, he said, American workers are being "robbed of millions of dollars" with the money being "turned over to their employers."

Meany said that this is money "negotiated at the collective bargaining table and embodied in legal contracts."

His address was before the closing banquet of the UTU convention.

The 19-day convention of the 260,000-member union was devoted to an examination of proposed constitutional changes designed to eliminate much of the allegiance to old railroad operating brotherhoods before the formation of the UTU in 1969.

This was the first convention since merger, which brought together the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, the Order of Railway Conductors & Brakemen and the Switchmen's Union of North America.

The convention also saw the election of new officers, including the elevation of Legislative Director Al H. Chesser, who will take over from Charles Luna as president on Jan. 1.

Meany congratulated the UTU on its successful collective bargaining effort which ended 18 days of selective strikes around the country last month.

"You've got an agreement," he said, "but I don't know how much is going to be left of it when Tricky Dick gets through with it."

He continued by blasting all of the Nixon Administration's economic policies and labeled the wage-price freeze "the latest on the Administration's list of failures."

The freeze, he said, is a "challenge to the free labor movement."

Meany accused the Administration of taking away the basic individual freedom of workers to join together in unions and bargain collectively.

"What comes next?" he asked. "Freedom cannot be divided—parceled out to some here and some there."

He noted that history teaches that "everybody who tries to dictate, clamps down on labor first because you've got to control the means of production.

"The consequences of this action could be far-reaching," Meany warned.

He found particularly objectionable the fact that the wage-price freeze was applied unequally. "It is unfair, inequitable and discriminatory and places the burdens on the victims of inflation," he said.

"It seeks to make labor a scapegoat for the sorry performance of this Administration," he said of what he termed, "Nixon's new economic game plan."

Meany reiterated "organized labor's pledge" made three years ago supporting wage and price controls" as long as it requires equal sacrifice on all forms of income, including bonuses and stock options."

Meany also singled out Dr. Arthur Burns, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, as the author of Nixon's policies and called Burns a "semi-skilled intellectual who plays with other people's lives."

Dr. Burns, he said, "pontificates at gatherings, looks down on people and makes no apology or explanation for the failures of his policies."

Auto Overtime Plans 'Mock' Need for Jobs

Detroit—Plans by major auto makers to use overtime instead of creating new jobs to meet the demand for new cars was called "unconscionable and arrogant" by the Auto Workers.

UAW Pres. Leonard Woodcock said the announcement by General Motors and Ford that they would use compulsory overtime "makes a mockery" of the intent of the Nixon Administration's new economic program.

"The elimination of the auto excise tax, the higher duty on foreign cars and devaluation of the dollar—all designed to boost domestic car sales—were supposed to create thousands of new jobs," Woodcock said. "Instead they will apparently create only overtime pay."

In announcing the stimulation for the U.S. auto market, Pres. Nixon had estimated that every 100,000 increase in the sale of U.S.-made cars would create 25,000 new jobs. But GM and Ford subsequently announced the overtime plan.

"With unemployment in Michigan and the nation at intolerably high levels," Woodcock said, "this policy on the part of GM and Ford is unconscionable, arrogant and totally inconsistent with the President's program, which the industry claims it is supporting."

Woodcock also warned that if overtime is also used in the industries related to auto manufacturing such as glass, rubber, steel and oil, it would severely limit the effort to create new jobs. The UAW has long opposed compulsory overtime.

The Auto Workers also announced plans to fight for cost-of-living increases due its members from two companies. The Caterpillar Tractor Co. and Eltra Corp. were due to pay a cost-of-living increase to some 33,000 UAW members in the first pay period after Sept. 1.

If the members do not get the increase, the UAW said, the union will insist on renegotiating the contracts. In a letter to Caterpillar officials, Vice Pres. Pat Greathouse said the UAW would insist that the full value of the contract "be fully realized during the term of the agreement as permitted by law."

Labor Unites Against New Nixon Policy

Battle Plans Mapped To Counter Inequities

of the President's Executive Order itself, and the ways and means that labor organizations might use to protect their members," said Woll, who presided at the meeting.

"We are also exploring the question of whether the apparent inequality of the Executive Order does raise serious doubts about possible violation of the due-process clause of the Constitution."

Woll said the union lawyers discussed whether or not there is "serious impairment" of wage agreements by the freeze that might be grounds for court action. He said they also discussed contesting the Administration plan as an illegal delegation of congressional authority.

The lawyers meeting followed the Woodcock-Meany session after which Woodcock told reporters that the UAW would "work cooperatively" with the AFL-CIO in opposing various aspects of the Nixon plan before Congress and in developing the overall strategy of organized labor.

He condemned particularly the proposed tax credit to business for investment in new equipment as "fraudulent" because 27 percent of the nation's industrial capacity lies idle and the program would tend to destroy jobs, rather than create them.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson, accompanied by Assistant Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, visited Meany on the day of the lawyers' session. Hodgson later told newsmen the meeting was "cordial" and that he had conveyed the Administration's assurance "that we would provide for consultations and allow organized labor to have a voice in planning what we are going to do in Phase II."

"Phase II" has become Administration jargon for the post-freeze period.

In Meany's letter to Proxmire, the federation president said that labor has no intention of delving into specific economic recommendations now when no one knows what will sift out of the freeze, much less what's going to happen after the 90 days are over.

"Unless Congress were to rescind the broad authority given the President, which he has misused, we must seek to do business with the Executive Branch," Meany said.

"To telegraph our positions in detail now would not be good negotiating strategy."

Meany observed that organized labor's position already has been presented "unequivocally" in the Aug. 19 Executive Council statement which called the Nixon plan "unequitable, unjust, unfair and unworkable."

Meany asked that the statement be included in the record of Proxmire's committee, but declined to testify.

As to specific questions raised by Proxmire. Meany said it was "too early to spell out our answers in such detail" since "at this hour, no one knows what the Administration will do after Nov. 13."

Elsewhere, Treasury Sec. John B. Connally said in a television interview that he thought it "highly unlikely" that all of the freeze measures will be dropped after the 90-day period.

"I would think there would have to be more than that," said Connally, who is chairman of the Cost of Living Council, established to administer the economic freeze.

Nixon's top economist, Paul W. McCracken, said flatly there would be some form of program to control wages and prices after Nov. 13 to avoid a sudden inflationary surge as the freeze ends.

McCracken, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, also warned Congress against income tax cuts in addition to what Nixon has proposed. This was amid speculation that Democrats would attempt to reform the Administration's tax relief plan to give the rank-and-file workers a better break.

One suggestion was to make scheduled 1972 and 1973 income tax cuts effective immediately, to provide more balance to the tax bonanza given business.

McCracken, testifying before the Joint Economic Committee, said further tax cuts would have too much of a fiscal stimulus on the economy.

He mentioned one possibility for controls after the freeze—a tripartite wage-price review board representing labor, management and the public with the power to hold hearings and issue decrees on wages, prices and rents.

Housing & Urban Development Sec. George Romney, a member of the Cost of Living Council, proposed the establishment of such a review board, but added that he was expressing his own personal views.

Commerce Sec. Maurice Stans said that he believed some form of mandatory controls would be needed, as did Hodgson.

The Labor Secretary went further in a television interview, declaring that government controls on corporate profits and dividends might be one element of a program to replace the freeze.

POSSIBLE COURT TEST of the wage-price freeze was the subject of an AFL-CIO headquarters conference attended by lawyers from federation affiliates, plus the Auto Workers, the Mine Workers and the Longshoremen & Warehousemen. AFL-CIO Gen. Counsel J. Albert Woll, right, served as conference chairman.

One-Sided Trickle-Down Scheme Can't Be Accepted, Kirkland Says

Montreal—Organized labor is not going to stand still for any economic scheme, new or old, which enriches the fortunate few at the expense of the many, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers' convention.

Terming Pres. Nixon's proposed 10 percent investment tax credit for business "a trickle-down scheme that won't even drip," Kirkland said the attempt to call it a "job-creation tax credit" merely adds insult to injury.

Earlier, in a television interview, Kirkland said it was no surprise that the U.S. Chamber of Commerce was exuberant about Nixon's proposals because the plan is "a pretext for giving gigantic tax giveaways and bonanzas to large corporations . . . a form of Robin Hood in reverse."

Kirkland said labor's position has always been that economic action must "apply in an even-handed manner to all sections of the economy." But, far from being even-handed, the wage freeze initiated by Nixon "is a form of arbitrary, unilateral, one-sided oppression," Kirkland said.

"There is no freeze at all on interest rates, corporate profits, bank profits or capital gains," he said. "There is no freeze on dividends; merely a pious hope that they will not be raised. There is no freeze on land speculation or stock market profiteering."

While attacking the one-sidedness of the wage freeze and calling the investment tax credit a scheme "to divert public funds into private pockets," Kirkland also pointed out to the Pulp-Sulphite Workers that many vitally needed social programs have been delayed in the interim. He said that Nixon has:

- Shown no signs of releasing the $12 billion Congress has already appropriated for public projects.
- Changed his mind about welfare reform. "If ever there was a time to bring order to the chaos of America's crazy quilt pattern of welfare programs, it is now. But Mr. Nixon counsels more delay," Kirkland said.
- Backed out of his pledge of federal aid to the states and cities at a time when need is the greatest —"with public services declining, teachers joining the unemployment lines and police and fire and sanitation departments undermanned, underequipped and underpaid."
- Reduced government services to the American people by cutting back federal employment 5 percent, wiping out 140,000 jobs.
- Missed the point of international trade problems with the 10 percent border tax, which does not strike at the heart of the matter—"the multinational corporations which are managing international trade by their own rules for their own benefit."

"The needs of the United States are public needs," Kirkland said. "There is a backlog of unfinished business that will require the full use of the giant industrial capacity of the United States and full employment of every worker, as far ahead as anyone can see."

Kirkland cited some of the needs as 25 million new housing units; more schools, parks and recreation areas; medical facilities and personnel; low-cost transit systems; new waste disposal systems and new technology and hardware to extract poisons from the air, the water and the soil.

In analyzing the time Nixon has been in office, Kirkland said that "for the last 2½ years America's wealth has been steadily concentrated in fewer and fewer hands. The rich are getting richer, while the number of those below the poverty line has grown."

When Nixon took office in January 1969, he inherited a strong and productive economy at the end of an eight-year period of economic expansion, Kirkland pointed out. The unemployment rate was 3.4 percent, the lowest in 15 years.

"He argued that the inflation rate of 4.2 percent then existing was too high and he promised to control inflation and stabilize the economy without unfairly burdening any one group," Kirkland said. "He promised to take steps that would create 5 million new jobs."

"Well, there are not 5 million new jobs. There are 5 million workers unemployed; 14.5 million Americans are on the welfare rolls; 25.5 million citizens of the richest nation on earth are living in poverty.

"Because of Mr. Nixon's economic mismanagement, more than 800 American communities are economic disaster areas. Industrial production is 27 percent below capacity," Kirkland noted.

"At the same time, instead of reducing inflation, Nixon's policies actually accelerated it. The 4.2 inflation rate rose to 5.4 percent in 1969, then to 5.9 percent. And the end is not in sight.

"The burden of both inflation and recession has not been equal. It has fallen on the poor, on pensioners, on wage earners and on state and local governments."

"So above all, the United States needs leadership," Kirkland said. "America needs an administration that cares about human beings. And we in labor intend to see that she gets what she needs."

President Extends Delay In Blue Collar Pay Rise

San Clemente, Calif.—Pres. Nixon ordered a six-month delay in scheduled pay increases for 600,000 federal blue collar workers. At the same time he asked Congress to let stand his earlier decision to postpone a raise due Jan. 1 for 1.3 million government white collar employes and 2.8 million members of the armed forces.

Blue collar rates are set locally and raises occur at various times of the year. The Western White House estimated that the government could save $1.3 million by delaying raises for six months. The white collar workers had been voted a pay hike of 6 to 7 percent as of next Jan. 1, and now must wait until July 1, 1972, unless Congress intervenes.

The President also indicated he will take a "close look" at October 1972 wage boosts scheduled for most federal employes.

The application of the Nixon wage freeze to federal service drew the fire of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. and the Machinists, representing many government workers. MTD Pres. Paul J. Burnsky called the blue-collar action "highly unfair." The IAM called it a "catastrophe" for workers in U.S. shipyards, arsenals, aviation facilities and other civilian workplaces.

Both groups are expected to join others in asking Congress, when it returns Sept. 8, to overturn the President's wage increase moratorium. Either house of Congress will have the first 30 days to reject the new freeze date.

Nixon sent Congress a message saying he wants to continue to "set an example for the American people in our striving to achieve prosperity in peacetime."

The Machinists accused the President of stacking an additional hardship on federal workers atop the 90-day freeze by ordering the firing of 150,000 federal employes. They would be affected by the 5 percent reduction in force.

Noting that Nixon "miserably failed" to stem inflation by creating unemployment, the union charged that "the President has come up with the brilliant idea of creating even more unemployment."

"To the 5 million Americans who are already out of work because of Nixon's economic theories," the IAM council said, "he now wants to add at least 150,000 federal workers."

The Administration's attempt to combat "the profiteering spiral" is geared to reducing the already depleted purchasing power of the work force, the IAM declared.

Gladys Dickason Dies, Held ACWA Office

New York — Gladys Dickason, former vice president of the Clothing Workers, died in New York at the age of 68.

During her 30-year career with the Clothing Workers she had been an organizer and research director as well as a vice president of the union. She had retired in 1963.

Unions Across Country Move To Protect Rights of Members

West Coast Longshoremen & Warehousemen, a 10-week construction dispute in Seattle and Tacoma, Wash., telephone and telegraph strikes in New York, and strikes by copper workers in Montana and utility workers in Michigan. The Communications Workers later sent a tentative telegraph settlement to a vote of striking members.

Unions reacted to the wage-raise embargo in ways like these:

- The Machinists condemned Pres. Nixon's "new economic game plan" as strikebreaking and prepared to ask Congress to divide the inflation-fighting burden more equitably between workers, businessmen and stockholders. The IAM advised all locals to settle strikes over economic issues by interim agreement.

- The Railway & Airline Clerks announced that on Nov. 13 it will consider its contracts canceled and its members free to strike unless scheduled wage increases are paid and controls are clamped on corporate profits and dividends.

- The Painters, calling the wage freeze a "one-sided package we simply cannot support and in which we have no faith," notified local unions to continue seeking signed agreements, by striking if they have to, and to see that increased benefits are placed in escrow for payment after the freeze ends.

- Four postal unions filed suit in federal court to exempt 650,000 postal employes from the freeze. The law creating the new U.S. Postal Service specifically exempts them from such curbs, the unions said. (Story, Page 7.)

Some striking unions announced they will stay out until a satisfactory settlement is reached. They endorsed the AFL-CIO stand that unions are free to strike "when any raise comes due under a contract and they don't get it."

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service reported that 30,000 workers in 104 strikes at the time of Nixon's freeze order have since returned to work. The service acknowledged, however, that a number of the settlements followed satisfactory agreements between employers and unions on full contract terms.

IAM Pres. Floyd Smith accused Nixon of being the nation's "chief strikebreaker." No other Administration in history, he said, "has ever demanded that every American on strike return to work" under the same terms that "drove them to strike in the first place." More than 8,000 members of 70 IAM locals are currently on strike.

The IAM executive council said it will push ahead with negotiations for 50,000 Lockheed Aircraft workers whose contracts already have expired, and 42,000 Boeing Co. employes whose pacts are due to expire in October.

The Auto Workers reaffirmed their intention to challenge the Nixon freeze order in court. Pres. Leonard Woodcock said the union will consider its new auto industry contracts null and void if the freeze extends beyond 90 days and controls are not extended to profits and interest rates.

The UAW is reviewing its present strikes—54 involving 12,000 workers—to decide whether they should be terminated.

"Obviously it makes no sense to ask people to continue making the sacrifice of striking," Woodcock said. But some non-economic strikes, like one at the Alcoa plant in Cleveland over a new incentive system, probably will be continued.

Three public employe organizations announced that they will fight all attempts by local governments to spend for other purposes funds earmarked for salaries. They are the State, County & Municipal Employes; the Fire Fighters and the National Education Association.

The AFL-CIO Teachers urged local unions to follow the traditional "no contract-no work" policy and to insist on the payment of salary increments and wage increases already negotiated.

The Mine Workers, now in negotiations with bituminous coal employers, said "We intend to make up for past inflation, and to win our full equity. . . . We have a good deal of catching-up to do in wages and pension benefits."

In other developments:

- Musicians' Pres. Hal Davis asked the Administration to exempt symphony players from the freeze because of the limited number involved and "because they are so severely underpaid."

- The Cost of Living Council ruled that construction wage agreements submitted before Aug. 15 are exempt from the freeze if wage benefits were to take effect before that date. Also it ruled that wage hikes customarily keyed to the steel industry wage settlement may be applied to office, clerical and craft personnel in the mills.

- The Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes charged that "a great many professional people will be forced to make sacrifices in unequal measure with their employers." Whether or not the new policies will help the unemployed scientist and engineer is "purely conjectural," it said.

BNA reported in its Collective Bargaining Negotiations & Contracts that deferred wage increases are scheduled to take effect between Aug. 14 and Nov. 13 in 890 labor-management agreements. Such increases range from 5 cents an hour for Northern California union farm workers to $1.30 an hour negotiated a year ago by Boston Plumbers.

About 300,000 employes in transportation — more than half in the railroad industry — and more than 70,000 in wholesale and retail stores will have to forego scheduled increases, along with many other groups.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Research listed deferred increases due 232,000 workers in September, most of them in metal-working and meat packing; 253,000 in October, 823,000 in November, mainly in auto, construction, and New York City laundries. Most are members of the following unions:

Meat Cutters; Bakery & Confectionery Workers; Clothing Workers; Carpenters; Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Steelworkers; Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union; International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Operating Engineers; and Laborers, plus those previously listed.

Laundry Workers' H.E. Chandler Dies

Los Angeles—Harold E. Chandler, vice president of the Laundry & Dry Cleaning Union and secretary-treasurer of its Local 52, died unexpectedly of an apparent heart attack. He was 50.

Born in Atlanta, Chandler came here after service in the Air Force and took a job as a dry cleaner part time to help finance his education. He was named to the Local 52 executive board in 1947, was elected a business representative, and later local president and an international vice president. He served also as a vice president of the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO.

Fat Profit Margins Give Japan Leeway

A Japanese government official has explained that you have room to be flexible in international trade if your profit margin is high enough —say in the neighborhood of 300 percent.

"The markup on some (Japanese) exports is pretty high, in some cases up to 300 percent," Vice Minister of Finance Takashi Hosomi was quoted by United Press International.

"That leaves a lot of room for bargaining with American distributors, even if the prices are frozen," Hosomi said in response to questions about the impact the import tax and other new U.S. policies would have on Japanese exporters.

Michigan Firm Faces Suit on Equal Pay Law

The Labor Dept. went to court to force a balky Grand Rapids, Mich., brass company to obey the Equal Pay Act of 1963, which requires equal pay for women who perform the same tasks as men.

U.S. District Court in Grand Rapids was asked to issue a permanent injunction against the Keeler Brass Co., which the government says has been underpaying 200 women workers at least 67 cents an hour less than men workers for general manufacturing jobs requiring equal skill, effort and responsibility for performance under similar working conditions.

The complaint puts the company's potential liability to its women employes at $576,000 due as of last Dec. 19, plus additional amounts for continued violations of the equal pay law.

Six of Keeler's eight plants in the Grand Rapids area are involved, the suit charges. The firm makes automotive trim and hardware, furniture hardware and similar items.

Investigators for the department's Wage & Hour division uncovered underpayments and the court suit was brought when the company refused to correct the violations.

For the entire fiscal year 1971, the Wage-Hour division found that some 30,000 women workers were underpaid by more than $14 million. This compares with 17,719 persons deprived of $6.1 million in wages due for Fiscal 1970—an increase of nearly $8 million for 12,000 more workers in a year's time.

Senior Citizens See Little Help In Nixon Plan

The National Council of Senior Citizens told Pres. Nixon that his new economic plan "offers little hope for older people" and urged him to demonstrate his concern for the "desperate problems of the low-income elderly" by deeds in addition to words.

Reminding the President that he had assured council representatives last May that he recognized the need for a social security boost "above and beyond a mere cost-of-living increase," the three-million member NCSC asked him to take two actions:

- Publicly voice his support for a social security increase.

- Approve a pending bill for federal takeover of public assistance to the aged, blind and disabled.

Both are provided for in a combined social security and welfare reform bill that has been approved by the House of Representatives and awaits action in the Senate, NCSC Pres. Nelson H. Cruikshank said in a letter to Nixon.

He wrote: "Mr. President, our elderly citizens contributed much to raising America's standards to unprecedented levels. Surely you would not want any portion of the burden of your Administration's efforts in the present economic situation to fall on the backs of our aged, blind or crippled people.

"You have taken personal leadership in this economic crisis. Can we have your assurance at this time that your Administration will support the vital provisions" of the bill "affecting these people?"

Referring to the President's action in freezing wages, prices and rents, Cruikshank emphasized that very few of the elderly will dash out to buy new cars. He noted, too, that the freeze order does not affect rent increases levied by landlords after the last social security raise in June. And there is "nothing in your plan to protect them against rising interest rates," he said.

Cruikshank told Nixon that the council "will continue to press for an immediate 25 percent increase in social security benefits—an increase in the purchasing power of the elderly poor which is desperately needed by them and which, we believe, will also bolster the nation's economy."

An estimated 5 million elderly live in poverty and millions of other seniors are "perilously close to the poverty line," Cruikshank said.

Money Supply Expanded:

Actions on Interest Shun Real Controls

The Nixon Administration initiated two actions designed to stabilize interest rates, but it stopped far short of imposing any real controls on the price of money or rolling back interest rates as the AFL-CIO has urged repeatedly.

The measures, by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and the Government National Mortgage Association, poured more money into the mortgage market in hopes that the increased availability of money would halt the climb of interest rates.

But the rates weren't even chilled by this tack or by Pres. Nixon's wage-price freeze. The Administration has said that it left interest rates untouched because the Economic Stabilization Act of 1970—on which the wage-price freeze is based—did not give it the authority to put the damper on the price of money.

The Credit Control Act of 1969 does, however, and this piece of enabling legislation has been ignored by the Administration.

The AFL-CIO, in a statement on the action by the home loan board and the national mortgage association, noted that "it still does nothing to control interest rates. The action does not meet the test of equity laid down by the AFL-CIO Executive Council."

The New Jersey AFL-CIO charged that federally chartered banks in that state already have hiked interest rates from 6.5 to 7 percent on collateral loans by the process of back-dating the authorization to the eve of Nixon's order.

"We have further sworn evidence that the notice to the borrower came two weeks after the President's address to the nation," said Sec.-Treas. John J. Brown. "It only confirms the original observations made by the state AFL-CIO that the banking industry intends to give only lip-service to the President's manifesto on the wage-price freeze."

And the Administration's hands-off policy on interest rates prompted Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.) to characterize the wage-price freeze as "economic folly of the highest order" because the price of money has not been frozen.

The bank board, which regulates savings and loan associations, reduced the amount of cash those firms must keep on hand in reserve for emergencies, thus freeing up to $800 million for lending to home buyers.

At the same time, the mortgage association, which buys mortgages from savings and loan companies, announced a cut in its charges. This will reduce the cost of a mortgage, but only by $600.

The $600 may sound significant, but it is a small amount in light of the total cost of a mortgage. For example, a $20,000 mortgage at 7 percent interest over 30 years costs $27,880—plus repayment of the principal, $20,000.

And this is assuming the buyer was lucky enough to obtain a mortgage at 7 percent.

In 1969 and 1970, mortgage interest rates jumped as high as 9 percent—putting the cost of a $20,000, 30-year mortgage at $37,931, plus repayment of the $20,000.

According to Preston Martin, chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, "hundreds of savings and loan associations were bumping up" against the reserve requirements, causing them to refrain from making additional loans and putting additional pressure on mortgage interest rates.

Patman called the measures "totally inadequate" and urged the President to use his authority to control not only interest rates but all consumer credit rates as well.

"This is broad power giving the President the authority to stabilize and roll back interest rates to any level he desires," Patman said of the Credit Control Act.

"Interest charges are reflected in the price of every item in the economy—including food, clothing, transportation — and it is economic folly of the highest order to let the banks go scot free while the rest of the nation is called on for sacrifices."

The law cited by Patman states specifically that "whenever the President determines that such action is necessary or appropriate for the purpose of preventing or cutting inflation generated by the extension of credit in an excessive volume, the President may authorize the (Federal Reserve) Board to regulate and control any or all extensions of credit."

The Administration tactics on interest rates did have an effect on the "point" or "discount" systems in buying home mortgages or down-payment systems on other types of mortgages. It lowered the going rate from 9 to 6 points—which amounts to a $600 saving on a $20,000 mortgage.

Under the point or discount systems, a bank may require the payment of "6 points" or 6 percent of the value of the mortgage just for granting the loan.

Cost of Living Council's Decisions Affect Negotiated Wage Increases

The Cost of Living Council has issued a 14-page summary of its decisions to date and many of the rulings provide the answers to questions often asked of the council and the Office of Emergency Preparedness, which is charged with monitoring the wage-price freeze.

Most of the glacier-sized summary on the wage-price freeze deals with wages.

The following are some of the rulings applied to the worker:

Collective Bargaining—Negotiations for wage increases can continue during the freeze, but negotiated increases can not be implemented during the freeze now scheduled to end Nov. 13. Nor can a union negotiate for pay increases effective after the freeze but retroactive to cover the freeze period.

Deferred Wage Increases—Any wage or salary increase including those previously contracted for by the unions, which was to take effect between Aug. 15 and Nov. 13 will be held in abeyance. Teachers are covered by this rule, but some interpretations may permit prior contracts to become effective during the freeze.

Although this was the original ruling, it has been eased to allow wage increases for Communications Workers and Steelworkers whose new contracts were ratified just prior to implementation of the freeze and were retroactive. The council also gave a relaxed ruling on supervisors' wages.

Supervisory Pay—The council said that pay increases for supervisors are permitted if their wages are closely tied to those of rank-and-file workers who received increases in contracts negotiated prior to the freeze—if the following conditions prevail:

1. The agreement to which the increases are linked was reached before Aug. 15.

2. Prior to Aug. 15 work was performed (by the supervisors whose wages are closely tied to the increases reached before the freeze) that would be eligible for payment at the new rate.

3. The increased wage rate for supervisors was scheduled to go into effect on the same day as the negotiated wage increases as a matter of established practice.

4. The workers are employes of the same firm.

5. The company is able to demonstrate that this procedure is an established practice.

Education Pay—Scheduled pay increases which are dependent on employes completing certain educational requirements may be paid during the freeze, the council ruled. But it depends on whether the employer "can certify that an agreement was in existence that provided for such increases."

"The pay increase can be granted because, in effect the action is a bona fide promotion," the council ruled. "For example, a teacher who has been awarded a master's degree can receive the increment which is normally given. If the effective date of the teacher's contract is after Aug. 15, the increment must be no more than the amount that was granted last year."

New Jobs—Wages and salaries for new jobs will be determined through scales set up on the basis of comparable jobs in the firm or similar firms.

"If a firm has a range of salaries for the same job, the employe may be paid any salary within the range which the qualifications of the applicant justify as long as the average wage paid by the firm in this job classification does not increase."

Promotions — Although wage rates for a particular job are frozen, a person promoted to a new job with greater responsibility will be able to get the additional wage associated with that job.

"For example, if somebody is promoted from assistant manager to manager of a department store, he would get the pay rate associated with the position of manager. His salary would not be frozen at that of an assistant manager."

An employe may transfer from a job paying a flat rate to one paid on an incentive basis, but no new incentive systems may be established during the freeze. Piece work rates and commissions also are frozen.

Severance Pay—"If employes are severed for normal business reasons," the council ruled, they can receive severance pay—as long as the employer certifies that this is an established practice.

Apprentices—Also allowed are increases in certified apprentice and learner rates under programs established prior to Aug. 15.

Merit and longevity increases are not permitted.

Goodbye Columbus Day And Other Fringe Gains

When is a national holiday not really a holiday?

Come Columbus Day 1971—the second Monday in October—a lot of union members who thought they were going to get the day off with pay for the first time are due for a shock. They can't collect under the terms of Pres. Nixon's wage freeze.

On the strength of a 1968 law making Columbus Day an official national holiday effective in 1971, a number of unions negotiated it as an additional paid holiday and as part of the overall economic package in their settlements. But the Office of Emergency Preparedness says the wage freeze prohibits workers from getting the additional holiday with pay if it represents a new benefit this year.

A summary statement of Cost of Living Council decisions states that the freeze on negotiated salary and wage increases covers all forms of remuneration, including such fringe benefits as:

"Vacation and holiday payment; bonuses; layoff and supplemental unemployment insurance benefits; night-shift, overtime and other premiums; employer contributions to pension or annuity funds; payments in kind; job perquisites; cost-of-living allowances; expense accounts; stock options, payments for deferred compensation and all other 'fringe benefits.'"

In addition, the council said, "there may be no changes in working conditions which result in more pay per hour worked." For example, the work week or work day cannot be reduced.

Fringe benefits including profit-sharing cannot be implemented or increased nor can other fringes such as days off for funerals "that are not in accordance with pre-established levels. . . ."

Pension benefits were one exception to the freeze on fringes and the council said increases "to those retired before the freeze or those about to retire are allowed if they are planned increases."

$1 Million Pledge:

Teachers Fund Set To Oppose Nixon

San Francisco—The American Federation of Teachers wound up its 55th annual convention with a stinging rebuke to the Nixon Administration's economic policies and a pledge to raise at least a $1 million political action fund "for the purpose of replacing the Nixon Administration with one understanding of the needs of the nation's schools and working people."

The 1,335 delegates and alternates overwhelmingly approved a resolution from the union's executive council calling for a set of actions nationally and locally.

The AFT urged its local unions to continue to follow a policy of "no contract—no work" and to insist upon the payment of salary schedule increments and increases already negotiated.

In addition, the AFT announced an emergency legislative conference of union teacher leaders from all over the nation to meet in Washington Sept. 8-9, when Congress reconvenes, to set in motion a massive legislative lobbying effort.

AFT officials also announced that they would confer immediately with officers of the AFL-CIO and appropriate federal officials "in an effort to compel the President to revoke his plan."

The union described the economic freeze as "a devastating blow against education, teachers and workers throughout the nation."

Because many teachers do not reach full normal earning power for 10 to 15 years, in accordance with salary schedules embodying delayed increases, accepted by the teacher at the time of hiring as a condition of work, the AFT charged:

"In effect, therefore, Pres. Nixon has ordered teachers to take a cut in salary and has summarily abrogated contracts reached by many months of negotiations."

"In many cases, these mandated increments are in budgets approved by taxpayer referenda," AFT officials emphasized.

Court action against the wage freeze was being contemplated by the AFT and such local unions as the United Federation of Teachers, the New York City affiliate, whose 72,000 members approved a contract two years ago with the school board which includes increases and increments due before the expiration of the 90-day wage freeze period.

In other actions, the convention approved a resolution calling for "an immediate ceasefire and withdrawal of all United States forces from Indochina as soon as reasonable precautions can be taken for the safety of U.S. troops."

The resolution also sought to have "economic resources presently dedicated to the military effort in Southeast Asia . . . reassigned to improving education, health, housing and other urgently needed social services."

New York Local 2 Pres. Albert Shanker, an AFT vice president, calling for "a political action arm in the American Federation of Teachers," reminded the convention of the "horrible consequences of the Nixon election."

He urged cooperation with the AFL-CIO in a coalition of progressive forces as part of a "massive political movement."

"Think what we're losing if we don't get Nixon out of the White House," he concluded.

Delegates approved unanimously a resolution condemning the Soviet Union for its refusal to permit the exit of Soviet Jews to Israel.

The convention also took action to protect teacher tenure, to seek adequate financing of public education, to call for parent and community cooperation with the schools, and to fight for women's rights.

Teachers Call Session To Fight Wage Freeze

The AFL-CIO Teachers called leaders of its local unions to an Education Emergency Conference in Washington to protect negotiated increases against the Nixon wage freeze.

The freeze is "seriously and adversely affecting the incomes of hundreds of thousands of teachers, news reports notwithstanding," AFT Pres. David Selden said in a call to the conference sent to all teacher unions. Delegates will convene at 8 p.m. Sept. 8 and spend all of Sept. 9 telling their story to members of Congress.

The AFT will "insist that locals are free to take appropriate action to enforce contract terms, and to conclude pending negotiations," Selden said.

The conferees will ask Congress to act at once to exempt all salary schedule increments for teachers from the effects of the freeze order and to change the effective date of any such order "so that contracts now in force will be observed and negotiations be allowed to continue to their normal conclusion," Selden said.

The union asserts that under present government interpretations, many teachers will not receive either scheduled raises or yearly increment increases if the effective date comes after Aug. 15, when the freeze went into effect.

The "much-heralded government ruling" that increases in effect before Aug. 15 will be paid "should evoke few cheers in districts where the ruling compounds the inequity and disparity in salaries," Selden said in calling the conference.

Teachers "in the last stages of negotiations are penalized for their refusal to acquiesce early to recalcitrant school boards" and administrators, his statement said.

The union's interpretation of the freeze effects on schools was verified by a high Administration official. Treasury Under Sec. Charls E. Walker told newsmen that "contrary to prevailing belief, most teacher pay raises for the school season just starting will not be allowed" under the Nixon freeze order.

"The teacher salary thing has been very greatly misinterpreted in the press," Walker told members of Congress and congressional employes seeking guidance in answering the questions of constituents. When all the facts are in, "I believe most teacher pay increases will not be permitted."

Walker said the crucial factor is not the date on which school contracts are signed but the date on which first services are rendered under the contract or salary schedule.

Wire services reported Aug. 27 that, under a new ruling by the Cost of Living Council, many of the nation's 2.1 million public school teachers could get pay raises. The ruling was that teachers covered by a system-wide contract, rather than an individual contract, could accept a raise if at least one teacher in the group had actually worked under the contract before Aug. 15.

Walker said the report of the council's 700-word "clarification" was a misinterpretation of the statement. The AFT called the ruling an "abomination" because it "bails out" those school officials most recalcitrant in negotiating pay raises.

Mrs. Knauer Agrees Worker Hurt Most

At least one member of the Administration has conceded that the wage earner will suffer the most from frost bite brought on by inequities in Pres. Nixon's economic freeze.

Mrs. Virginia Knauer, presidential assistant for consumer affairs and a member of the Cost of Living Council set up to administer the freeze, admitted on network television that the worker is the one who really needs a break.

Speaking on NBC-TV's Today show, Mrs. Knauer said:

"It's the worker in a freeze situation who has been hurt. Certainly all the wage increases that the workers have gotten in these last few years have been eaten up by inflation."

She said she expected the President's Council of Economic Advisers to determine "what is needed to continue stimulation of the economy so that the American worker gets a break."

Nevada Labor Focuses On Voters, Legislation

Reno—The Nevada AFL-CIO put two major goals on its 1971 agenda—a concentrated register-and-vote campaign involving every union member, and updating the state's workmen's compensation law.

Pres. Al Bramlet and Sec.-Treas. Louis Paley told the 15th state federation convention that the legislature had recently improved several laws affecting workers and is ready to make a comprehensive study of the workmen's compensation law to bring it more in line with laws passed in other states.

Paley is a member of a committee that will advise the legislature next year on needed changes. The convention approved proposals, for improvements including these:

- An increase in benefits to 66⅔ percent of an injured worker's average weekly wage for himself, or for his widow and children.
- No waiting period for benefits.
- Living expenses during rehabilitation.
- Payment of full medical benefits for occupational injury or disease.

The law has no provision for rehabilitation and retraining of injured workers now, unlike laws in some other states, Paley said. The convention called for correction of that lack.

AFL-CIO COPE Director Al Barkan urged the 225 delegates from 80 local unions to "let your members know" what to do about their needs as voters and citizens. He appealed to union officers to explain the issues and identify the candidates in terms members can understand. He urged them "not to be sidetracked by phony issues."

The number one objective this year and next, he said, is full participation of every citizen in register-and-vote campaigns.

The delegates recommended that all city, county and state governing bodies should be required by law to establish disability pensions for injured police and firemen. They also asked for a cost-of-living adjustment in pensions of retired state employes who, the convention pointed out, have had their benefits cut by at least 25 percent because of inflation in the past five years.

The convention returned Bramlet to office for a two-year term and re-elected Vice Presidents B. W. Tucker, George Beebe and Claude Evans. Bobby Robinson of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers was elected to fill a vice presidential vacancy.

Charles Nichols Named Carpenters' Treasurer

The Carpenters announced that Executive Board Member Charles E. Nichols has been appointed treasurer of the union, succeeding Peter E. Terzick who is retiring after serving 10 years in the post.

Nichols, 50, is a native of Desdemona, Tex., and joined Local 2035 of the Carpenters in Crystal Bay, Nev., in 1946 after his discharge from the Army.

After moving to California in 1947 he became active in Local 1484 where he rose from recording secretary of the local to business manager of the Tulare and Kings Counties Building & Construction Trades Council.

Nichols became a general representative of the Carpenters in 1956. Ten years later Pres. M. A. Hutcheson appointed him as a member of the executive board representing the union's eighth district on the West Coast.

His interim appointment as treasurer will end at the Carpenters 1974 convention when an election will be held.

Terzick's union career has spanned 34 years and saw him rise from vice president of his local in Seattle to become general treasurer. He was appointed to the treasurer's post in 1961 and was elected at conventions in 1962, 1966 and 1970.

He has also served as editor of The Carpenter, the union's monthly magazine, since 1943, and will continue to edit the publication until a successor is named.

Terzick also is currently serving as chairman of the AFL-CIO Technical Committee on Problems of Older and Retired Workers.

El Paso Building Trades Awarded Training Pact

El Paso, Tex.—The El Paso Building & Construction Trades Council has been awarded an 18-month contract by the Labor Dept. to prepare minority youths to enter apprenticeships in the construction trades.

The $78,454 contract is part of a continuing program which offers training of two types: Apprenticeship Outreach, which prepares youths to enter apprenticeships; and Journeyman Upgrading, which helps older craftsmen qualify for full journeyman status and union membership.

Rhode Island to Hawaii:

Wide Rank-and-File Support Pours in for AFL-CIO Stand

Messages of support for the AFL-CIO's stand on the wage-price freeze poured into federation headquarters in Washington during the past two weeks.

They came from all levels of the trade union movement—from international unions, state and local central bodies and local unions. Many were handwritten notes from individual union members.

They came from across the nation, from Rhode Island to California to Hawaii.

Some contained elaborate plans for approaching and opposing the freeze. Some were brief, one-line telegrams of wholehearted approval, like the one from Terre Haute, Ind., Local 46 of The Newspaper Guild, which said simply:

"Right on, George!"

The State, County & Municipal Employes, representing more than a half-million workers in the public employment field, adopted a seven-point program of non-cooperation with the freeze during an emergency executive board meeting in Minneapolis.

"We anticipate that the President's initial 90-day freeze will be extended in one form or another," a 2,000-word resolution said.

"We refuse to sit idly by while millions of state and local government employes get caught in months and possibly years of delay in achieving equity in their wages, and millions of American working men and women are asked to unfairly sacrifice while business benefits."

Chief among the measures adopted by the AFSCME executive board was a proposal to "pursue with our full resources" the policy of non-cooperation adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in regard to the freeze.

The union planned also to work for "total exemption or separate consideration" for public employes under the freeze, using "legal tests, administrative appeals and revision, legislative resources and, if necessary, job action."

AFSCME also is insisting that local governments put tax funds budgeted for pay raises into escrow and not divert them for other expenditures.

AFSCME leaders pointedly kicked off a nationwide fund raising drive for political action, as did the Teachers during their 55th convention. (Story, Page 6.)

Rubber Workers Pres. Peter Bommarito said his union is in full agreement with the long-held AFL-CIO position supporting wage-price controls as long as they are equitably placed and even-handedly applied.

He called for mandatory action that would require employers to put "frozen" wage increases into an escrow account "for later distribution to workers for whom they were intended under the terms of signed contracts."

The Rubber Workers leader had some telling figures on what the freezing of wages does to an employer's profits.

"For example, an employer with 15,000 employes who—under the freeze—does not have to pay a 25-cent hourly, previously negotiated increase 'makes' an additional $30,000 a day, or $150,000 in a five-day workweek.

"There are thousands of such situations and this means millions of dollars in windfalls for employers," Bommarito said.

The Executive Board of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, meeting in Washington, backed the federation stand and called for government and trade union programs "to reach the attainable goal of full employment in the United States."

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings said "the elected board members of IUE, coming from all parts of the country and representing all segments of the work force in our industry, made clear that IUE members vigorously oppose most of the steps taken.

"They know that while Pres. Nixon's program will do little to create jobs, it will give direct benefits to business in the form of uncontrolled profits, tax subsidies and release from contractual obligations to employes."

During its session, the IUE board laid plans for large-scale participation of its members—including those forced out of work by cheap imports—in an Oct. 4 rally of the AFL-CIO's Industrial Union Dept.

The board urged that the rally be broadened from its original format dealing with imports and runaway companies to include the AFL-CIO position on the freeze.

Service Employes Pres. George Hardy called for exemption from the freeze of all wages of less than $150 a week.

In a letter to Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.), chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, he pointed out that the wage freeze makes "injustice a keystone of economic policy" and "freezes poverty."

Pres. Gilbert Jewell of the Allied Industrial Workers said that "business is actually going to profit at the expense of the worker" under the Nixon plan.

"The President's action, coupled with his demand for an end to all strikes, has already caused hardship for workers on strike and puts the federal government in the position of being a 'strikebreaker.' "

A telegram to Pres. George Meany from Pres. Harold T. Bockman of the Delaware AFL-CIO, said "we . . . would like you to know that we support you 1,000 percent in all of your efforts. Your record speaks for itself."

A message from the Rhode Island AFL-CIO said "since the issuance of the Aug. 15 manifesto, the office has been deluged with calls from working people protesting the unfair treatment at the hands of Pres. Nixon. We have advised the callers to maintain as much calm as possible."

The message went on to support the federation president, noting that "he has an obligation to protect the best interests of the American worker from greed in business, ineptness in the national Administration and unfair treatment. He has caried out that obligation with courage and we of the Rhode Island AFL-CIO comend him for it."

Iowa AFL-CIO Pres. Hugh D. Clark in a message to Meany said that state central body has "complete confidence in his leadership and ability to 'COPE' with the Nixon attack."

The Executive Council of the California AFL-CIO, representing 1.6 million union members in that state, was in unanimous support of the federation's stand.

And Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning said the state central body "pledges its moral and organizational support to AFL-CIO, Teamster, and Longshoremen & Warehousemen members now on strike in this state."

Pres. Leon J. Davis of New York City Local 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, said "we are not bound and will not be bound by any no-strike provisions of the presidential order."

He said the local union's 1,000 stewards will meet Sept. 15 in New York to consider what steps are to be taken in fighting the restrictions of the freeze. The local has 50,000 members in the New York-New Jersey area.

The Hawaii AFL-CIO said virtually every affiliated and unaffiliated union plus the Building & Construction Trades Dept. there are in complete opposition to the freeze.

BCTC in Hawaii also hired an attorney to ascertain "at what point building trades contracts will be nullified and what steps can be legally taken to secure incremental increases negotiated for in contracts written in 1967 and due to expire in 1972."

The Hawaii federation entitled its remarks on the new economic plan "Policy Statement on Wage-Price Freeze—or—The Great Labor Robbery."

"We have yet to hear from an employer who opposes the freeze, and no wonder," said the statement.

A Roslyn Heights, N.Y., school teacher told Meany she was solidly behind him, adding that "our contract was signed in October 1969. If this goes by the board, then the whole structure of collective bargaining is not worth a damn."

A letter from Park Forest, Ill., said "The position you have taken on the President's Wage-Price Freeze program, I believe, shows foresight, is courageous and correct."

A letter from an Auto Worker in Buena Park, Calif., called the President's action "revolting."

"We have been keeping up with your strong fight to help the worker," said a letter to Meany from Lino C. Tinajero, a UAW member.

He also sent along a copy of a letter he wrote to Pres. Nixon demanding that Nixon "return to me and my family the money you took from my paycheck. I have earned my wage increase that my union has negotiated for me and I do not intend for the rich corporation that I work for to get even richer on my wage increase that is due in October."

"I am tired of the abuse and unfairness against the working man," said Tinajero's letter to Nixon. "I want justice. . . ."

Meany Assails Irish Detention

"True protection of the law" for citizens in Northern Ireland who are being detained without trial was called for by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in a statement on current disorders.

"Centuries of progress and civilization itself are gravely menaced by the dictatorial decrees permitting the detention of Irishmen without court trial," Meany said. "English law, from which we derive much, and the authorities in Belfast should . . . show true protection of the law" to citizens.

'Listen, Would I Kid You?'

Postal Unions File Suit To Protect Wage Gains

Four unions with the exclusive right to represent 650,000 postal workers filed suit for a restraint order and an award of damages against the Postal Service and Administration officials responsible for the Aug. 15 wage freeze.

The unions took the action in a petition filed in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. They asked the court to rule that application of the President's freeze order to halt within-grade salary increases and nullify a $250 wage raise due Oct. 21 is unauthorized by the Economic Stabilization Act and is therefore illegal.

The unions are the Postal Workers, Letter Carriers, the Mail Handlers division of the Laborers—all AFL-CIO affiliates—and the Rural Letter Carriers, unaffiliated.

Mozart G. Ratner, chief legal counsel for the unions, said they base their claim on specific provisions of the Postal Reorganization Act which protect collective bargaining agreements in the Postal Service against "impairment by any other congressional enactment." The unions also maintain that the due process clause of the Constitution guarantees the vested right of the employes against impairment by the executive branch of the government.

Earlier the unions had notified Postmaster Gen. Winton M. Blount that they expect the Postal Service to carry out the contract terms negotiated in good faith by the unions, and ratified by their members.

"These contract provisions were negotiated pursuant to congressional mandate in the Postal Reorganization Act, and the vested rights they establish are not subject to abrogation or divestiture," the unions wrote Blount.

They concluded: "We expect the Postal Service to perform its contract obligation to make these payments." Their suit was filed when Blount failed to comply with their request.

The message to Blount staked out the union position that postal employes are not federal employes and that Pres. Nixon has no right to interfere with the agreement signed July 20 by Blount and the heads of the four unions that have won the legal right to exclusive recognition—APWU Pres. Francis S. Filbey, NALC Pres. James H. Rademacher, Laborers' Pres. Peter Fosco for the Mail Handlers and Claude G. Olmstead for the Rural Carriers.

Filbey issued a statement saying that the freeze order, if allowed to stand, will cost postal employes more than $20 million in lost wages and scheduled increases but "the freeze won't cost the Postal Service a nickel, as we see it."

With wages frozen, the service would save $10.6 million in wage increases for the period Oct. 20 to Nov. 12, plus $9.5 million in step increases due under the union-management agreement, Filbey said. At the same time the service will be receiving $17 million a month under an increase in third class mail rates due to take effect Sept. 15.

Filbey said for the reasons listed, and for other reasons also, "we completely subscribe" to the Aug. 19 statement of the AFL-CIO Executive Council calling the freeze "unequitable, unjust, unfair and unworkable."

The AFL-CIO pledge to cooperate with mandatory controls was conditioned on the "absolute essential of fairness, equity and justice" and "none of these is contained in the President's wage-price freeze," the statement said.

The Letter Carriers announced they will call on Congress when it resumes sessions Sept. 8 to give postal workers "relief from the serious inequity which has arisen."

Rademacher said "our members will now be short-changed by about 25 cents hourly through the 90-day freeze and almost 40 cents hourly if the freeze is extended" beyond Nov. 14. Letter carriers will ask Congress, which has for 100 years determined their wages and working conditions, to make an exception in their case, he observed.

If Congress does not respond, he said, "the Administration can anticipate job action" by private employes while postal employes "will be demanding a reopening of the contract" so that postal workers will "at one time or another receive all the wage increases due them."

Rademacher noted that Chairman Thaddeus J. Dulski (D-N.Y.) of the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee has agreed to hold hearings on the freeze order.

The plight of federal employes outside postal ranks is particularly unjust, he charged, because the guaranteed January 1972 wage hike was deferred six months by the freeze order. Thus federal employes will have had to go 18 months without an increase while the value of their wages has been cut, he said.

Labor's Indictment

This is excerpted from an article by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany which appeared in the New York Times, Aug. 31, 1971.

THE TRADE-UNION MOVEMENT'S indictment of Pres. Nixon's new economic policy rests squarely on one fact: it is demonstrably unfair. The freeze on wages is absolute. Equity, economic justice, individual hardship—none is deemed worthy of exception. Employers will obviously serve willingly as voluntary policemen to enforce the wage freeze.

In contrast, the freeze on prices is quite ineffective. No systematic enforcement procedure is provided except individual complaints which the government is currently filing and forgetting.

Question and answer sheets from the Cost of Living Council and verbal responses to telephone queries to the Office of Emergency Preparedness hardly constitute enforcement.

A presidential wish is all that controls dividends. Even corporations that heed the wish can pay increased dividends retroactively after the 90 days. Workers, however, are prohibited from negotiating retroactive wage increases for the 90-day period.

The President refuses to put a ceiling on interest rates, again ignoring the powers he has had since December 1969, even though interest rates have contributed substantially to inflation.

Stock prices are uncontrolled even though they are a "transaction" under the terms of the President's executive order. Fortunes were literally made and taken on the stock market immediately after the President's speech.

The additional tax reduction for business, proposed by the President, is grossly unfair to the average taxpayer, who will receive no comparable benefit. The investment tax credit will cost the federal treasury $4 billion a year, in addition to the $3 to $5 billion business got last January through accelerated depreciation allowances.

WHO WILL PAY for this federal subsidy of corporate profits? The poor, through delay of much-needed welfare reform; financially strapped cities and states, who will not receive promised federal help; federal employes through a 5 percent slash in employment and a 10½-month wait for a pay raise they have been guaranteed.

The President took no steps to control profits, although simple justice would be served by an excess-profits tax. Profits will certainly increase during the freeze for business generally has already increased prices to cover deferred wage increases due their employes under existing contracts. The freeze now bars those wage increases, so the employers' profits are increasing by million-dollar jumps.

It was patently deceitful for the President to describe his tax measure as a job-creating proposal. There is no evidence at all that tax credits to business will improve employment.

The President could have expanded the economy and increased jobs by putting money into the hands of people who would spend it—the unemployed, the workers, the poor and the aged.

All of his recent actions, on top of 2½ years of policies which created massive unemployment and increased inflation, have caused the trade union movement to finally state publicly that we have lost confidence in his ability to successfully manage the economy.

We in the AFL-CIO have not changed our position.

We will cooperate with economic controls, if the President deems they are necessary, provided they are fair, equal and across-the-board. We will not cooperate with anything less.

Broadcast Media Destroying Colorful Local Accents—Almost

By John P. Roche

FOR SEVERAL WEEKS I have been doing brief comments for the CBS radio network. I put a good deal of work into them—normally it takes me two minutes and 40 seconds (my allotted time) to say hello—and I have been pleased when acquaintances mention that they heard them. At least, initially pleased. You see, instead of commenting on the wisdom of perception of my little nuggets, people keep telling me I have a Brooklyn accent.

All right, so I have a Brooklyn accent. I come by it naturally and legitimately. My parents were both fifth-generation New Yorkers, my ancestors rest peacefully in Greenwood Cemetery (not far from my wife's), and when I die I want to go to Columbia Heights off Montague St. overlooking the harbor. That's for openers.

Then we can switch to my wife, who was born in the same hospital as I (six weeks later) with the same obstetrician my brother had, in the same hospital, some five years later. Our families were not acquainted.

So I grew up speaking what I took to be the King's English only to learn when it was far too late to take remedial action that it was Kings County English. For a while it bothered me, particularly after I decided to become a college professor instead of earning an honest living as a longshoreman.

When I got my first academic post at Haverford College in 1949, I discovered I was the only political scientist at Haverford, Bryn Mawr or Swarthmore who had not taken his doctorate at Harvard.

I have never been good at foreign languages so I soon realized I would never learn to speak Harvard. (After 15 years in Massachusetts, I notice my A's have become haader, as in paak the kaar. But this is my daughter's influence.) I decided there was no point in worrying about it, even though on occasion my students seemed startled to hear me state that a philosophical proposition was absoid.

For the benefit of those of you who reside out there in the rest of the country it might be noted that there are a lot of phony Brooklyn accents in circulation. I never in my life, for example, heard any member of my family say "LonG Island"—the G was never hit that hard. It came out more like "Lawn Islan."

Similarly, it was never "New Joysey," but rather something on the order of "New Juhsey." Also I never heard "dem," "dese" or "dose" for them, these, and those; they must be an inheritance from Damon Runyon or an invasion from the Bronx; an authentic exchange could run like this:

"Boy, did I tell em!" "Whadya tell who?" "I toltose guys to minderown business." And what is, of course, hidden in all this are the inflections that provide instantaneous recognition signals to members of the clan.

IN 1966, I got in the elevator of the U.S. Embassy in Saigon with another passenger who turned to me and said, "Whatfloor dyawan?" Without thinking I reverted to the language of childhood and said "Da fit." He said, "Where in Brooklyn are you from?" We had a grand reunion.

All this—with other local and regional accents—seems to be dying out now, probably because the media have tended to standardize American speech. You notice it in Boston—there is a pronounced difference between the speech of an 80-year-old Brahmin and his grandson—and even Southerners seem to be moving towards the radio-TV norms. I think it is too bad—after all, who wants to live in a completely homogenized woild?

Religious Leaders Profess:

Labor Unions Must Lead Way In Winning Better Life for All

AMERICAN LABOR must show the way to all segments of society in meeting the needs and solving the problems of modern life, representatives of the nation's major faiths said in Labor Day messages.

The United States Catholic Conference, representing the bishops of that church, expressed the "confident expectation" that labor will "show us the way to adapt our institutions to the rapidly changing needs of the times."

The Council for Christian Social Action of the United Church of Christ pledged its support to labor's efforts "as the problems of unemployment and inflation grow more harmful and more menacing, close to the point of disaster."

The president of the Synagogue Council of America prayed for American labor "to play a great and essential role" in building the better society that generations have dreamed of, with Labor Day 1971 being "the day of its rededication."

Msgr. George G. Higgins of the bishops' conference quoted a recent letter of Pope Paul VI on the two objectives most commonly felt in today's world—"the aspiration to equality and the aspiration to participation."

"This new emphasis on equality and shared responsibility is not limited to particular countries or areas," the message said, but in certain respects "it is a peculiarly American phenomenon."

"At the very least, it can be said that in no other nation . . . has there been within recent years a more widespread and more insistent demand on the part of so many different groups for a greater degree of equality and a fuller measure of participation in the affairs of our society."

A force that started less than 20 years ago as a "belated demand for elementary forms of justice" in the area of civil rights has "rapidly escalated into a much more sweeping demand for genuine equality . . . and for a greater measure of shared responsibility at every level of our society."

The statement identified the demand for equality as coming first from the black community "which historically has suffered beyond measure from an almost total lack of equality in many areas . . . and from a systematic denial of an adequate sharing in responsibility."

More recently the same demand has come from the Spanish-speaking and "also from aggrieved women, alienated university students and other disaffected groups," Msgr. Higgins said.

The trouble is that "we no longer seem to know exactly where we want to go as a nation," he emphasized.

In meeting the needs of all workers and the poor, the statement said labor "cannot afford to be late, nor can the rest of us afford to let it be late, in meeting the legitimate aspirations of workers in general and of the poor in particular for complete equality and for the fullest possible measure of shared responsibility and self-determination—the hallmarks of free men in a free society."

The United Church of Christ said in its message that "organized religion continues to appreciate the tremendous works of organized labor in building a better society in a better world. We preach the gospel of social improvements and point out the applications of Biblical teachings . . . but we have to admit it is often the strength of the labor movement that gets things done. It is a good partnership."

American society is "entering a new era with the problems and opportunities created by the new productivity." Among them are unemployment, the need for higher living standards and a fair distribution of profits, the statement said.

"Finally there came the War to Abolish Poverty, which is lagging and needs our joint help. The Vietnam war, howeved, made for more production and more jobs and thus dulled our thinking regarding productivity.

"As the war winds down, we face again the dangers of unemployment and the question of what to do with the potential surplus—whether to keep it for ourselves or share it with the less fortunate."

The denomination sounded this call for action: "Comfortable union members and church members alike must have their consciences pricked on the ethics of taking. . . . We have the economic ability to abolish poverty, if we wish. To fail to do so is a sin."

LABOR SHOULD "turn with renewed vigor to the reduction of working hours," the statement emphasized. "Today's call is for a three-day 21-hour work week."

This "does not mean a lessening of the war on poverty. We can still win that war if we try. . . . The opportunities for better living are unlimited."

Rabbi Irving Lehrman said for the Synagogue Council that "Judaism has always spoken in understanding and completely identified terms concerning labor and its fundamental place in man's world."

Regrettably, "not all Americans have a share in the good life. There is appalling poverty in our land; there are families who live in slums that are a national disgrace; there are fellow Americans from whom the respect-giving vitality of useful employment is withheld."

In city after city, antagonism between racial and ethnic groups has fearsomely erupted into mindless destruction, and is "writing a shameful chronicle that is a stain upon our land."

American labor, Rabbi Lehrman said, "must live up to its own unique responsibilities in doing those things it can do best: to bring this alienated citizenry back into the mainstream of American life by giving them a stake, not just in the dream, but in the reality."

In the great cause of building a better society, "may the American labor movement play a great and essential role," he asked.

Hopes Tied to Congress:

Administration Held Ineffective In Safeguards For Consumers

THE NIXON ADMINISTRATION'S record in consumer affairs was scored on Labor News Conference as ineffectual—proposing only "dilly-dally, wishy-washy legislation" or attempting to soften protection measures already on the books.

The Administration has accomplished practically nothing to help the consumer who "knows he is being hurt," declared Evelyn Dubrow, legislative representative for the Ladies' Garment Workers. The consumer's best hope is in Congress, she said, where measures establishing a consumers independent agency, no-fault automobile insurance and a national product safety agency are "likely to pass before this session ends."

Miss Dubrow said that although the consumers independent agency bill was stymied in the House after Senate passage last year, a new measure introduced "early in this session" by House Government Operations Committee Chairman Chet Holifield (D-Calif.) has strong bipartisan support and should move to floor action shortly after the summer congressional recess.

She said there may be attempts to amend the Holifield bill, because "the Administration would like to soften" the provision that would give the new agency authority "to take the consumer's part in any adversory action before regulatory commissions."

The consumers independent agency is "one of the keys . . . to future achievements" in the consumer area, she asserted, because regulatory agencies now hold much power over consumer affairs.

Miss Dubrow praised the no-fault automobile insurance proposal as "the best thing that can happen," stressing the safeguards it would provide against arbitrary cancellations, premium hikes and delays in claim settlements. Automobile insurance companies, she added, "like to collect their premiums, but are reluctant to pay claims."

NEW EVIDENCE is being disclosed here showing invasions of privacy on a sharp upswing.

One of the most significant new reports to Congress comes from the Administrative Officer of the United States Courts. It shows that electronic eavesdropping by police more than doubled in 1970 over 1969.

The report on court-approved wiretaps and bugs is required annually under the Omnibus Crime Control & Safe Streets Act of 1968. It tells an alarming story for those concerned about invasions of privacy.

The last year of the Johnson Administration, 1968, there were 147 state taps and bugs. There were no federal installations. This rose to 271 federal and state taps the first year under Pres. Nixon and then doubled to 597 in 1970.

The American Civil Liberties Union and other groups have expressed the view that the courts are a mere rubber stamp and rarely give any serious judicial consideration—that approval is automatic.

In 1970, the courts approved every application for surveillance according to the report of the Administrative Officer, to give credence to this viewpoint.

Of equal concern is the Nixon Administration's position that it can eavesdrop on any individual or group it suspects of being subversive without the need of obtaining a court order. It is the contention of Attorney Gen. John N. Mitchell that the President's oath to defend the Constitution supersedes the protections of the Fourth Amendment against unreasonable searches and seizures of evidence.

Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, said that this nation is heading for a "police state" under this policy.

Even Sen. John L. McClellan (D-Ark.), normally a strong supporter of electronic surveillance, admits there is "public uneasiness" over the Administration's policy and has promised hearings in the fall.

In another area, Sen. Sam J. Ervin (D-N.C.) is pushing his bill to deny government agencies the authority to use lie detectors in the employment field, specifically in hirings and promotions.

IN A LETTER to the Civil Service Commission, he said that the Social Security Administration is "encouraging" its employes to speak before such groups as the Toastmasters Club, the Lions Club and the local Chambers of Commerce.

Said Ervin:

"The Constitution protects the rights of federal employes and all other citizens not to speak, not to associate and not to participate in their spare time. If they choose to go fishing with their children on weekends, that is their Constitutional right."

He is particularly critical of hinging promotions to activity "officially sanctioned by the Administration."

Washington has still not recovered from the hearings conducted in the spring by the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, which Ervin heads, on spying by the military on civilians.

At that time Ervin declared:

"Full-scale dossiers on thousands of Americans, compendiums, black lists, computer systems, city books and massive surveillance by the U.S. Army Intelligence Command and the other military services clearly amount to a clear and present danger to First Amendment freedoms."

The current picture on military intelligence may well be reviewed in the fall when the Senate hearings under McClellan take place since there is a positive relationship between such spying and the over-riding of the Fourth Amendment by the Nixon Administration.

"WISHY-WASHY" PROPOSALS and attempts to soften consumer protections on the books add up to an "ineffectual" performance by the Nixon Administration on behalf of the consumers, Legislative Rep. Evelyn Dubrow of the Ladies' Garment Workers, center, charged on Labor News Conference. She was questioned by Martha Angle of the Washington Evening Star and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine.

Impact on Wages:

Prices Slip Through Loopholes In Nixon's Economic Freeze

By Sidney Margolius

PRES. NIXON'S 90-day freeze on wages and prices is likely to freeze your wages more than your living costs. In effect, you won't be able to get a wage increase but you will continue to pay somewhat more for a number of the most important necessities, because of the real possibility of hidden but legal price increases.

The fact is, there are a number of loopholes in the price freeze that keep it from being a real freeze.

One benefit to working families, especially those having employment problems, is the prospective job stimulus due to the devaluation of the dollar and other measures which will raise prices of some imported goods here but reduce prices abroad of U.S. exports.

Revealingly, the freeze does not include profits and interest rates, but only wages and, partially, prices. The wage freeze comes at a time when working people are still behind in the race with ballooning living costs. In 1966 the average worker with three dependents had spendable wages of $102.41 (after taxes and in terms of constant dollars). After allowing for the depreciation of the dollar, by May 1971 his spendable wages were $101.81.

It's worth your understanding the hidden loopholes in the 90-day freeze, which will be effective until mid-November, so you can try to guard yourself as best you can.

Renters are better protected than homeowners or would-be home buyers. Rents are frozen, which is a real help in some of the big cities where rents have been steadily rising. But property taxes and mortgage interest rates are not frozen. These are the largest single items in the cost of owning and operating a house.

Food prices are really only partly frozen. Unprocessed agriculture products are not frozen at all. Retail prices supposedly are frozen. But stores are permitted to charge the highest prices at which they sold various items during the month before Aug. 15 when the freeze went into effect. Thus, livestock and other producers can raise prices for beef cattle, hogs and poultry. This potential squeeze virtually insures the disappearance of many specials on which working families have relied to cushion this year's high food prices.

Fresh foods like meat, poultry and some produce comprise half of a typical family's food bill. They are likely to be the items on which effective prices will be higher than you may have paid before the freeze went into effect.

Nor are there any controls on quality and availability. Reducing quality is a method often used by processors and stores to conceal price increases.

On meats, for example, stores can raise the real price simply by the way they trim, or by adding additional fat to hamburger. Especially watch out for fatburgers at this time. Or stores can use more of the primal cuts like chuck to make special cuts like "minute steaks," "fillet steaks" and "London broil" at higher prices than the chuck itself would sell for.

ANOTHER DEVICE to watch out for is a reduction in the availability of whole broilers. Stores prefer to sell them as parts and cut-up broilers at higher prices.

In turkeys, which normally are more abundant and lower-priced in the fall, widely-used devices for getting higher prices are to process the big birds into so-called self-basting and prestuffed versions.

In general, consumers can expect to see many specials and lower-priced versions of food disappear or be limited in supply during the freeze.

The reductions on 1971 model cars which normally occur in September may be more attractive than ever because of the pending removal of the 7 percent excise tax if Congress agrees. This would save $200 on a typical car in addition to the usual September price cuts of $100 to $200. The possibility that dealers might pocket some of the excise tax savings by reducing normal discounts or trade-in allowances is diminished by the big leftover supply of 1971 models. Also, for the first time, the new small U.S. cars will cost no more, or even less than, the imported small cars.

There will be no policing of the price freeze except by local markets departments if they are aware of the increased potential for quality adulteration and short-weighing, and can use additional inspectors to control it.

The only other potential control is by consumers. If we watch quality, weights and price juggling especially carefully during this period, we can report any infractions to the local markets department.

The underlying problem is that overall gimmicks such as high interest rates which the Administration previouslly tried to use to stem inflation do not really work. There is no direct attack on the four main inflation problems: scarcity and high costs of housing; high food prices, and rising transportation and medical costs.

What you also want to watch out for is what credit fees installment stores and dealers charge if you deal with this kind of store. There is a freeze on prices of these goods but no freeze on finance charges on cars, appliances, furniture and other goods bought on time.

Dangerous Industry:

Farm Job Accidents Peril to Youngsters

The following is excerpted from a speech by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) on the House floor just prior to the summer recess of Congress. He is chairman of the Subcommittee on Agricultural Labor of the House Education & Labor Committee.

FOR A GREAT MANY YEARS this nation has been committed, under the Fair Labor Standards Act, to the proposition that "oppressive child labor" ought to be abolished from the land. The factories, the mines, the mills, the dangerous and unhealthy reaches of our great industrial jungles have been considered no place to employ our children.

But in agriculture, for a number of reasons, we have not followed this philosophy. We have consoled ourselves with the idea that "the fields are a healthful place for kids to earn a couple of bucks during their vacation from school."

We are talking, first, about industrial child labor. According to the Dept. of Agriculture, which can usually be counted on to paint the most favorable picture, one-third of the wage earning farmworkers in the United States in 1970 were between the ages of 14 and 17.

That fraction represents 819,000 children out of a total farm wage labor force of 2.4 million. This does not count the children who work for their parents, and it most certainly does not count the thousands of children who are working illegally, in violation of what few laws there are, and who are most assuredly not reported to the census takers by their employers—or for that matter, by their parents, many of whom depend on the few pennies these children can earn to eke out the few more pennies the parents actually get paid for their back breaking work in the fields.

WE ARE TALKING TOO, about a very dangerous industry. In the National Safety Council's annual book "Accident Facts, 1970" we discover that out of 14,200 occupational deaths in 1969 in a total work force of 79 million people, agriculture, which employed only 3.8 million workers, suffered 2,500 deaths. Manufacturing, with its nearly 20 million workers, suffered 1,900 occupational deaths.

In 1966, according to materials compiled by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and provided in 1969 to the Senate Subcommittee on Migratory Labor, the agricultural occupational injury rate in California, although improved from earlier years, "is still twice as high as the rate for all industries taken together."

Looked at another way, agricultural injuries represented almost 8 percent of all lost-time job injuries reported in California in 1966, although less than 4 percent of all employes worked on farms."

These are statistics illustrative of an enormous amount of data, all pointing to the fact that agriculture is a dangerous enough occupation for adult wage earners who can weigh the dangers of working in a particular occupation against their own financial needs.

It is most certainly a poor place for us to send the children we have forbidden to work in other industry in part because we thought the mill and the factory were too dangerous for them.

Soup to Nonsense:

Those Bold Brave Plans Fade As Family Vacation Wears On

By Jane Goodsell

THE BOLD BRAVE WORDS: "We'll get the car all packed up the night before and be ready to roll first thing in the morning."

The Moment of Truth: "Listen, we can't get another thing in this car and that includes your eyelash curler! D'you realize it's already 11:45 and we're still—Great Scott, I forgot to turn off the water!"

The Bold Brave Words: "Now dear, you just keep your mind on your driving, and I'll keep the road map on my lap so I can give you directions."

The Moment of Truth: "You and your fine talk about watching the road map! Any two-year-old would have noticed that we should have turned off there, 50 miles back. Listen, you can't even fold a road map, much less read one!"

The Bold Brave Words: "Now that the children are older, we won't have to stop every few minutes. . . ."

The Moment of Truth: "Well, you'll just have to wait, that's all. Why didn't you think about that five minutes ago back at the filling station?"

The Bold Brave Words: "A family vacation will give us a chance to build our relationship with the children and get to really know one another."

The Moment of Truth: "If there's one more fight about who gets to sit next to the window, I'm going to turn this car around and drive straight back home. Now SHUT UP!"

The Bold Brave Words: "Just think—no dishes to wash, no meals to cook, no household cares to worry about for the two whole weeks.

The Moment of Truth: "I just can't go to sleep. I can't remember disconnecting the iron before I left."

The Bold Brave Words: "Only twenty miles to go, and we'll be home. No matter how good a vacation you have, there's no place like home."

The Moment of Truth: "Well, here we are, safe and—good grief, look at that porch! The milkman must have delivered three quarts every day since we left. And the yard looks like a hayfield. And gee, the house sure does smell musty, doesn't it, and look at that mess of mail. . . ."

Power Elected Plasterers' President:

New 'Game Plan' Branded Interference in Bargaining

Toronto—Government "tinkering" with the collective bargaining process in both the United States and Canada came under heavy fire at the 42nd convention of the Plasterers & Cement Masons.

Pres. Joseph T. Power, returned to office for his first full four-year term after serving by appointment, denounced the Nixon wage-price freeze for giving employers complete control over pay checks while leaving the consumer at the mercy of corporation pricing without any effective machinery for control.

Pres. Donald MacDonald of the Canadian Labor Congress chided "armchair experts who want to tinker" with Canada's economy. He warned that unions will oppose any attempt at wage controls in the Dominion of Canada.

Director Al Barkan of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education described the Nixon system of controls as a "deep freeze on your wages, a soft freeze on prices, and no freeze at all on interest, dividends, profits, taxes. That is why we are opposed to the President's program, and no other reason."

Barkan emphasized that a successor to Nixon will be elected in 1972 only in a strong outpouring of union registrations, union votes and voluntary COPE dollars for the campaign expenses of labor-endorsed candidates.

Major actions of the convention included the re-election of all incumbent officers, including Sec.-Treas. John J. Hauck and Executive Vice Pres. Melvin H. Roots; a graduated increase in per capita taxes by 50 cents a month per year —from $3 a month to $5 in the final year and constitutional changes designed to make the union more effective.

The first stage of the per capita increases will take effect next Jan. 1, along with the start of new terms of office. The convention voted to increase the salaries of the 18 officers, effective on a lifting of the national wage freeze.

The delegates endorsed the proposed new National Health Security program, pending before Congress, and urged the legislators to include chiropractic services in all health care programs in the future.

In other actions, the convention voted to:

- Allow local unions to raise local dues in step with per capita increases.
- Provide that elected officers automatically be considered as delegates to international union conventions.
- Permit members to carry more than one trowel trade classification if qualified in any other branch—whether as plasterer, shopmen or cement masons. This provision is designed to stop the loss of members who for any reason cannot find work in their own craft, the officers said.

Minimum terms of local union officers were increased from two years to three. Apprentice training terms were reduced to a minimum of two years or 4,000 hours of preparation. Officers were authorized to establish a pension plan for all local union officials.

The convention made a policy change under which district councils and state conferences of the union will be chartered. This will improve the effectiveness of many local unions and help preserve union jurisdiction and strengthen contract enforcement, supporters of the change said.

The delegates approved a recommendation of the officers that the union develop reciprocity agreements to provide "portable" pensions for members who move from the jurisdiction of one local to another, so that benefits will not be lost when a worker changes employers or locales.

All incumbent vice presidents from locals of the cement masons were returned to office without opposition. Contests among plasterers' and shophands' locals were settled by secret ballot. The newly elected officers were sworn in by President Emeritus Edward J. Leonard, who was succeeded on his retirement a year ago by Power, executive vice president for 11 years.

MacDonald told the convention that the "psychotic obsession" of the Canadian government with inflation has led to more serious unemployment. The present state of joblessness was "openly and deliberately" created, he said, by a policy which destroyed jobs while the government-appointed Prices & Incomes Commission tried to force workers to accept 6-percent wage guidelines. But it had no answers on controlling profits, professional fees, real estate speculation and interest rates, he charged.

"It seemed that the only group the commission was really concerned about shackling were the working people."

Other convention speakers included Pres. Frank Bonadio of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., Treas. Charles E. Nichols of the Carpenters, Acting Pres. Kenneth M. Edwards of the Lathers, Elmer Renaud of the Toronto Labor Council and Chairman William J. Cour of the National Joint Board for Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes.

WONDERS OF SPACE exploration were made real for delegates to the Aluminum Workers 10th biennial convention at Huntsville, Ala., as they toured the Space & Rocket Center near Redstone Arsenal. Delegate Wallace Brown of Louisville, Ky., shown here with his wife viewing a lifesize facsimile of an Apollo landing, is one of thousands of union members supplying aluminum for the nation's space program.

Nixon's Freeze Stuns Aluminum Convention

Huntsville, Ala.—Pres. Nixon's announcement of a wage-price freeze on Sunday night, Aug. 15, fell like a bomb on the 10th biennial convention of the Aluminum Workers, which opened the following morning here.

New nationwide contracts covering three-quarters of the U.S. aluminum industry had gone into effect June 1, bringing wage increases to AWIU members employed by Alcoa, Reynolds and Kaiser, the big three of the industry.

But the union was preparing to begin negotiations for the "little people" of the industry—workers in plants which manufacture and fabricate countless products of aluminum.

AWIU Pres. Henry Olsen voiced the sentiments of the convention in his keynote address:

"We are not going to stand by and allow this Administration, or any other administration, to put wage controls on contracts coming up for negotiations. We're going to demand that we have the right to negotiate for at least as much as we settled for on June 1 with the major producers."

Olsen estimated that almost one-fourth of the members of the union are covered by contracts scheduled for reopening within six months.

The delegates took a favorable view, however, of the 10-percent surcharge on imports which will apply to aluminum ingots. They noted in a telegram to Treasury-Sec. John B. Connally that "aluminum workers are now on layoff . . . and facilities capable of producing 532,500 tons of aluminum are now sitting idle in the United States. . . ."

The convention took a strong stand in support of the AFL-CIO position on international trade, urging congressional action against the price-cutting, job-cutting actions of multinational corporations.

It was optimistic about programs in the aluminum industry to recycle scrap aluminum, seeing increased job opportunities in new recycling plants being set up by the major aluminum producers.

Delegates heard reports of expanded organizing activity, particularly on the West Coast, where small aluminum fabricating plants are prospering.

They moved to increase organizing and servicing programs by voting a constitutional amendment allowing local unions to collect per capita dues equal to two hours pay at the employe's hourly rate.

The convention re-elected Patrick J. Reilly as secretary-treasurer. Olsen has two years more to serve in his current term as president.

Lancaster, Pa., was chosen as the site for the 1973 convention.

Roy Evans Heads Texas AFL-CIO, Delegates Focus on 1972 Election

Dallas—Roy R. Evans, secretary-treasurer of the Texas AFL-CIO for the past 10 years, was elected president of the state federation at its 12th biennial convention which zeroed in on next year's presidential elections.

Evans, who will succeed H. S. Hank Brown, defeated Harold G. Tate, the state federation's education director. Harry Hubbard, Jr., legislative director, was elected secretary-treasurer over Sherman Fricks, a member of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters from Houston.

Brown did not seek re-election because of health reasons brought on by a back injury. He headed the Texas federation for the last decade.

Delegates adopted a resolution praising Brown for his 10 years of leadership.

Evans is a member of the Machinists, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and the Newspaper Guild. Hubbard is a member of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

Echoing the convention theme, "We have a job to do in '72," Evans laid down the federation's top priority of carrying the state for the Democratic presidential nominee next year.

Six potential Democratic candidates addressed the three-day session: Senators Edmund S. Muskie, Henry M. Jackson, Birch Bayh, Fred R. Harris, George McGovern and Hubert H. Humphrey.

The more than 1,000 delegates applauded enthusiastically when Humphrey assured them that they had just heard "the next President of the United States," referring to all of the Democratic hopefuls.

The Democratic senators, speaking before Pres. Nixon imposed the wage-price freeze order, assailed the Administration for its past failures in economic policies.

Muskie noted that "if we have learned anything" from the Administration's performance, "it is that you cannot cheerlead the economy out of recession into recovery."

"The full force of that lesson," he stressed, "has been felt in hiring halls and boarding rooms across this state. The truth is that while officials in Washington talk recovery, people in Texas are living in recession."

McGovern, who developed a new position paper on the economy, told newsmen that the Vietnam war would be a secondary issue in the 1972 presidential campaign. He predicted, "the election will focus on economic problems such as inflation and tax reform."

Bayh called on Nixon to abandon the divisive tactics "that spread fear and hatred. This sort of thing is designed to get votes, not to govern the country."

Jackson, who scored the Administration for causing an economic pinch on workers, also reiterated his charge made earlier at the New York State AFL-CIO convention that absolutists on the left were attempting to take over the Democratic Party.

Among the key resolutions adopted, the convention urged local councils to emphasize the registration of young voters, repeal of the state's open shop law, passage of a state corporate profits tax and collective bargaining rights for public employes.

It also voted support for all efforts and court orders to bring about full integration of Texas schools and opposed attempts to close Public Health Service hospitals and facilities in Texas port cities.

Delegates instructed the state COPE to withhold support for the political ambitions of Lt. Gov. Ben Barnes on the grounds that while he maintains a facade of being a friend of the workers, he is more closely tied to the interests of big business.

The convention also rejected a move to raise the monthly per capita tax on members from 25 cents to 30 cents.

On the recommendation of the Political Education Committee, delegates voted a "Neanderthal Man of the Year" award to Treasury Sec. John B. Connally, a former Texas governor, for "stating that a high unemployment rate is the best way to prevent inflation."

IBEW Strikers Win Gains at General Cable

Members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers reached agreement with General Cable Corp. on contract terms that ended a seven-week strike at five company locations, Pres. Charles H. Pillard announced.

The agreement benefits 1,600 IBEW members who stayed on the picket line from July 1 to win improvements in management offers on wages, pensions and insurance. The struck plants were in Bayonne and Perth Amboy, N.J.—two facilities—St. Louis, and an office employes' unit at New Brunswick, N.J.

The settlement, ratified by the strikers, calls for wage increases of 40 cents an hour for production workers, plus 20 cents additional in the first contract year for skilled workers; 15 cents an hour additional in each of the next two years, plus a raise of 1 cent an hour for each rise of four-tenths of a point in the Consumer Price Index.

The company agreed to grant one additional paid holiday, five weeks of vacation after 25 years of service, raise pension benefits from $3.75 a month to $6 times years of service, and improve life insurance coverage and major medical insurance benefits.

Meany on Labor Day:

Nixon Order Challenges Economic Justice

By George Meany

ON THIS LABOR DAY, the trade union movement—indeed, all working men and women—face a major challenge. It is a challenge to the principle of economic justice and a threat to the democratic principles upon which the trade union movement was founded and the American system operates.

An unequitable wage-price freeze has been imposed by Pres. Nixon, which unfairly requires workers to assume the major burden.

The President acted after 2½ years of inaction, denials of any such motives and plain mismanagement of the economy.

When Pres. Nixon took office on Jan. 20, 1969, America was in the 95th month of the greatest period of sustained economic expansion in history. The unemployment rate was 3.4 percent, the lowest in 15 years.

When Mr. Nixon was seeking the presidency, he campaigned against inflation. The 4.2 percent inflation of 1968, he told the American people, was too high. He was going to stop inflation without increasing unemployment.

He reiterated that pledge in writing to the AFL-CIO Executive Council a month after he took office.

So he instituted a "game plan" for the economy. Tight money was the plan. Disaster was the result.

Home construction fell off. Few Americans could afford the usurious rates charged by money lenders with Administration blessing.

State and local governments were compelled to cancel plans to build badly needed hospitals, schools, roads and public buildings.

At the same time, the Administration—in the name of fighting inflation—cut back federal construction and withheld funds already appropriated by Congress.

These actions were necessary, the Administration said, because construction workers were causing inflation.

The truth is that construction workers, like all other workers, were trying to catch up. Inflation had robbed their paychecks of purchasing power, and they were merely seeking to earn a living wage.

While construction workers were being blamed, bankers were counting record profits—21.9 percent at J. P. Morgan; 19.2 percent at First National Bank of Dallas; 16.1 percent at Chase Manhattan; 15.2 percent at Bankers Trust. And no one in the Administration called these profits inflationary.

Instead of reducing inflation, the Administration's tight-money policy actually increased inflation.

The 4.2 percent inflation rate of 1968 was topped by a 5.4 percent rate in Pres. Nixon's first year in office. It accelerated to 5.9 percent in 1970, the highest in 20 years—and the end is nowhere in sight.

Instead of preventing unemployment, the Administration's game plan increased unemployment. In January 1969, when Pres. Nixon took office, 2.7 million people were unemployed—3.4 percent of the work force, the lowest in 15 years.

Pres. Nixon's policies have nearly doubled the number of unemployed in 2½ years.

In the face of this clear evidence to the contrary, the Administration insisted almost daily during the past 2½ years that its game plan was working; that inflation was declining; that employment was improving, and that all was well.

The sorry fact is that the President deliberately sought to mislead the people about the condition of the economy.

Suddenly, three weeks ago—on Aug. 15—the President unveiled his new "game plan." Even then, he lacked the courage to admit that his tight-money policy had failed and that his previous game plan had led to America's economic mess.

There has been a consistent campaign to blame unions for inflation.

Well, let's check the facts:

The Bureau of Labor Statistics says that an urban family of four needs $11,112 a year—or $210 a week—to maintain a moderate standard of living, with few luxuries.

A minimum living standard requires $7,150, or $137 a week.

But the average American worker earns, right now, $125 before taxes. His take-home pay is $110.

Compared with government standards, workers are making $85 a week less than a moderate standard of living and $12 short of a minimum standard of living.

So workers are not profiting by inflation, but big business is. The Wall Street Journal reports corporate profits, after taxes, jumped 10.3 percent in the second quarter of this year.

The 90-day wage freeze means workers are paying for the Administration's refusal to control high interest rates and corporation profits.

The AFL-CIO has time and again, since February 1966, said that if the economic situation warrants extraordinary overall stabilization measures, the AFL-CIO would cooperate so long as restraints were equitably placed on all costs and incomes—including all prices, profits, dividends, rents and executive compensation, as well as employes' wages and salaries.

The President's program simply does not meet the test of equity.

All workers' wages are frozen for 90 days. During that period all cost-of-living adjustments, seniority, longevity and merit increases due workers are barred. Productivity increases are nullified.

However, not all prices are frozen. Exemptions and loopholes abound through which prices may be increased.

There is no machinery for enforcement of a price freeze, leaving the consumer at the mercy of corporate pricing systems and unscrupulous businessmen.

Wages, on the other hand, are effectively frozen because the individual employer has complete control over paychecks. The burden of the freeze falls on workers with highly visible collective bargaining agreements.

In addition to the wage freeze, Pres. Nixon has asked for another tax break for big business which he disguises as a "job development tax credit." He says it will create jobs. There is no concrete evidence that this is so. However, the corporations would get the tax break merely by purchasing new machinery, even if that new machinery would mean less jobs.

In January the Administration gave big business a similar tax break by accelerating depreciation allowances. That will cost the federal treasury between $3 and $5 billion a year.

Now the President proposes to take an additional $4 billion a year in tax revenue and return it to big business.

The cost of this new tax break alone is twice the amount the Accelerated Public Works Act of 1971 would have cost the federal government. But the President vetoed that bill.

At the same time he vetoed 400,000 jobs which that program would have created.

America needs tax revenue to improve and expand public services, not tax breaks to increase the profits of business. We in the AFL-CIO would rather see tax money—raised by closing loopholes, not opening more of them—go toward building mass transit systems, air and water pollution controls, community health facilities and hospitals, schools and libraries.

The President also pointed out the problems of foreign trade. But his solutions are inadequate.

He has placed a border tax on some imports. This is at best a temporary stopgap.

A border tax will do very little to meet the major foreign trade problem created by the U.S.-based multi-national corporations and international banks, which have accounted for most of the export of American jobs.

The United States is the most open market to goods produced in other countries. Yet the goods we sell to the world are restricted by barriers, quotas and tariffs imposed by other nations.

Many fallacies have developed around world trade. "Free trade" is a myth. So is "protectionism." The idea is that if we protect American-made goods and American jobs from foreign imports, somehow the consumer is going to be hurt.

Who is the consumer but the American worker? And workers have been the best buyers of American-made goods. They buy more than 95 percent of the goods produced in this country. If the American worker does not have a job because of foreign imports, he can't buy any goods—no matter whether they are made in the United States or anywhere else.

Jobs are the solution to unemployment. The only policy that makes any sense is full employment.

Before he was elected, Pres. Nixon pledged that it would be a major goal of his Administration to create new jobs.

But fewer persons are employed full-time today than two years ago. Pres. Nixon's pledge has not been met.

One of the reasons jobs continue to disappear is the failure of this Administration and past Administrations to realistically view the problems of world trade and foreign investment.

Imports are taking over large and growing portions of U.S. markets. Behind this is the soaring rate of investment by American companies in foreign operations.

These investments—combined with patent and license agreements with foreign companies—have transferred American technology to plants throughout the world. Many of these plants, operating with American machinery, and American capital, and American knowhow, pay workers as little as 15 cents an hour.

The cost of this foreign trade policy has been a half-million American jobs. In fact, the biggest American export today is American jobs.

America has had a dynamic economy because workers were able to buy the goods they produce. The surest way to destroy this is to impose a low-wage economy that benefits only the rich.

We believe more American workers need increased purchasing power as the surest way of improving the economy.

And increased purchasing power will be the goal of workers and their unions in collective bargaining.

America's future depends on jobs and a healthy, expanding economy. Without jobs there would be no social security. No Medicare.

There can't be schools or hospitals, housing or transportation unless there are jobs. Even unemployment compensation depends on jobs.

Jobs produce tax revenues—the wherewithal any country needs to function. That is why the sacrifice of jobs—to misguided economic game plans and to cheap-labor foreign competition—is so wrong.

Inflation must be halted. Unemployment must be reversed.

The President's new economic policies will not accomplish that result.

There is nothing in his program that will increase jobs. The fact is, the President ignores every option at his discretion that might increase jobs.

For example:

He refuses to release $12 billion in federal funds which he has sequestered and which are intended for worthwhile, socially constructive programs.

He refuses to control interest rates. While interest rates remain at record highs they are the single greatest contributor to inflation.

The President refuses to control stock market speculation. The millionaires who pay little or no taxes because of tax loopholes now are receiving added benefits through speculation in the stock and bond market.

He refuses to extend unemployment compensation for those whose benefits have been exhausted through prolonged unemployment resulting from his previous "game plan."

He refuses to present a plan for reconversion of the economy from wartime production to peacetime. While he wrongly contends that the winding down of the Vietnam war is primarily responsible for unemployment, Mr. Nixon has not established a single viable program for finding jobs for veterans or for those previously employed in defense industries.

In short, what America needs is a program that will create jobs . . . not a program to make the wealthy wealthier.

Unemployment is a waste of human resources.

It also costs the economy dearly. Unemployed workers pay no taxes. They use taxes. Unemployed workers add nothing to the nation's output of goods and services. In fact, the workers who lost their jobs because of Administration economic policies would have produced about $30 billion worth of goods and services.

This waste of economic resources and human resources must be reversed.

Trade union members intend to see that the injustice imposed on them by the President is corrected at the bargaining table.

The economy has to be made to work for all the people—including the aged, the jobless, the untrained and all the others who need it the most but who are getting the least out of it.

These are the very people who are being asked to bear the burden of the President's unfair and unequitable policies.

We demand economic justice.

We demand full employment. For only full employment will produce prosperity for all Americans.

This is the goal of America's trade unionists. It is a goal we believe in. And on this Labor Day 1971, we pledge our full resources to achieving it.

Kirkland on Labor Day:

High Campaign Costs Distort Democracy

By Lane Kirkland

LABOR DAY is a good time to examine a curious development in recent elections. The press, pollsters, the political candidates and the pundits spend more time, and as much zeal, counting up the money poured into campaigns as counting up the votes and the results.

Small wonder. Political spending has soared beyond the ridiculous into the preposterous. In 1968, for example, more than $300 million went into political campaigns—presidential, congressional and other. That year, about 72 million voters turned out at the polls. Average cost per voter: $4.15.

Glaring examples of over-kill spending abound. The millionaire family of one candidate for high office reportedly spent more than $5 million in his 1970 campaign. He won. In 1970 also, another family spent more than $2 million for one of its own. He lost. A Midwest multi-millionaire doled out more than $1 million, and he didn't even have relatives running for office. A Far West candidate tried to buy his way out of political obscurity, pumped out $1 million of his own money, but lost badly—and this was in a primary campaign.

If absurdity has any limits, they were exceeded in one contest in the Northwest where a primary candidate shelled out an estimated $700,000 and lost, drawing only 10,000 votes. His cost per vote: $70.

It is irrelevant whether the big spenders and big contributors are liberal friends of ours or conservative foes. Nor does it matter that in some few instances massive doses of money have failed to clinch victory. These are exceptions. In far too many cases money has tipped the scales.

Let's face it: Political spending is out of hand and has become corruptive—if not of the voters and the candidates, then of the process. It has spawned a cluster of operatives—pollsters, media consultants, professional public relations men and other image-makers—all of which are costly.

This results often in stagecraft being confused with substance and in image superseding reality.

No one argues seriously that these new tools of political campaigning be dispensed with. They have become the security blanket for most candidates for public office.

We must recognize, too, that the media have replaced the whistle-stop as the major means for candidates to reach the people, and this is an irreversible condition. But even media spending should be rational. Radio and television spending, for example, increased from $32 million in the 1966 congressional elections to $50.3 million in 1970, a 57 percent rise.

Spending for electronic campaigning soared by 100 percent in the last four presidential campaigns—$9.8 million in 1956 to $40.4 million in 1968.

As alarming as the sheer amount of money spent on campaigning is the disparity in its availability. In 1968, the Nixon-Agnew ticket was able to spend $12.6 million on radio and TV, twice as much as the Humphrey-Muskie ticket. The unfairness of this situation would have been equally glaring had the shoe been on the other foot.

It is wrong, no matter who benefits—friend or foe—to arm one candidate with a pop-gun and the other with a howitzer.

The labor movement has always argued that money—whether one's own or received in contributions—should not be permitted to distort the democratic process. We hold to this position even knowing that in occasional instances our friends have more to spend than our foes.

We believe that runaway campaign costs must be reined in.

In recent months, Congress has grappled with this issue. It has not yet produced a satisfactory program that would eliminate present major evils and substitute fairness and good sense. It has not relieved the increasing pressure on candidates to raise vast sums of money. It has failed to include sufficient inducements for small contributions from the average voter, or proper limitations on large contributions.

We believe reasonable legislation would provide a limitation on contributions to a single campaign by individuals and their families and an over-all limit on total campaign donations by individuals and their families. It should include, too, a limit on use of their own money by candidates.

Most importantly, we feel steps should be taken to involve the average citizen in campaign financing by providing a check-off of the income tax form of $1 contribution per person to finance presidential elections. This could be supplemented by an additional tax credit for half of the political contributions made in one year up to $10.

More than any other organization, the labor movement, through its political arm—the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education—tries to stimulate involvement of citizens in the financing of campaigns. We ask each union member, each year, to contribute just $1 to COPE. Funds collected in this manner help candidates endorsed by COPE.

We don't believe politics or political funding should be a rich man's game. We believe it is self-evident that it is far healthier for one million persons to contribute $1 each than for one person to contribute $1 million.

What COPE does in engaging more and more union members in the political process to the extent of contributing just $1 is healthy for democracy. We wish every citizen would do the same.

We believe that democracy must expand to meet the challenges of today's world, that participation must increase in all areas of politics. Yet, out-of-hand campaign costs can only diminish democracy by leaving it sooner or later at the mercy of the privileged few who can dole out huge sums to candidates of their choice.

On this Labor Day, the trade union movement can say that on this fight, as on so many others, it will keep coming back—again and again and again for as long as necessary—until justice and fairness prevail.

IUD Says:

Nixon's Freeze Clouds Outlook

Excerpts from the Labor Day message of I. W. Abel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

IT IS TRADITIONAL on this national holiday—the 77th anniversary of Labor Day—to acknowledge labor's many contributions and to reflect upon the tremendous progress the American worker has made. From a status of being treated with less regard than the tools and machinery he worked with, the American worker today has achieved a measure of dignity and security on the job.

On this Labor Day 1971, the outlook for labor in America is cloudy. The uncertainty created by the wage-price freeze makes it difficult indeed to appraise the future.

For the past two and a half years we in labor sounded an alarm because we felt the economy was obviously on a crash course as a result of the Nixon Administration's "game plan." We consistently emphasized that this "game plan," featuring a tight-money policy, could only mean economic disaster.

Labor said the best way to get America back to work and revive the economy was to meet America's obvious needs in such areas as housing for low- and middle-income families, build more hospitals and schools, provide the kind of national transportation system the people so desperately need, salvage our cities, get on with the job of cleaning up our air and water—in short, meet the needs of the American people.

Unfortunately for the strength of the economy, our advice went unheeded.

The American people have a strong sense of fair play and a strongly rooted belief in equal sacrifice when their country is confronted with a crisis. But Pres. Nixon's new "game plan" does not meet those traditional American tests. He froze wages for at least 90 days. He prohibited cost of living adjustments, longevity and merit increases. In contrast he did not freeze interest rates, profits, stock dividends, prices of stocks, capital gains, the prices of land. Nor did he freeze the prices of fresh fruit, vegetables or eggs.

Moreover, the tax program gives unwarranted benefits to industry—especially in the form of unneeded and unnecessary credits for corporate investment in new machinery.

We welcome the President's action imposing a 10-percent surcharge on imports. This is a first step towards restoring sanity and balance in our nation's foreign trade position—but it is only a first step. We must demand continued action to halt powerful multinational corporations from continuing to send jobs, capital and advanced technology from the United States to other countries, where they are used to produce manufactured goods at very low wages to flood the American market.

The economic "game plan" now goes to Congress.

If Congress meets the test that the President failed, both in his first economic "game plan" and now in his latest one, then by Labor Day next year we will have a sound economy, beneficial to all. We will have a sound economy in which all will share fairly because all will have sacrificed fairly.

Building Trades Say:

Labor Day '71 a Time to Reaffirm Dedication to Basic Union Beliefs

Excerpts from Labor Day message of Frank Bonadio, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

THERE ARE MANY among us tempted to say: "As far as building and construction tradesmen are concerned, there certainly is not very much for us to celebrate this Labor Day."

Unemployment generally is at its poorest level in many years. In the building and construction trades, where joblessness almost always is twice as bad as the national average for all categories, the already severe predicament is deteriorating.

Ostensibly to curb inflation, Pres. Nixon isolated a fragment of the American society—the building and construction tradesmen, who comprise only a few million of our nation's 80-million work force—and imposed on it restrictive wage restraints.

Until Pres. Nixon's announcement on Aug. 15, nothing was done about the spiraling costs of materials, supplies and land, and nothing still has been done about the zooming interest charges of the money lenders. Nothing was done about profits in business, including the construction business. Nothing was done about the sky-rocketing costs of rents and food and transportation and other necessities of living. Controls were applied merely to the negotiated wages of building and construction tradesmen, many of whom either are not working at all or working 800 to 1,000 hours less than Americans in other endeavors but yet, like their fellow citizens, are victims of inflation.

In spite of a determined effort to provide meaningful training in the higher building and construction skills—an effort which, in the last several years, has actually placed some 9,000 black and other minority youth in apprenticeship—persons inside and outside government seek to obstruct us and to ridicule us.

Moreover, there are individuals in the Nixon Administration who apparently do not want a program, such as an agreed hometown program, unless they are completely in charge of it, dictating its provisions, no matter how impractical or unworkable.

Nevertheless, in spite of all the hardships and all the pressures of the moment, in spite of all the untruths about his motives and the canards about his performance, the building and construction tradesman should hail this Labor Day 1971.

It really marks a memorable occasion. For this is the time that we literally have been forced by outside influences into taking actions and attitudes we should have assumed of our own volition.

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Department's basic reason for existence—in fact, the fundamental reason for the existence of the 17 international and national unions affiliated with the department—is to provide the means by which individual tradesmen can work together for the protection of their own interests.

What better time could there be, then, to reaffirm our dedication to our own principles and our own beliefs than this Labor Day?

On this Labor Day, 1971, we should determine to make our local and state Building & Construction Trades Councils strong, outspoken, well-coordinated, representative organizations. It is through them that we can generate the power and the influence of organized effort.

Now is the time for all good trade unionists to resolve to stand together, speak in one voice, fight together and, by our performance on and off the job demonstrate that we are the hard core of the America our founders envisioned—the builders of the greatest society civilization has ever known.

Labor Points to '72 Elections for Change

Problems With Nixon Dominate Events Since Last Labor Day

By Harry Conn

ONE YEAR AGO top leaders of organized labor temporarily put aside their sharp differences with Pres. Nixon on domestic issues and accepted an invitation to mark Labor Day 1970 in a unique White House celebration.

There was both light banter and serious discussion, but the note of harmony was short-lived. From last Labor Day to today, labor's outspoken criticism of the Nixon Administration's policies has intensified and the friendly words of a year ago have been pushed deep into the pages of history.

Until the Nixon economic bombshell was released on Aug. 15, the essential issue with the Administration was the "do-nothing" policy which meant failure to counter the deepening crisis faced by the nation with more than 5.5 million Americans out of work, living costs soaring and American jobs being exported at a rising rate.

Nixon's New Economic Policy brought on a new and different confrontation.

By instituting a 90-day wage and price freeze and yet permitting profits, dividends and interest rates to go untouched, Nixon convinced organized labor that it had become the "scapegoat" of the Administration failures on the economic front.

The differences between organized labor and the Administration are not just on the economy but on a vast number of other critical issues. They include:

National Health Insurance—The Health Security Act is organized labor's No. 1 legislative priority, bringing together the AFL-CIO, the Auto Workers, Teamsters and the Mine Workers. They all support the Kennedy-Griffiths bill which would not only revamp the entire health care delivery system but would make national health insurance meaningful, with no insurance corporations as middlemen to gulp in their profits and with hospital actuarial responsibilities designed to slice hospital costs.

The Administration's bill does little more than require employers to cover their employes with health insurance—already a fact of life for most unionists.

Construction Wage Controls—Initially, Nixon took his swipe at the building trades unions when he suspended the Davis-Bacon Act which sets prevailing wage or union standards on construction under government contract.

The outcry from this action was heard not only from the building trades unions and their friends in the rest of the labor movement, but from governors, mayors and members of Congress. The Nixon Executive Order was bringing construction to a virtual halt.

The Administration rescinded the suspension of Davis-Bacon and instituted a form of "wage and price controls." There was control on construction wages set up by a Construction Industry Stabilization Committee. The much ballyhooed move to control prices, however, was a far weaker recommendation that money saved by contractors in wage controls should be passed on to the consumer. That was all.

Nixon Vetoes — The President sustained considerable trade union anger in his vetoes of the accelerated public works, education and medical bills, public service employment and the limitations on television and radio campaign spending. Nixon has since signed a public service employment bill and his veto was overridden on education, but in other areas he was sustained by a Congress unable to secure the necessary two-thirds vote.

Political Confrontations—In the 1970 congressional elections, with rare exceptions organized labor and Nixon were in opposing camps.

In the total political picture, labor emerged in good shape, particularly when labor-supported gubernatorial candidates captured 13 state houses while losing only two. Republicans also lost control of seven state legislatures.

Although 25 Democratic seats were up in the Senate elections to only 10 Republican seats, the GOP was able to pick up only two seats. This left the Democrats with a majority of six. Nixon's claim that he won an "ideological majortiy" in the Senate has since been pretty well disproven. Democrats picked up nine House seats.

With all its victories, labor lost some good friends. Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.), chairman of the Senate Labor & Public Welfare Committee, was defeated in the primary. Other good friends of labor who lost were Senators Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) and Joseph Tydings (D-Md.).

A side note on the elections was that G. Harrold Carswell, successfully opposed by labor as nominee to the Supreme Court, lost his bid for the Senate in the Florida Republican primary. He was defeated by Rep. William C. Cramer (R-Fla.) who in turn lost to labor-endorsed Democrat Lawton Chiles in the general election.

Restrictions on Bargaining—The Administration is continuing to push for its new collective bargaining proposal in five industries in transportation—railroads, trucking, maritime, longshore and airlines—which, in the final analysis, means accepting the last best offer. It would, in effect, nullify the right to strike.

The construction wage controls have also been a source of friction. There is a feeling that building trades workers have unfairly been singled out for a "scapegoat" role in the inflation crisis.

A third area of concern on the collective bargaining front is the so-called "Inflation Alerts" issued by the Administration. Labor believes that the Administration has moved squarely into the collective bargaining arena in an attempt to weaken the bargaining positions of unions and thus get lower settlements.

Low-Wage Imports — Organized labor believes that the Administration is not moving with sufficient determination or leadership to halt the flood of low-wage imports wiping out American jobs in a growing number of industries.

Related to this is the problem of American capital invested abroad and runaway plants to the Mexican border which are wiping out tens of thousands of jobs. The Administration has not only failed to deal with the situation but through its policies may well have encouraged it.

Philadelphia Plan—The running battle between the Administration and organized labor continues on the issue of jobs and job-upgrading for minority group members.

The Philadelphia Plan is the Administration's scheme to establish quotas under government contract construction. It has been expanded to other cities. However, Meany's charge that this plan would not result in any new minority employment has not been countered.

Meanwhile, the AFL-CIO, the construction unions and the entire labor movement have been expanding their own programs such as Operation Outreach in cooperation with the A. Philip Randolph Institute and other groups. (PAI)

Voter Drive Vital To Correct Abuses

By Alexander Uhl

FOR ORGANIZED LABOR, the year starting Labor Day 1971 opens the way to escape from the most frustrating and clearly unsympathetic Administration in recent memory.

For a labor movement that already was determined to do everything in its power to put new faces into Congress and the White House, the Nixon wage-freeze plan came as a final blow. Rarely has an American President so openly affronted workers as Nixon did in his new economic policy that cracked down on wages and prices while doing nothing about profits, interest and dividends.

It can honestly be said that when Pres. Nixon came into office in January of 1969 the labor movement was prepared to give him every benefit of the doubt. As AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has repeatedly stressed, American labor is not wedded to one party or the other. The interests of the American people and American workers are what determine its political attitudes.

Pres. Eisenhower was a Republican and presided over an Administration that gave us three recessions and much unemployment. Organized labor opposed him, but it was not with the bitterness that Nixon has gathered about his head. Despite the fact that top labor has supported the President's foreign policy and his efforts toward peace, it has found his domestic policies intolerable.

Over the past three years, the President has steadily succeeded in convincing the country's great mass of workers and notably its well-informed union workers that his interests lie overwhelmingly with business and Big Business at that. He assured workers that his battle against inflation would not be at their expense.

But the record is to the contrary.

Not only has inflation continued, but unemployment has soared and despite promises that the worst is over, there were few indications as Labor Day 1971 approached that the economy was meeting the needs of the American people.

It is against this background that organized labor looks forward to 1972 as a year in which the balance can be redressed, when domestic policies can be changed to free the American people of a long-discredited theory. This is the theory that the way to encourage prosperity is to do all the economic favors for powerful and wealthy and increasingly monopolistic business and industry in the comfortable assurance that the nation's wealth will "trickle down" to the rest of us.

Organized labor and its economic experts have not been content merely to protest every time that the President has sought tax relief at the top in the form of accelerated depreciation and the continued existence of huge tax loopholes and subsidies for the rich agricultural interests. Labor has produced a program of its own, in overwhelming measure supported by all elements of the labor movement whether affiliated or independent

It is a program that will be presented to the platform committees of both parties next year. The support it gets from the parties themselves and from the candidates in large measure will determine labor's final position in the November presidential election.

The program is based on the concept that only a full employment economy can be the answer to today's inflation and unemployment problems. Only full use of the nation's economic potential can relieve the pressure on prices. Only the full use of its potential can provide the jobs that are needed to take millions of men and women, boys and girls, off the unemployment rolls and provide the new jobs that are needed for an ever-growing work force.

It is for that reason that labor has urgently insisted on measures to support desperately needed public works programs and public service financial aid—measures that have drawn Nixon vetoes as "make work" and unproductive. Even his change of position on the 1971 public service bill came too late to undo the wrong done to thousands of unemployed who suffered while the President shifted.

In this fight, of course, organized workers will carry the burden of assuring national and state representation both on the executive and legislative level to carry out these urgently needed programs. COPE will be doing its job of getting unionists all over the country to register and vote.

The election of 1972 will have special significance since it will be the first year when some 25 million young people between the ages of 18 and 24 will be eligible to vote in their first presidential election. Already COPE is directing its major energies to assuring that they register and participate.

What new direction these young people will give to the national posture remains to be seen. Numerically the new voters will wield tremendous influence that can certainly swing individual elections one way or the other. But whether they will vote so differently from their parents cannot be foretold.

For organized workers there is still another facet of the Nixon Administration—the quality of Nixon appointments to powerful public office.

Organized labor was a leader in the fight to prevent the confirmation of Judges G. Harrold Carswell and Clement F. Haynsworth to the U.S. Supreme Court. It was successful in that fight against two reactionary judges, but there have been many other appointments that have drawn labor concern without official opposition.

These include the shifts which have been made in the National Labor Relations Board, which now has two Nixon appointees plus a new general counsel who has tremendous independent power in determining whether or not to bring unfair labor practice charges against management or unions.

Already the appointments of Chairman Edward B. Miller and Member Ralph E. Kennedy have produced management-oriented decisions and dissents that clearly show the way to a new era in the NLRB where more and more cases will go against labor. Management prerogatives, management "free speech" rights and management credibility are the concern of the new members in increasing degree.

Many of these appointments are for set terms of office and cannot be changed by the results of the 1972 elections. Nevertheless, there are still hundreds of new appointments to be made over the next few years and the Administration that makes them is crucial to workers. (PAI)

IBEW Appeal Denied, 3-2:

NLRB Shifts Policy, Favors Arbitration

The National Labor Relations Board divided 3-2 in giving arbitration the preference over NLRB litigation in a dispute over a wage increase ordered into effect by a major conglomerate without union consent.

Three board members voted to dismiss a complaint by Local 1098 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers against Collyer Insulated Wire, a Gulf & Western Systems Co. plant at Providence, R.I. They said the parties should have arbitrated the dispute under the provisions of their contract, but they retained jurisdiction over the union's refusal-to-bargain complaint to permit a later look.

Two members disagreed with the majority. Howard Jenkins, Jr., called the decision "a complete reversal of board precedent," made "solely because the collective bargaining agreement establishes arbitration . . . if and when both parties . . . decide to pursue that course." But neither side moved to arbitrate the dispute in this case, he pointed out.

Member John H. Fanning said management had "attempted to escape from the wage bargain" it made with the union. Union members had a right to institute a grievance but "no such grievances have been filed in this case and there is no indication" the union or its members voluntarily wish to do so, he wrote. He likened the majority's ruling to compulsory arbitration.

Chairman Edward B. Miller and Member Ralph E. Kennedy wrote in the majority opinion that the contract in effect in 1970 when the dispute occurred said "all questions, disputes or controversies under this agreement shall be settled and determined solely and exclusively by the conciliation and arbitration procedures provided in this agreement."

The two said "we are not compelling any party to agree to arbitrate disputes . . . but are merely giving full effect to their own voluntary agreement to submit all such disputes to arbitration. . . . Nor are we stripping any party" of their legal rights.

Member Gerald A. Brown, whose term on the board expired after the decision was made, agreed with the majority for his own reasons, given in a separate opinion. Arbitration is useful to settle disputes about agreements previously reached but "should never be used as a substitute for collective bargaining," he said.

The majority reversed Trial Examiner James M. Fitzpatrick, who ruled that management had made unilateral changes in the wage rates of some maintenance craftsmen which the union had not agreed to, and by so acting had "sought to escape from the basic wage framework established in the contract."

Fitzpatrick rejected the company's argument that the matter should have been sent to arbitration and not to the NLRB.

The majority left the door open for a motion for further consideration if the dispute has not been settled or submitted promptly to arbitration, or if the arbitration procedures have not been fair and regular or have reached a result which is "repugnant" to the law.

Utah Labor Re-Elects Berger to New Term

Salt Lake City—The Utah AFL-CIO re-elected E. J. Berger to a new two-year term as president and secretary-treasurer. Berger, who has headed the state federation for eight years, assumed the combined post in 1970.

Berger was challenged for the state labor body leadership by Milton E. Saathoff of the Steelworkers, a member of the state executive board for 12 years. Berger also is a member of the Steelworkers.

Frank Lay of the Iron Workers was elected to a one-year term as vice president of the federation at the 15th annual convention. He succeeds A. A. Thon of the Meat Cutters, who held the post for the past year.

The 189 convention delegates also elected four new members to the 12-member executive board. They are C. N. Maughan and Jack Anderson of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; F. W. Neusmeyer, Steelworkers, and Lake Austin, Operating Engineers.

In his report to the three-day convention, Berger told delegates that labor's responsibility goes beyond the bargaining table and stressed its vital role in political action.

"It is a must that we get our workers first interested and educated to the necessity," he advised. "Action must begin at the local union level . . . where the day-to-day problems and needs of people must be met."

"With your cooperation in your union and on the political front, we will be able to stop the Nixon Administration from passing restrictive laws to hamper collective bargaining," Berger declared.

Utah Gov. Calvin L. Rampton (D) told the delegates that organized labor has made significant gains in the state during the past six years. He cited improvements in workmen's compensation and unemployment benefits and occupational safety laws.

Sen. Frank E. Moss (D), who was re-elected in 1970 with strong labor support, discussed the nation's economic problems and predicted they would be the key issue in the 1972 presidential campaign.

In key resolutions, the convention:

- Opposed any increase in local sales taxes, but would not block increases in state sales tax if food and medicine were exempt.
- Endorsed National Health Security.
- Called for equitable wage increases and unemployment benefits for all public employes in the state.
- Urged the state legislature to amend Utah's "right-to-work" law to make agency shop clauses lawful.
- Established a political action committee to interview all candidates for local and state public offices.

Latin Unionists Urged to Learn From Freeze

Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne told graduates of the American Institute for Free Labor Development's fifth Labor Economics Program that they were fortunate to be in the United States at a time when they could see "the beginnings of an economic fight where unions, government and business become involved."

He urged them, in remarks delivered at graduation ceremonies, to obtain a copy of the AFL-CIO Executive Council statement, for "in it are the basics of the economic viewpoints of labor," he said.

Beirne, who is also secretary-treasurer of the AIFLD, told the 14 graduates of the nine-month program at Georgetown University that they would be very important to the trade union movements in their countries, because trained economists are needed to provide elected union leaders with the facts they so urgently require.

As a final note, Beirne told the Latin unionists that he hoped "our battle will whet your appetites enough to find out the outcome" and predicted that the struggle would "not end in 90 days, but only be starting."

Carlos Barrera of El Salvador spoke for the class saying, "we are first and foremost trade unionists and we will always be strongly bound to the progressive labor movement. We now understand better the basic problems that confront us, and therefore we can now dedicate ourselves to serving the workers with the same courage, decision, and enthusiasm as before, but with an improved vision as to possible solutions."

The commencement speaker was Antonio Ortiz Mena, president of the Inter-American Development Bank.

Mena carefully avoided criticizing the action taken by the Administration in imposing a 10-percent surcharge on goods imported to the United States, but did express concern over its possible applications.

He said that the surcharge would primarily affect semi-manufactured export items which give Latin America the greatest possibilities for trade diversification. He also called the 10-percent reduction in foreign aid "counterproductive, since Latin American markets account for a high percentage of the United States industrial exports."

Pipe Trades Courses, Contest Set New Marks

Lafayette, Ind.—Quality, skill, education and training were central points stressed in the instructor training program and apprenticeship contest sponsored by the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters at Purdue University here.

Pres. Martin J. Ward of the union joined with other labor and industry officials and faculty members in urging the participants to focus on these goals as they work at their jobs.

A record total of 1,129 instructors of plumber, steamfitter-pipefitter and sprinkler fitter apprentices turned out for the week-long course.

They were brought up to date on modern craft teaching methods by a staff of 120 university professors and industry personnel.

Five-year, 200-hour courses were completed by 96 unionists and they were certified by Purdue as apprentice instructors.

The apprentice contest was the international final of regional competitions that brought 132 state and provincial winners to Purdue to compete for three prizes in each of the three divisions.

The winners in the plumber division were Richard R. Roman of Local 1, Brooklyn, N.Y.; Gordon H. Rowley, Local 469, Phoenix, Ariz.; and Glen E. Hayworth of Local 33, Des Moines, Ia.

Steamfitter-pipefitter winners were John F. Teslak, Local 636, Detroit; Phillip P. Stiever, Local 601, Milwaukee; and James F. Navarra of Local 420 in Philadelphia.

Sprinkler fitter champs were Florian Garski of Local 183, Milwaukee; David I. Heaps, Local 170, Vancouver, B.C.; and Jessie J. Wilkins of Local 669 in Washington, D.C.

On the opening day of the performance tests, Glen E. Hayworth had his foot broken by a dropped pipe, and he was taken to a hospital where a cast was put on his leg. But he insisted on returning to the competition where he won third place and was the recipient of several specialty awards.

An awards exchange took place at the banquet which capped the week's activities. Plumbers & Pipe Fitters President-Emeritus Peter T. Schoemann was presented a plaque by Purdue, and Frederick L. Hovde, president-emeritus of Purdue, was presented with an honorary membership in the union.

The instructor training program was started in 1958 as a result of a pact between the Plumbers & Pipefitters and the National Constructors Association. It is financed by a union-management trust fund built up by contributions from employers based on man hours worked by the union members.

The fund has distributed nearly $16 million for instructor and apprentice training in the 13 years since it was formed. More than 37,000 apprentices and 3,500 instructors are being trained under these programs today.

'Discouraged' Job Seekers Push Up Rate

The number of "discouraged workers"—those outside the labor force who want jobs but are not looking for work because they are convinced they could not find it—increased by 150,000 in the last year bringing the total to about 750,000, according to a Labor Dept. report.

"Discouraged" workers are not included in government estimates of the labor force or in official unemployment statistics. Only jobless workers who have recently tested the job market by unsuccessfully seeking work are counted in the monthly unemployment reports by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

If discouraged workers were included in the unemployment figures, the jobless rate for July would have been about 7 percent, rather than the official 5.8 percent figure.

Women account for two-thirds of the total of 750,000 of discouraged workers, the report noted, although the labor force is only 40 percent female.

The number of discouraged women workers—509,000—is up 120,000 over last year, while the total for men has stayed about the same.

The figures also show that blacks are even more over-represented among discouraged job-seekers than they are in the official unemployment figures. While they amount to only 10 percent of the labor force, blacks account for about 20 percent of official joblessness and 25 percent of the discouraged workers.

There were 554,000 whites and 189,000 blacks and other minorities in the totals for discouraged workers.

Nixon Plan Draws Sharp Labor Fire

ously employed in defense industries," Meany charged.

He concluded his message by noting that trade union members intend "to see that the injustice imposed on them by the President is corrected at the bargaining table."

"We demand economic justice. We demand full employment. For only full employment will produce prosperity for all Americans."

In other statements, leaders of organized labor viewed the 77th observance of Labor Day as a time of rededication to the principles of unionism and democracy.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland vowed that labor would continue its fight for reasonable limits on political campaign spending, stating "we don't believe politics or political funding should be a rich man's game."

"As alarming as the sheer amount of money spent on campaigning is the disparity in its availability," Kirkland said.

"In 1968, the Nixon-Agnew ticket was able to spend $12.6 million on radio and TV, twice as much as the Humphrey-Muskie ticket. The unfairness of this situation would have been equally glaring had the shoe been on the other foot.

"It is wrong, no matter who benefits—friend or foe—to arm one candidate with a pop-gun and the other with a howitzer."

Kirkland said that trade unionists will keep coming back "again and again for as long as necessary, until justice and fairness prevail."

Pres. I. W. Abel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. said the "American people have a strong sense of fair play and a strongly rooted belief in equal sacrifice when their country is confronted with a crisis."

"But Pres. Nixon's new 'game plan' does not meet those traditional American tests," Abel said.

The Steelworkers president said that if Congress "meets the test the President failed, both in his first economic 'game plan' and now in his latest one, then by Labor Day next year we will have a sound economy, beneficial to all. We will have a sound economy in which all will share fairly because all will have sacrificed fairly."

Pres. Frank Bonadio of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. called on building craftsmen and other trade unionists to rededicate themselves to the ideal of collective, unified action.

"Harassed from the outside, we must stand together, united.

"Collectively, there is hardly anything we cannot accomplish, from the defense of our jurisdictions against the non-union contractor and the non-union worker to a wipe-out of anti-union laws and procedures through the election of public officials who realize that anti-unionism is but another name for anti-Americanism."

He called on building tradesmen to strengthen their local BCTCs, making them "strong, outspoken, well-coordinated representative organizations."

Meany's call for more jobs was echoed in a statement from Pres. Donald MacDonald of the Canadian Labor Congress, who said, "our primary concern must continue to be directed toward economic recovery and an end to the cruelty of unemployment."

"At a time when many of our basic freedoms are threatened," MacDonald said, "there is a tendency to forget that free collective bargaining is an essential part of the democratic system.

"The effects of work stoppages—which are a small fraction of the disruption caused by unemployment—are exaggerated out of all proportion."

MacDonald said government interference and rigid laws are no solution to labor-management problems and that "what we should be doing is looking for methods to improve normal collective bargaining, rather than replacing it with some rigid legal system."

Council Statement Issued as Pamphlet

The text of the AFL-CIO Executive Council statement spelling out labor's opposition to the Nixon Administration's new economic policies is available free from the AFL-CIO.

The 13-page, vest-pocket-sized pamphlet is titled "The New Nixon Game Plan: Unequitable, Unjust, Unfair, Unworkable." The pamphlet, Publication No. 807, is available in quantity from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th St. N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Thomas Pitts, Retired Coast Leader, Dies

San Francisco—Thomas L. Pitts, active in the California labor movement for 30 years until his retirement in 1970, died Sept. 1 in a Lakeport, Calif., hospital one day after being admitted following a massive heart attack. He was 56.

Pitts had been an officer of the California AFL-CIO and its predecessor body since 1941. As executive secretary-treasurer of the state federation since 1960 he spearheaded labor's fight for improved jobless protections under the law, stronger safeguards for industrially injured and disabled workers, for bringing farm workers into the mainstream of society and more effective consumer aids.

"He was a warm friend, a great trade unionist and a first-rate citizen," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a message of sympathy to Pitts's wife Gwen and their four children.

State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning, who succeeded Pitts at the latter's retirement Mar. 11, 1970, said "few men could match the courage and stout-hearted determination" that Pitts used "to improve the rights and benefits of millions of California workers."

Born in DeSoto, Mo., Pitts worked as a truck driver from 1931 to 1936, when he became business representative of Freight Drivers Local 208. Later he became an officer of Drivers' Local 848 in Los Angeles, and served on the executive boards of the Los Angeles AFL and the Teamsters Joint Council. He was president of the State AFL when it merged with the CIO in 1958.

Prices Rise, Work Dips, Real Earnings Below '68

The Consumer Price Index jumped two-tenths of 1 percent on both a seasonally adjusted and an unadjusted basis during July, and a simultaneous drop in the work week left the average worker with less buying power than he had three years ago.

The July increase brought the CPI to 121.8. That meant that the same cross section of consumer goods and services which cost $10 in 1967, now cost the buyer $12.18.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson said the minimal increase in consumer prices "should be heartening news to bread-winners," but while the increase was smaller than in recent months, real spendable earnings for the average worker dropped 46 cents over the month, from $91.96 in June to $91.50 in July.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics said real spendable earnings were 2.4 percent above the record low posted in November 1970, but they were 1.5 percent below the all-time high reached in September 1968.

Thus, the average worker's paycheck actually was worth less in terms of buying power than it was three years ago.

Food prices continued to spiral with supermarket prices increasing six-tenths of 1 percent during July on top of an increase of nine-tenths of 1 percent in June. Overall food prices were running 3.5 percent higher than 12 months ago.

The advance in food was led by the prices of fruits and vegetables which showed a seven-tenths of 1 percent increase over the previous month.

The cost of home ownership continued its steady increase, rising four-tenths of 1 percent during July. Over the year, home ownership—which includes interest rates on mortgages—has increased by 3.5 percent.

And the cost of housekeeping and of maintaining a home continued to lead the cost of services, showing a seven-tenths of 1 percent increase in July.

Over the year, housekeeping and home maintenance has risen 9.5 percent, representing the largest rise for a CPI component in the 12-month period.

Health care was another cost leader, up five-tenths of a point over the month, and posting a 6.6-percent increase from July 1970.

Apparel and clothing upkeep costs declined by seven-tenths of 1 percent, and the prices of men's and boys' clothing showed a sharp decrease, down 1.2 points.

The prices of new and used cars dropped, and gasoline prices showed a sharp decline of eight-tenths of a point.

The BLS noted that the July figures are based entirely on data gathered before Pres. Nixon's wage-price freeze went into effect.

It said that the August index will be based on prices collected both before and after the freeze began.

Notable by its absence among the July figures was the number of workers who normally would receive cost-of-living increases tied to the CPI.

All such increases have been suspended during the 90-day freeze, which is scheduled to end Nov. 13.

Eight Areas Join High Jobless List, Total of 62 Greatest in Nine Years

The number of major U.S. labor areas with substantial unemployment has jumped by eight to a total of 62—twice as many as a year ago and the most in nine years.

Boston and Philadelphia, each with 7 percent unemployment, were added to the Labor Dept. list for August along with Fort Worth, Tex., Dayton, Ohio, Shreveport, La., Charleston, S.C., Wilkes-Barre-Hazleton, Pa., and the metropolitan area of Davenport, Iowa, and Rock Island-Moline, Ill.

Areas are put on the substantial list when unemployment reaches 6 percent. The figures released by the Labor Dept. for August are based on surveys in mid-June, when the national unemployment rate was 5.6 percent compared to 5.8 percent last month.

When Pres. Nixon took office in January 1969, there were six major areas on the substantial unemployment list. There were 31 in August 1970.

Of the nation's 150 largest cities, 14 now have unemployment of 9 percent or more. Of the 88 with less than 6 percent unemployment, 82 are in the category immediately below "substantial," which means they are only 5.9 percent or below.

Not a single major U.S. city is now in the category of a labor shortage and in the past year, the number of areas with low unemployment—less than 3 percent—has shrunk from 22 to 6. The jump of eight major cities to the substantial list followed an increase of only one for the previous month.

In addition, 16 more smaller areas were added to the substantial list for August to bring the total to 767, the most since the all-time record of 778 of eight years ago.

Of those 767 "other" areas, 490 are now classified as having persistent unemployment, which means their unemployment rate has been above 6 percent for the past calendar year and has been at least 50 percent above the national average for several years. Six major areas are also listed as persistent.

Of the eight major areas added to the substantial list in August, four had never been there in the 16 years that the Labor Dept. has kept such records. It was the first time for Boston, Shreveport, Charleston and Davenport-Rock Island-Moline.

Last Week's News Stopped by Strike

A five-day strike against Washington, D.C., printing firms prevented publication of last week's AFL-CIO News, which would have been the Aug. 28 issue.

The strike, by about 700 members of a specialty workers local of the Printing Pressmen, ended Aug. 30. A new 34-month contract calling for wage increases of $45 to $50 a week over the life of the contract is now pending membership ratification.

The basic wage of the specialty workers under the contract which expired May 31 was $111. The unit includes press washers, fly men, porters, package wrappers and truck drivers. Their contract covers 36 printing and related firms in the Washington, D.C., area, including Merkle Press, where the AFL-CIO News is printed.

Nixon Program Assailed For Bias Against Worker

A $10,000 DONATION to the United Negro College Fund from the AFL-CIO is presented by Pres. George Meany to fund representatives Vernon E. Jordan, left, and Carthur Drake. Meany also sent letters to all AFL-CIO affiliates urging continued labor support for the program.

Labor Renews Call For Equal Justice

By John R. Oravec

AFL-CIO leaders called for full economic justice for America's workers and ripped into the inequities of Pres. Nixon's new economic policy in a series of nationwide radio speeches.

Federation Pres. George Meany set the tone for the Labor Day broadcasts over four networks by charging the Administration with raiding the public treasury on behalf of big business while ignoring or delaying urgently-needed public programs.

"The President's program is loaded overwhelmingly in the favor of big business and against workers, taxpayers and the public interest," Meany said on the NBC radio network.

Labeling the Nixon proposals "a form of socialism for big business," Meany said the President's actions illustrate his continuing lack of concern for the public interest.

He underscored organized labor's objections to the vast tax relief program for corporations, describing the scheme as a "giant raid on the federal treasury that would transfer billions in public funds to the private treasuries of big business."

The new 10-percent tax credit proposal, coupled with a proposed tax deferral on export profits and the tax depreciation concession granted by the Administration earlier this year, would give business $70 billion over the next 10 years —"and all of it would come out of the public treasury," Meany observed.

To make up for this loss of public funds, Meany noted that vital public programs and federal workers would suffer. He referred to the delay in welfare reform, a 5-percent slash in the federal work force and delayed raises for federal employes, along with the with-

'Phase Two' Talks Slated By President

The second phase of the Administration's economic stabilization policies will be worked out in cooperation with representatives of major groups in the country, including organized labor, Pres. Nixon announced in an unusual message to a joint session of Congress.

He said the 90-day freeze announced on Aug. 15 was "a temporary measure to hold the line while the next phase of stabilization was discussed," and that the freeze will not be extended beyond the 90 days.

The President said that he had invited representatives of Congress, business, labor and agriculture "to meet within the next few days for the purpose of helping plan the next phase, and they have accepted."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and a number of union presidents were scheduled to meet with Nixon on Sept. 10. Meetings with business, farm and congressional leaders were slated for next week.

The President declared that the Near 9-Year Peak:

Unemployment Rate Jumps to 6.1 Percent

By Tom Castor

The unemployment rate shot up from 5.8 percent to 6.1 percent in August, nearly matching the nine-year high of 6.2 percent recorded last May and December, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Once again, the number of available jobs failed to keep pace with the number of persons entering or re-entering the labor force in search of work. While employment increased by 260,000, more than twice that number came into the civilian labor force which reached an all-time peak of 79.2 billion.

For the most part, the job market picture remained the same as it has been for the past nine months—bleak.

The ranks of the unemployed totaled 5.1 million, only a slight improvement from the 5.3 million in July.

Long-term unemployment continued to exact a heavy toll with 1.3 million out of work 15 weeks or more, and well over half a million unemployed 27 weeks or more.

The number of factory jobs remained at its lowest level in six years, dropping 30,000 in August, the third consecutive monthly decline.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said the August figures show that "the widespread suffering among American workers continues unabated."

Coupled with a "sharp increase in the wholesale price index, these figures prove—if any further proof is necessary—that the Nixon Game Plan Number 1 was a disaster. And nothing we've seen yet persuades us that his new game plan will do any better," Meany said.

Wholesale prices rose seven-tenths of 1 percent during August, the largest increase in six months. Wholesale price rises usually foreshadow increases in consumer prices, and even with the wage-price

'Game Plan' Faces Test In Congress

By David L. Perlman

Congress returned from a month-long recess to a whole new ball game—a host of major issues stemming from Pres. Nixon's controversial new economic policy piled on top of an already heavy agenda of unfinished business.

In the weeks ahead, the House and Senate will be faced with accepting, rejecting or changing key ingredients of the President's prescription for the nation's ailing economy—a hold-down on wages, cutbacks in federal spending and big tax windfalls for employers.

The President asked a joint session of Congress to put "before all other business" the enactment of his tax proposals.

Its most controversial element is a new investment tax credit that amounts to a federal subsidy for business and industry. Nixon renamed it a "job development credit" and claimed that it will generate new jobs by encouraging employers to invest in more modern machinery.

The other parts of his tax package propose repeal of the 7-percent excise tax on automobiles and advancement of a $50 increase in personal income tax exemptions from the scheduled date of 1973 to 1972.

But before Congress completes action on the tax portion of the Nixon program, it will face a showdown vote on another segment of his economic plan—a demand that an additional six-month wage freeze be inflicted on federal employes.

Under existing law, salaried government workers are due an automatic pay raise in January under a formula tied to comparability with private industry.

The President can move to withhold the raise—and he has directed that it be postponed six months until June.

But if either the House or Senate disapproves the presidential decision by a simple majority vote, the raise will take effect as originally scheduled.

The disapproval resolution must be adopted within 30 days, and the test could come as soon as 10 days when it will be in order to bring the resolution to the floor.

Rep. Jerome R. Waldie (D-Calif.) filed a disapproval resolution the first day the House was back in ses-

Housing Costs Example of Freeze Bias

The AFL-CIO told Congress that the high cost of housing is a glaring example of the injustice of the President's Aug. 15 wage freeze.

Buyers whose incomes are frozen "must seek shelter on land that is not frozen in price and they must seek mortgages that are not frozen in interest cost," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said in testimony before a House Banking subcommittee.

"The cost of financing on FHA homes has risen 356 percent in the past 20 years and land costs have gone up 296 percent, while structure costs, which include on-site labor, have risen only 65 percent," Biemiller said. Yet, he noted, the Nixon Administration has seen fit to apply a freeze on labor and not on land costs and interest rates.

Meany Stresses Voice for Labor Key to Fair Stabilization Plan

Organized labor must have an equal voice in shaping fair wage-price stabilization machinery if such a program is to be effective, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told newsmen.

"I think that business and labor and other segments of the society can make a contribution, but it has got to be a contribution that is given voluntarily and not a contribution that is forced by some bureaucratic setup," Meany said.

Appearing on ABC's televised Issues & Answers program, Meany said the AFL-CIO would support machinery "something like the War Labor Board" which was established to control the economy during World War II.

"The War Labor Board made its own rules without any interference from government at all," Meany said. "And the War Labor Board was successful in keeping production going and keeping people reasonably satisfied."

Meany, who was a member of that board, emphasized that labor was given a prime role in establishing the board machinery, working out basic principles with the help of government moderators.

"After that two-and-a-half day session, there was an agreement between labor and management on three very, very simple points:

"Point No. 1 was that there should be no stoppage of any kind in war production; that there should be no strikes on the part of labor and there should be no lockouts on the part of the employer."

"Point No. 2 was that there should be effective machinery established that would take care of disputes that arose, and which of course was something you had to do if you were not going to have strikes and lockouts.

"Point No. 3 was that the President of the United States should set up . . . that machinery."

Virginia Labor Shifts Schedule Of Conventions

Roanoke, Va.—Delegates to the 16th annual Virginia AFL-CIO convention re-elected the state federation's top officers and voted to hold formal sessions only in even-numbered years.

Statewide conferences will be held during off years, with flexible agendas, a minimum of time-consuming protocol and no registration fees.

The change in conventions led to a one-time three-year term of office for the federation executives. Pres. Julian F. Carper and Sec.-Treas. Brewster Snow were unanimously re-elected to serve until the 1974 convention.

In other convention actions the delegates:

- Endorsed the candidacy of State Sen. Henry E. Howell, running as an independent, for lieutenant governor.
- Voted to increase the per capita tax on local unions from 21.5 cents to 25 cents per month.
- Protested the U.S. Army's granting sole tourist transport rights in Arlington National Cemetery to an anti-union firm as being unfair and un-American.

The delegates voted by more than 2-1 to endorse Howell, who is running for the seat left vacant by the death of J. Sargeant Reynolds.

In other action Archie V. Iddings of the Transit Union was elected vice president, succeeding Marvin W. Wallace, who did not run for re-election. Six new members were elected to the 29-member executive board.

Higher Wages Tied to Boost In Productivity

Rising productivity in an expanding economy means higher wages for workers and a better standard of living for all Americans, according to an interim report from the National Commission on Productivity.

The commission was appointed in July 1970 by Pres. Nixon to recommend ways to improve productivity and includes representatives of organized labor, management, government and the public.

Noting that annual productivity growth has slipped well below the average of the past 20 years, the commission pointed to collective bargaining as one of six target areas for improving those figures.

The commission said bargaining "can constitute an important avenue to increased production" as well as wages and profits but that "our potential is far greater than the current scope of bargaining practices and goes far beyond the limits of current production goals."

"Work rules, training and upgrading workers, group incentives, job redesign and enrichment, workplace participation and communication, safety and work scheduling are all areas that deserve close attention in the interest of increased productivity."

Hodgson Aide Named Labor Dept. Solicitor

Richard Schubert, executive assistant to Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson, has been named solicitor of the Labor Dept.

Schubert, 34, was assistant labor relations manager for Bethlehem Steel Corp. before coming to the Labor Dept. last year.

NEW TREASURER of Carpenters is Charles E. Nichols, right. He was named to fill out the term of Peter E. Terzick, left, who is retiring after 10 years in the post. Terzick will continue to edit the union's monthly magazine, The Carpenter.

U.S. Labor's Programs Explained to British

Blackpool, England—The nations of the free world granted independence to 68 former colonies with more than 1 billion population during a period when the Soviet Union and the Communist Chinese subjugated 172 million people and 1.9 million square miles of territory "and are seeking more," AFL-CIO Vice Pres. John F. Griner told the British Trades Union Congress at its annual gathering.

Griner's review of U.S. foreign relations was accompanied by a report on the domestic economy by Vice Pres. Paul Jennings, who said American trade unionists are "standing firm, despite widespread unemployment" and "continuing hostility and indifference" from the White House.

Griner, president of the Government Employes, and Jennings, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, addressed the TUC as fraternal delegates. They presented the greetings of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and other members of the federation's Executive Council, and the good wishes of U.S. union members.

Griner reported that his union of government workers quadrupled its membership in recent years and has established a legitimate trade union relationship between the government and its employes after more than 50 years of second-class citizenship.

"Yet at this moment," he said, "all government employes are threatened" by the imposition of a wage freeze decree, thrust on employes without any consultation with the labor movement.

All those who work in government service are, in consequence, "bearing the heaviest penalties in a wage freeze while the taxes we pay are being gift-wrapped for presentation to the large corporations."

The process of free collective bargaining is being attacked, "the welfare of workers grossly shoved aside by those who are supposed to represent them." This is "grim fare," Griner said, "for a nation founded on liberty and justice for all."

On the subject of trade, Griner noted that workers fail to benefit when multi-national corporations seek long-range production facilities in the nations of the world "where workers are the most cheaply paid."

The AFL-CIO, he said, is "determined to use its every opportunity and influence to prevent the sell-out of our freedoms and achievements by so-called enlightened international industrialists, bankers and political Houdinis."

Referring to the United Nations and Red China, Griner asked: "Can the United Nations accept the obviously unacceptable member, violate its charter and remove a valid member from its post? We have signaled for caution and watch the situation, prepared for the outcome."

Jennings told the TUC convention that American union members are "united as seldom before," and are "speaking with a single voice" to an extent "unmatched in years." He listed these advances:

- Hundreds of thousands of newly organized workers are tasting for the first time the "job stability, the basic human dignity and self-respect, and the hope for a better future that only union contracts can bring."
- The great breakthroughs toward overcoming racial injustice are being consolidated in America's workplaces, and at every legislative level.
- Unions are leading the way in training minority workers and upgrading their skills for better jobs.
- "We are making a determined drive down the road toward another piece of good news—the long-overdue achievement of a National Health Security program to guarantee a decent standard of health care to all Americans as a matter of right."

In the later campaign, as in many others, Jennings said, "we are the beneficiaries of the pioneering experience of the TUC."

On the debit side, "America is in deep economic trouble . . . brought about by the misguided economic policies of the present Administration." More than 5 million workers are unemployed; 14.5 million are on the relief rolls; 25 million citizens are "officially described as living in poverty," Jennings emphasized.

Nevertheless American labor "is not frightened and doesn't tire of the struggle against inflation and unemployment and the inequities of the Nixon wage freeze," Jennings assured the TUC.

"We will continue. We will triumph," he said.

Canadian Labor Pioneer Percy Bengough Dies

Vancouver, B.C.—Percy R. Bengough, long-time leader of the Machinists and a prime mover in the formation of the Canadian Labor Congress, died here at 89. He was president of the Trades & Labor Congress of Canada from 1943 until 1954, and in 1956 helped merge the TLC and the Canadian Congress of Labor.

Bengough at his death was honorary CLC president.

Windfall to Paper Firms:

Pulp Union Protests 'One-Sided' Freeze

Montreal—Delegates to the 29th convention of the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers condemned the Nixon Administration for imposing a wage freeze which "shortchanges" workers and puts extra profits into the pockets of employers.

The one-sided nature of the freeze was cited by Pres.-Sec. Joseph P. Tonelli in a report that preceded a convention vote. A union analysis shows, Tonelli said, that 73 paper companies will get an "unexpected windfall" of nearly $4 million by not having to pay wage raises they agreed to in negotiations with the union.

"These frozen increases cannot," Tonelli pointed out, "be paid retroactively at a later date." The freeze also "negates our cost-of-living increases and makes the workers' sacrifice a bonanza for bankers and bosses" of U.S. companies, he charged.

More than 1,200 delegates from the U.S. and Canada joined in opposing controls that fall more heavily on workers than on those who benefit from profits, interest rates, stock sales and other forms of income.

They elected Tonelli, Treas. Henry Segal and 11 vice presidents for new three-year terms. Also they approved a 50-cent increase in per capita payments, including 10 cents for the strike benefit fund, and voted wage hikes for officers, effective when the freeze melts. The delegates also amended the union's constitution to exempt the president from the mandatory age 65 retirement provision for officers.

Tonelli took the oath of office from past Pres. William H. Burnell and himself swore in the other officers, including one new vice president—Hollis A. Ward of Winslow, Me.

The officers reported that the union, after reaching the all-time-high of 192,000 members last December, lost an average of 13,000 members in the first six months of 1971 because of the recession caused by Administration economic policies.

Officers and staff members helped organize 210 new paper industry plants since the last convention, and will continue to press for more members and a more effective union effort, they reported.

A proposal to increase delegates' per diem payments by $10 a day was turned down by the convention. Acting at Segal's suggestion, the delegates voted instead to put the total of $60,000 in a special fund. The money will finance a two-nation boycott of the products of two big anti-union firms, Kimberly Clark Corp. and the Charmin Paper Co., makers of Pampers and other products.

Delegates also approved minimum dues of $6 a month for all local unions, authorized sizable donations for members on strike, and voted more funds for the union's political education program.

Among convention speakers were AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, Director Al Barkan of the Committee on Political Education; Pres. Alexander Rohan of the Printing Pressmen; Pres. Thomas E. Boyle of the Chemical Workers; Pres. Louis LaBerge of the Quebec Federation of Labor; Sec.-Gen. Charles Levinson, International Federation of Chemical & General Workers, and David Lewis, leader of Canada's New Democratic Party.

Rohan said the freeze gave employers "everything they wanted" and "everything the workers needed was denied." He predicted that, at the end of the 90-day freeze period, the Administration will come up with "something further to hamstring or weaken unions."

Tonelli suggested innovations to reduce the effect of joblessness on those able and willing to work. One might be the eventual switching of the national workweek from 40 hours to two 24-hour work periods to spread employment opportunities, he told the convention.

Nixon Health Program Branded as 'Fraud'

Spokane, Wash.—Delegates to the 14th annual Washington AFL-CIO convention heard the Nixon plan for National Health Security branded as a fraud and scheme that would only "make sure that doctors are well provided for" and make a "lot of insurance companies healthy."

AFL-CIO Social Security Director Burt Seidman warned the delegates to beware of health security proposals advanced by the Administration, doctors and insurance companies because there are "various programs" called Health Security and cautioned that the only one acceptable to labor is the Kennedy-Griffiths bill.

He called a program favored by the American Medical Association a "federally subsidized Marcus Welby" and declared that the insurance lobbies wish to insure only people who never get sick.

Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) told the convention that unemployment would be a "crucial factor" in the 1972 presidential election and that the Nixon freeze would be equitable only if "amended to halt increasing dividends and interest rates."

In other action, convention delegates:

- Went on record opposing the Nixon freeze as unwise, unfair, untimely and ineffective without an accompanying freeze on profits and interest rates.
- Raised the per capita tax on local unions from 15 cents to 20 cents per month.
- Urged adoption of the National Health Security Act.
- Called for extension of emergency unemployment compensation benefits.
- Declared support for "no-fault" auto insurance.
- Called for an increase in federal and state minimum wage laws to $2.50 an hour.

The Washington convention also joined the list of state central bodies which have provided for holding conventions biennially instead of annually.

The move, aimed at reducing operating costs, will go into effect in 1973.

Executive Board member George Holloman died of an apparent heart attack at the convention while addressing the Constitution Committee. He had previously announced he would not be a candidate for re-election because of health reasons.

Factory Jobs Decline:

6.1% Jobless Rate Near 9-Year High

freeze, it became apparent from Cost of Living Council rulings that some prices would not be regulated and could increase.

For the first time in months, Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson and other Nixon Administration spokesmen did not hail the unemployment figures as good news. But Hodgson indicated that the Administration planned to use the jobless figures as a lever in Congress to get favorable action on Pres. Nixon's new economic proposals.

"Certainly the job situation today reflects the need for stimulative actions called for by the President in his new economic program," he said.

It has been Pres. Nixon's contention that a 10-percent capital investment tax write-off for business will mean businesses will expand, thus making more jobs available.

But Hodgson, when pressed by reporters, said he couldn't predict how much, or how soon the unemployment rate would drop if Congress enacted the President's plan.

Robert Nathan, a noted economist who helped plan the World War II stabilization program, told the Joint Economic Committee of Congress that the unemployment level might remain the same for some time because the Administration's program is "inadequate as well as inequitable."

The jobless rate for all adult men, which accounted for about half of the rise in the number of unemployed, edged up from 4.3 percent to 4.5 percent in August—equalling peak levels reached in late 1970 and last Spring.

The BLS said the principal factor here was the layoff of steelworkers due to reduced orders from steel users who had built up huge strike-hedge inventories.

The jobless rate for adult women, at 5.8 percent showed little change, but the rate for youths in the 16-19 age bracket jumped eight-tenths of a point to 17 percent in August.

The over-the-month increase in unemployment occurred entirely among white workers, the BLS said. Their rate advanced from 5.3 percent to 5.6 percent in August. The rate for Negroes and other races showed little change from the previous months, and stood at 9.8 percent.

The BLS reported that over the year ending in August, the civilian labor force has expanded by 1.6 million, while employment has risen 700,000. More than one-third of this increase represents men in the 20-24 age group entering the job market directly from the armed services.

The unemployment rate for Vietnam-era veterans in the 20-29 age group stood at 8.4 percent in August, with a total of 320,000 unemployed. This was about the same number as July but 120,000 more than a year ago.

The jobless rate for nonveterans in the same age group stood at 7 percent in August.

The average workweek for all rank-and-file workers on private nonfarm payrolls edged up by one-tenth of 1 hour to 37 hours in August.

The small rise in August resulted mainly from a large increase in the average hours worked in transportation and public utilities, and this in turn reflected a return to normal work schedules in the telephone industry.

Factory overtime stood at 2.8 hours, off one-tenth of an hour from July. Overtime hours have moved between 2.8 and 3 hours since January, the BLS said.

Average hourly earnings of rank-and-file workers were $3.44 in August, up 2 cents from July. Hourly earnings were up 19 cents, or 5.8 percent over a year ago.

Average weekly earnings increased by $1.43 over the month to $129, as a result of increases in both the workweek and in earnings. Compared with August 1970, weekly earnings were up by $6.80, or 5.6 percent.

During the 12-month period ended in July, the Consumer Price Index had risen 4.4 percent.

Garment Union Wins 6-Year Battle As Kellwood Signs First Contract

Little Rock, Ark.—A six-year fight for union contract protections was won by the Ladies' Garment Workers with the signing of their first agreement with the Kellwood Corp., maker of women's clothing for Sears Roebuck and other retail merchants.

More than 1,000 Kellwood workers in four plants overcame a massive company anti-union campaign through an organizing drive, a representation election, fruitless negotiations, a 13-month strike, long court ordeals and National Labor Relations Board hearings delayed by company appeals all the way to the Supreme Court.

ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg called the agreement "a major event in the contemporary history of our union."

Members of the ILGWU executive board rose to their feet and cheered when Vice Pres. Frederick R. Siems reported the settlement at a recent board meeting in San Francisco. Siems said Kellwood workers ratified the first contract concluded after five months of intensive negotiations.

The contract calls for a base wage rate of $2.75 an hour and a three-step wage increase of 50 cents an hour, payable when the Nixon wage freeze is lifted. Union and management both announced they will "cooperate fully" to make the agreement effective "as soon as possible."

They said in a joint statement that the settlement "establishes a foundation for future harmonious relations" between Kellwood and the union in Little Rock.

The contract also improves health benefits, pensions and life insurance, major medical coverage, eight paid holidays, and a "good" grievance and arbitration procedure.

The drive to win union contract conditions began in 1965. The employes voted for ILGWU, 666-564, in a January 1966 NLRB election. After four months of unproductive negotiations and a 392-day strike, Kellwood balked at rehiring hundreds of returned strikers and the union filed unfair practice charges. An NLRB decision sustained the charges in 1969. The way toward bargaining was cleared when the Supreme Court refused to review an appeals court decision upholding the union last Apr. 5.

Under NLRB and court rulings, the company is liable for backpay of about $1 million for 850 to 900 workers, the ILGWU reported.

Negotiated Increases Average 8.3% in '71

Union-negotiated wage and benefit gains in the first half of 1971 came to 8.3 percent a year averaged over the life of the contracts, the Labor Dept. reported in a summary of major collective bargaining settlements.

First-year improvements considered alone averaged 10.4 percent for all industries, the summary showed.

Both figures were off somewhat from 1970 levels—down from an average of 9.1 percent over the full term and from 13.1 percent for first-year gains.

The drop, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, may not signify a long-term downward trend because each quarter-year "tends to be dominated by a different industry" in bargaining.

Major settlements in the January through June period—those covering units of 1,000 or more—affected 1.3 million workers. They included key agreements in the aluminum, can, automobile, railroad, apparel and farm implement industries. Contracts covering an additional 3.4 million workers will expire in the last half of the year.

Wage increases alone averaged 8 percent a year over the life of the contracts, down from the 1970 average of 8.9 percent, the study showed.

The average wage increase in manufacturing industry settlements was 6.4 percent, up slightly from 1970. Contracts in nonmanufacturing averaged 10.8 percent—lower than last year's 11.5 percent, partly because of the inclusion in the 1971 first-half report of only nine construction industry settlements covering 35,000 workers.

The report pointed out that relatively large settlements for nearly 700,000 construction workers contributed heavily to the higher nonmanufacturing averages reported for 1970.

For construction alone, 1971 settlements in the first half averaged 14 percent over the full term for wages and benefits combined, as against 15.6 percent for the full year of 1970. First-year improvements are running at a 13.1 percent rate compared with 19.6 percent for all of last year.

Regional Director Singleton Retires

Atlanta—Labor friends launched "Olly" Singleton on a new career—retirement—at a surprise banquet attended by 300 associates here.

AFL-CIO Regional Director Oliver W. Singleton took early retirement after a 31-year union career as a coal miner, central body officer, organizer, and overseas representative of the merged labor movement in Europe.

A special feature of the banquet was the attendance of Walter Waddy, who succeeded Singleton as Baltimore regional director; James Sala, Singleton's successor in the Atlanta region, and other unionists.

Wage Abuses Scored In Service Contracts

A study by a House subcommittee has backed up labor charges that employes of firms under contract to provide services to federal installations are being denied the protections intended by a law passed in 1965.

The subcommittee's report confirms complaints made by four unions at hearings last spring. The report says that the Service Contract Act of 1965 is being interpreted in such a way as "to substantially thwart the intent of Congress."

The law was designed to protect the wages and working conditions of several hundred thousand workers who provide such services as laundry, cleaning, security guards and cafeteria work.

At the heart of the problem, the report said, is a ruling by the General Accounting Office that "prevailing wage rates" may not take into account pay increases negotiated for the immediate future.

This has the effect of locking the employes into the same wage they received the previous year, or as Rep. James G. O'Hara described it, "the same lousy, inadequate wages that prompted the enactment of the law" in the first place.

In its report, the House Special Subcommittee on Labor said that "failing corrective action by the agencies involved, new legislation will have to be enacted to tighten up" the law.

The report cites the U.S. Postal Service, the Air Force and NASA as prime offenders and says that since the Labor Dept. so quickly accepted the GAO ruling, the working conditions of such service workers are rapidly falling victim to the same "fly-by-night contractors, fierce competition and wage undercutting" which the 1965 law was designed to prevent.

Specific examples cited by the Laborers, Service Employes, Government Employes, National Maritime Union and other witnesses were noted in the committee report.

Since there is little expenditure for anything other than labor by the service contractors, wage undercutting tends to be especially prevalent in the service contracts, the subcommittee pointed out.

The subcommittee's report also criticized:

- The inconsistency of the Labor Dept. in accepting and invoking the GAO's "prospective wage increase" decision when it would not accept such GAO rulings as the Comptroller General's decision that the Administration's Philadelphia Plan was illegal because it called for racial quotas on federal construction projects.
- The apparent lax enforcement of the 1965 Service Contract Act since in the last three years, only 21 firms have been barred from federal contracts for unfair labor practices.
- The Postal Service's decision to discontinue comparing the wages paid star route drivers to other drivers and instead treating them as a separate class. This has the effect of tieing their wages to what they were paid last year rather than to the prevailing wage rate in the area.
- NASA's toleration of wage cuts of up to 50 percent for 1,100 Cape Kennedy employes after Boeing replaced TWA as the service contractor and refused to honor the Machinists' existing contract with TWA.

The Public Interest

ON THIS LABOR DAY 1971, American workers and their unions are profoundly disturbed by the new direction Pres. Nixon has established for the nation.

In the controversy over his wage and price freeze too few have observed one of the major elements of the President's program.

In brief, what he proposes is a radical redistribution of the nation's wealth in favor of the rich and at the expense of the public interest.

Organized labor, in registering its vigorous objections to the new Nixon game plan, gave major attention to this aspect of the program. Unfortunately, most public discussion of our objections has centered on our charges that the freeze itself is unequitable, unjust, unfair and unworkable.

Obviously we stand by those charges. But I want to underscore our objections to that part of the program that has received far too little attention in the press and on radio and television.

In effect, the President proposes a grossly unfair and one-sided redistribution of the public wealth. For those who have much, the President proposes more. For those who have little, the President proposes less.

His action is in the tradition of every big business-oriented Administration this nation has had. It would reverse the progress made by every Administration that has placed the public good ahead of private gain.

America's needs, in this last third of the 20th Century, are overwhelmingly public needs.

The $70 billion the President would give big business over the next 10 years—$37 billion in already ordered depreciation allowances and the balance in his new proposals—should be used to meet the needs that actually exist. What are these needs?

America needs schools and hospitals, parks and recreation areas.

America needs a vast expansion of medical facilities and medical personnel.

America needs 25 million new housing units.

America needs new, efficient, low-cost transit systems in every major city.

America needs new waste-disposal systems, new technology and new hardware to extract poisons from the air, the water and the soil.

There is a backlog of unfinished business that would require the full use of America's giant industrial capacity, and the full employment of every worker, as far ahead as anyone can see.

What America needs most is jobs. Americans need incomes and purchasing power to enable them to buy the things industry could make if it was operating at full capacity.

That is why the labor movement is calling for public funds to be used in the public interest, to build a better America for all Americans. This is a battle we have been waging for a very long time.

And on Labor Day 1971 we want our fellow Americans to know that we will continue to fight until tax justice and economic justice are achieved within the framework of a government that functions in behalf of all of the American people.

'Lemme Out, I'm Getting Sicker!'

A Word Edgewise:

States Still Rely for Revenue On 'Sock-the-Poor' Tax Policy

By John P. Roche

THE RECENT TAX CAPER in Connecticut highlighted one of the real ironies of American government—the persistent rejection by the majority of a tax system that would operate in its best interest. The Connecticut sequence, in abbreviated form, went roughly as follows:

First, the state was broke and the Republican governor called on the Democratic legislature to do something about it.

Second, after a series of maneuvers that defy description, the legislature adopted a moderate income tax as an alternative to a monster jump in the sales tax.

Third, the governor let it become law, but issued a statement denouncing it.

Fourth, unshirted hell broke loose among the good citizens of the Nutmeg State, legislators went into hiding, and then the solons reconvened in special session to reconsider.

During their Byzantine labors they repealed the income tax, raised the sales tax to 6.5 percent (highest in the nation), and laid on a whole set of Mickey Mouse excises. Allegedly the Democrats hoped the governor (who had been demanding a 7.5 percent sales tax to meet revenue needs) would veto their new offering, thus leaving the income tax in operation. Then they could blame the governor for the income tax which they yet realize in their hearts is the only responsible reaction. The governor, however, let them down.

To go into this labyrinth any further would require an Ariadne so let us leave the good citizens of Connecticut and move to the general proposition which their behavior documents. The American people have a perverse passion for regressive taxation, that is, for "sock-the-poor" tax remedies.

The same thing occurred on a less dramatic scale in Massachusetts. We have what poses as an "income tax," though in fact it is a flat excise on income with virtually no progressive features. It will take an amendment to the Constitution of the Commonwealth to authorize a progressive income tax, and the electorate in its wisdom has twice rejected such an amendment: by 8-1 in 1962 and 3-1 in 1968.

So the legislature each year has to dream up fancy tricks to raise the money we need. Now there happens to be one fancy trick that would inject a really progressive element into the system: forbid the federal tax deduction.

As things now stand, one can deduct his federal income tax outlay from gross income for state purposes and—since the federal tax is progressive—this means that those in the higher income brackets get a massive break by comparison with their less well situated fellow citizens.

TO BE SPECIFIC, the man who pays $20,000 a year federal tax gets exactly the same exemption as the man who pays $500. Each deducts his federal tax from gross income for state computations. To turn it around, net income subject to state tax would increase by $20,000 in the first case; by $500 in the second.

But no—the legislature avoids this common sense injection of the equitable principle and, instead, sits around inventing new regressive taxes, raising the sales tax, and generally playing games.

On the national level, while we do have a progressive income tax (with incredible loopholes for the rich), there is also one of the most apalling regressive taxes, one designed brilliantly to hit rich and poor alike: the social security tax. Everybody covered pays 5.2 percent on the first $7,800 of his income—whether he makes $8,000 a year, or $80,000.

Here then we have the paradox: a dreadfully inequitable tax structure imposed and retained by majority rule, truly a self-inflicted wound. And at a time when every aspect of our economy seems to be under scrutiny and everybody seems worried about deficits, no major politician has made the rational and obvious proposal: "Soak the rich!"

The 'Decline and Fall' Set:

'Intellectual' Critics of Unions Could Use Lesson in Humility

By Msgr. George G. Higgins

FOR SOME TIME NOW I have made a hobby of collecting statements by liberal or ex-liberal intellectuals on the alleged decline and fall of the American labor movement. During the past year alone I must have come across at least a dozen such statements in learned books and articles. Frankly, there is a monotonous sameness about all of them—so much so that one almost gets the impression that their authors are cribbing from one another in technical violation of the copyright laws.

That is to say, with slight variations in style and emphasis, all of them end up saying pretty much the same thing, namely, that the American labor movement, having lost its pristine fervor and militancy, has gone the way of all flesh and has sold out, lock, stock and barrel, to the economic and political Establishment.

By way of example, let me cite two statements of this type published within the past month or so. The first, from an otherwise excellent book on the future of radical politics in the United States, reads in part as follows:

"The unions in general have become profoundly conservative organizations. . . . (They) have become pillars of the Establishment, and it is not surprising that this is so. . . . Once the workingman has won a position of basic economic security and reasonable expectations, he has considerably more reason to be conservative on social issues than the middle-class executive or professional man with investments or unearned income.

"For the workingman, everything could be jeopardized by radical change. Thus George Meany—and Harold Wilson—and even such old-line European Communist chieftains as Jacques Duclos . . . are perfectly appropriate leaders of their movements, faithful to their working-class followers." (Condemned to Freedom, William Pfaff).

The second statement, from a new book on today's youth culture, also alleges—you might say it takes it for granted as a self-evident truth—that organized labor in this country has become completely reactionary. The author of this second statement then proceeds to prophesy, with amazing self-assurance, that within the next few decades "Labor will cease to be a political or social force; instead it will take on a shared role in management." (Generation of Narcissus, Henry Malcolm).

Maybe so, but I must report that, by strange coincidence, within 48 hours after I had read these two statements almost all of the major unions in the United States, with George Meany acting as their spokesman (the same George Meany whom so many doctrinaire intellectuals delight in caricaturing as a kind of Neanderthal man) launched a vigorous attack on certain key sections of the Administration's new economic program and threatened to tear up their existing collective bargaining agreements if the present emergency wage-price freeze is extended beyond 90 days.

Indeed it would be much closer to the truth to say—as at least one nationally syndicated labor columnist has already stated—that it's probably the most serious confrontation between a President of the United States and the American labor movement in this century.

THE POINT IS that the time has come, in this writer's judgment, for some of labor's more doctrinaire critics in the intellectual community to reexamine their own rhetoric and, at the same time, get ready to swallow their pride and to eat a little crow for a change. It won't hurt them a bit to do so and, hopefully, will teach them a lesson in humility.

The first of the two statements referred to above is all too typical in this regard. The author of this statement gives too much credit to "middle-class intellectuals" (many of whom admittedly made a great contribution to the cause) and far too little credit to the uneducated working class leaders who built the American labor movement from the ground up and at the cost of enormous personal sacrifice.

In this connection, there is no doubt in my mind that George Meany, for example, would get a much better break from some of his critics in the intelligentsia if he were a graduate of Harvard or Yale—or, better still, the London School of Economics.

The fact that he is a plumber by trade (and a high school dropout at that) seems to rub some of his intellectual critics the wrong way, and this not merely because they happen to disagree with him (as I do myself) on the issue of Vietnam, for example, but also because they can't seem to reconcile themselves to the fact that a man who didn't even finish high school holds far more power and wields far more influence than they do in American society.

This isn't true of all of labor's intellectual critics, but, on the basis of my own personal experience and my own reading, I would have to say that it's most certainly true of some of them.

Lastly, some of labor's critics in the intelligentsia and in the Administration make the fatal mistake of assuming that labor's elected representatives really don't speak for the rank and file.

The Administration, to my amazement, fell into this trap with an awful thud in its initial response to George Meany's blast at the President's economic program. Both the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of the Treasury (neither of whom can possibly claim to speak for the working people of this country) were foolish enough to try to undermine Mr. Meany's leadership by going over his head to the rank and file. This was an awkward ploy on their part. It failed miserably, of course.

Administration Slips Up:

Watchdog Role for Labor Vital In Enforcing Job Safety Law

UNIONS MUST TAKE a "continuous watchdog role" to assure full and effective implementation of the new federal job safety law, George H. R. Taylor, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, declared.

"If we don't, we're lost," Taylor warned, stressing that the Administration has made little real progress in putting the new law into operation, although it has been in effect since last April.

Pointing out that the pace of reported job-related deaths and injuries, now at an annual rate of nearly 3 million, still shows no sign of abating, he said the labor movement is "far from satisfied" with federal action under the new law to date, especially in the areas of inspector-recruitment and training, and the scope and effective dates of safety standards.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, Taylor said that a "lack of cooperation between the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and the Dept. of Labor in carrying out their joint functions under this act" is slowing implementation of long-sought new protections against health and safety hazards.

Taylor said that the administrative structure created to implement and enforce the new law is heavily weighted with people from industry and government. "Most of the regional directors of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration are either from the Dept. of Labor itself, without any particular prior experience in the field of safety, or they're from a state program or from industry." He said "there's not one person who has any labor orientation at all in any regional office."

Taylor, who is also one of two union representatives on the Advisory Committee to the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, said the make-up of that body does not reflect the "equal representation" of labor and management required by the statute.

WHEN THE Nixon Administration came to power in 1969, the American business community looked happily forward to a regime that would "put labor in its place," would crack down on wage boosts that were deemed "excessive" and would clamp down on a National Labor Relations Board that was "pro-labor."

It didn't get its way all at once, but slowly and surely the Republican White House victory in the 1968 election is showing results.

The Nixon wage-price freeze has been described as a 180 degree turn in policy. This is true only in the sense that the public posture of the President has been to avoid mandatory controls. But in a larger sense there has never been any doubt that the President's thinking on how to divide the American economic pie has been along business lines rather than labor lines.

The NLRB now has two extremely conservative new members, one of them chairman, appointed by Nixon. A third seat on the five-man board is now open and a Nixon majority will shortly exist. So satisfactory has this development been to business in general, that even the U.S. Chamber of Commerce has subdued its demands that the board be abolished and labor-management relations be turned over to the courts.

Last spring the Nixon Administration, despite its assurances that it would never violate free enterprise principles and free collective bargaining—it wasn't even going to resort to "jawboning"—cracked down on the construction unions and set up its Construction Industry Stabilization Committee that passes judgment on wage agreements in the construction industry.

Now the President has unleashed his "wage-price freeze" that for 90 days freezes wages with no ifs, ands or buts, puts a freeze that is already filled with loopholes on prices, and does nothing but utter pious sentiments regarding profits, dividends and interest rates.

THE FREEZE is the first time that the United States has applied controls over the nation's economy and especially on the collective bargaining process in peacetime.

Phase II of the new Nixon Economic Policy is due Nov. 14 when the current freeze comes to an end. Already Administration planners are working on justifications for what the President did and for further justifications on what they expect him to do. What clearly comes through is a determination to blame wages for a "cost-push" inflation.

This is what is being done by the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee. It will be applied so far as possible to the national pattern of wage bargaining.

Republican economists have said repeatedly that many of today's wage settlements are "too high." They are now saying that strong and bold measures are needed to slow down the upward trend in wages justifying government intervention. They concede that whatever controls are used, they should be transitional and that prices, too, should be held down.

But, in their arguments now going on behind the curtains, they say nothing about the hard facts that American wages today are lagging behind the rising cost of living and that many of the so-called "excessive" wage settlements have barely—if at all—redressed the balance.

Nor do their arguments include the inflationary pressures of profits and dividends and the outrageous rise in interest rates. As they did during the Hoover and Eisenhower Administrations, they talk in terms of the "old trickle down" theories of discarded economics.

It has taken three years for the Nixon Administration to get around to it. But its war on wages is now well advanced. It remains to be seen how far it will go in Phase II of the "freeze," but already it is clear that the political decision has been made to continue.

A WATCHDOG ROLE by unions will be the key to full and effective use of the new federal job safety law to protect workers from on-the-job hazards, George Taylor, center, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Harry Conn, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine.

Nixon Puts Load on Poor, Workers

The following is excerpted from an interview with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany on Sept. 2, 1971, in Washington with Damon Stetson, New York Times; Neil Gilbride, Associated Press; Archie Robinson, U.S. News and World Report; Murray Seeger, Los Angeles Times; Tom Coman, Bureau of National Affairs; Don Finley, United Press International; Frank Porter, Washington Post; Byron Calame, Wall Street Journal.

LABOR'S OPPOSITION to Pres. Nixon's inequitable economic freeze is spelled out by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany for labor reporters representing leading newspapers, magazines and wire services during a pre-Labor Day interview.

WE OPPOSE this freeze and the terms of this freeze, not so much on the question of putting restraints on wages and prices for a period of three months—that is the least of our problem. What people forget is that on the night of Aug. 15, the President came up with a program, not just the question of the freeze on wages and prices for 90 days. If that was all he had done—freeze wages and prices for 90 days with provision for some sort of conferences to determine what would happen afterwards—we would have said "amen" because, in the final analysis, we were advocating restraints on wages and prices.

But, on the night of Aug. 15, he went much further than his authority under the Act of Congress, and he laid out a program which covered the whole waterfront, in a sense.

His idea was that after the freeze on wages and prices, the thing to do was to have a prosperous economy. And the way to have a prosperous economy was to give big business a bribe of some kind. In other words, to make it profitable for them to go along.

So, he came up with a $3 billion investment tax credit, which he referred to as "job development," on the theory that the way to increase jobs was to give business more money.

Now, in addition to the $3 billion for business, he came up with the income tax proposal of moving forward the additional exemption that we were to get in January of 1973—to bring it forward to January of 1972. And this would result in a reduction of income to the federal government of $1.1 billion. So, on top of the $3 billion and $1.1 billion, this meant a reduction of $4.1 billion in income for the fiscal year 1972.

Then he recommended the repeal of the 7 percent excise tax on automobiles. To offset that, he put a surcharge on imports, which would just about offset that.

So, the net result was that he had a $4.2 billion deficit in his income for fiscal 1972. So he had to go out and offset that—at least if he wanted to keep the budget in balance for 1972.

So he went out to offset it. Now, remember, he gives $3 billion to business; he gives $1 billion to the American taxpayer by moving the higher exemption forward, which would result in a savings of $57 for a normal family of four in calendar year 1972. But the $3 billion was for business, to encourage expansion on the theory that expansion meant additional jobs. This was on top of $3.7 billion he gave business—the same people—last January by accelerated depreciation write-offs.

But he had to find somebody to pay for the second $3 billion and the $1 billion for the ordinary taxpayer. So he turned to the federal employes and he announced a postponement of the wage increase which they had been promised under the comparability standard to take place on Jan. 1, 1972, and he postponed that for six months. And that represented a saving of $1.3 billion.

Then he went to the welfare reform program, which he had been advocating very, very strenuously and he postponed it and he put a figure on it—these figures are all his figures, they are not mine—he put a figure on welfare reform of $1.1 billion saved.

And then he went to revenue sharing—another thing that he has been advocating and again he comes up with a postponement. Again, with a saving of a billion dollars. And then he decides on a 5 percent cutback in federal employment, which saves him $500 million and then he has some additional revenue sharing which he is also going to postpone, which adds up to $700 million. So, the net result is that he has a $4.2 billion reduction in income for 1972 and he comes up with a $4.7 billion savings by cutbacks.

The $3 billion goes to business, on top of the $3.7 billion that they got earlier in the year, and to pay for that he goes to the government workers, he goes to the poor—he takes from the poor, from the welfare program which he advocated—and he takes from the cities which he said in the past were in dire need of federal help and so on.

So, the overall picture is of a President doing everything he can to encourage business, bribing them, in effect, with tax gimmicks but taking the cost of it out of the federal government employe, the cities and their needs and out of the poor and the whole country.

This is the basis for our position right from the start, that this action on the part of the President was discriminatory. Of course, this has been interpreted by Administration spokesmen as opposition to wage and price controls.

That is complete nonsense. We have been saying that we felt the only way we could stop this inflationary splurge was by putting on restraints of some kind.

We didn't change our mind when the President made this announcement. We still feel this is the way to go, but we felt that, looking at the whole package, he was putting the load on the poor people, the load on workers. Actually, in a sense, it was Robin Hood in reverse—he is robbing the poor to help the rich.

The argument that the President has used and his supporters have used was that he couldn't, in advance, say that he was going to go into a freeze. But, I say, he could have said on Aug. 15 that we are freezing wages and prices for the next 90 days or less and we are immediately going to call a conference of all interested parties—labor, business and so on—to try to work out some system for a short time—a year or so—to keep prices somewhere within range.

If he had done that, the AFL-CIO would have had to buy that and would have bought it immediately. There is no question about that because of what we were advocating. As late as Sunday, July 11, I stated, without question, on national television talking about controls (and, of course, I always said "if the President makes this decision; it is his decision") and one of the panelists asked, "If you were President, what decision would you make at this time?" I said I would put on controls of some sort immediately.

If he had just put on a wage and price freeze until such time as we got into it, he would not have had objections, providing he was going to call in the interested parties and discuss the whole question.

It is more or less normal, I suppose, for myself to think back to 1941—the War Labor Board days. Now, what happened in the War Labor Boards days?

Labor and management had a 2½-day meeting over at the Federal Reserve Building under the auspices of the federal government—in the sense that they suggested the conference be called. We had two moderators—one was Will Davis, who had been chairman up until that time of the so-called National Defense Mediation Board which preceded the War Labor Board, and we had Sen. Elbert Thomas of Utah. We spent 2½ days—we wrangled about a lot of things—but at the end we had agreed on three principal objectives. One, there wouldn't be any strike or lockout during the war. Two, that there be machinery set up to settle disputes, peacefully, without a strike or lockout. And, three, that the President of the United States should set that machinery up, using the powers of his office.

And that is exactly what happened. Within a very few days after receiving that message from the conference, the President set up the National War Labor Board. Now, from that point on, there was no government in the picture for several years. The War Labor Board made its own rules, its own ground rules, its own decisions. Of course, its one objective and its one requirement was that it keep things going—that it settle disputes in Washington rather than in the field by strike or lockout.

WE MERELY SAY to this Administration: we will cooperate with anything that is fair and equitable. If they come up with a plan similar to the War Labor Board plan, I would say that would be a fair and equitable plan and we would buy it. But anything else they may come up with would be subject to scrutiny, to see what it was all about.

The one plan I don't think will work is if they are going to bring management and labor in for some sort of window-dressing and leave the power in the Dept. of Justice or leave it in the hands of Governor Connally or Arnie Weber or somebody like that. That we won't buy because we are not going to go into that sort of a swindle. If there is going to be government control, it is going to be direct. It is not going to be camouflaged by saying we have a labor-management setup.

Workers involved, who have these contracts (deferred wage increases) and have these raises coming, I would say that I wouldn't buy any system that would freeze them out permanently. I would say they have a right to look for that money. I think it is their money. And while the President may freeze it, I don't think he has the right to take it away from them.

You realize a lot of these contracts are give and take. Take the railroads. The railroad unions have deferred raises coming up in October, November and so on, and those raises are based on a collective bargaining arrangement where they had to give up something in return for this money. Now, in most cases, they gave up work rules. Of course you can say what you like about work rules—they were feather-bedding, they were archaic and so on. But they represented something of value to these workers. And they had to give them up and they gave them up in return for a wage increase. Now along comes the President and he nullifies this wage increase—he doesn't nullify the other terms of the agreement.

I say, as far as I'm concerned, those unions are going to fight to get that money—retroactively or any other way, despite what this council says—this council says that there can be no bargaining after the freeze for what you lost during the freeze. Well, this is absolute nonsense. How the hell can they tell anyone, if the freeze is off. You go in and you bargain. And you bargain for any damn thing you think you can get.

Reporter: If you could sum up the Nixon presidency, how would you do it?

Meany: Well he has done what he said he would do on the Vietnamese war. He tried to wind it down. I think he had an intelligent approach there. I think it has worked so far. I think it is endangered, of course, by his effort to win over Red China. I think, outside of that, that is the only plus he has.

I think everything else is a failure. I think everything he has tried to do is a failure. He didn't give us the jobs. He didn't cool off the economy or halt inflation. He is still the handmaiden of big business as he has always been. I don't think there has been any change in that.

I think that he is still the same old Nixon who feels that the only way to have a prosperous America is to keep the big corporations fat and prosperous. All of the things that he professed an interest in, of a social nature, he seems ready to let go down the drain in order to keep big business happy.

Nixon Program Denounced As Biased Against Workers holding of financial assistance for cities and states.

All America will be short-changed by the Administration's action, Meany said. "In effect," he stressed, "the President proposes a grossly unfair and one-sided redistribution of the public wealth. For those who have much, the President proposed more. For those who have little, the President proposes less."

The money that Nixon would give big business over the next decade should be used to meet the public needs that already exist, Meany said. He cited schools, hospitals, parks, housing, mass transit and waste disposal systems and other vital needs.

"Instead of cutting back investment in these areas," Meany urged that "America should vastly increase it." He also suggested that the nation's unused industrial capacity and unemployed manpower should be converted to meet these needs that have been long ignored.

Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, speaking on Mutual network stations, said the Administration's new economic controls will not work because they are not balanced and not applied even-handedly.

"Workers ask for fairness, equity and equality be restored," Kirkland stressed. "We pledge to do our share to build America—just as we have always done. But we will not—and we cannot—carry the load alone."

He pointed out that workers had to carry the burden of the Administration's previous economic game plan which had failed to halt inflation and caused unemployment to double.

Kirkland said the new game plan is called by economists the "trickle down" theory. The plan is to "give the corporations all the profits they want and somehow the little fellow will make out all right."

"The President," Kirkland noted, "asked the American people for sacrifices, but he made sure that the sacrifices were not equal."

Kirkland said the AFL-CIO is insisting that fairness and equity must be at the root of any policy the government imposes on the economy.

Federation Vice Pres. I. W. Abel pointed out that labor was sounding the alarm for the past two and one-half years that Administration policies had put the economy on a crash course.

Appearing on the CBS radio network, Abel said that "the President himself, in announcing the wage freeze, admitted that his game plan had been a failure—although he did not actually say so."

The American people have a strong sense of fair play and firmly believe in equal sacrifice when the nation is confronted with a crisis, Abel said.

"But Pres. Nixon's new game plan does not meet those traditional American tests," he observed. While it freezes wages and prohibits cost of living adjustments, Abel noted, interest rates, profits and dividends are left untouched.

Labor must be given a voice in the development of any future long-range incomes policy, Abel said.

"The manner in which labor agreements were virtually nullified under the 90-day freeze is both alien to our democracy and dangerous in its implications. Labor has every right to insist that the terms of negotiated contracts are safeguarded under any stabilization program," Abel stressed.

Vice Pres. Floyd Smith, in his radio address on the American Broadcasting Co. network, questioned the reasoning behind the wage freeze that was imposed at a time when purchasing power of workers has been steadily slipping and individual productivity climbing.

And while Nixon placed a 10 percent tariff on imports, Smith noted that the President "didn't raise a finger to stop huge multinational corporations from fattening their profits by exporting American jobs—along with American capital and technology" to low-wage countries.

"If the President really wants to help the American economy," Smith said, "let him issue an order that will prohibit American manufacturers who pay 14 cents an hour wages from selling sweatshop goods in the American market."

Fair Stabilization Plan Keyed to Labor's Role

Rukeyser, ABC News economic editor, asked Meany if labor would go along with a voluntary ban on strikes now.

"If we had a part in setting it up, drawing the ground rules and we agreed, I am quite sure we would give that pledge," Meany said.

But he underscored the fact that Pres. Roosevelt had provided a mechanism for grievance settlement when the no-strike pledge was given during the war.

Meany said that if labor and management and the public are not given the opportunity for a voluntary system, the Administration may end up with a wage-price review board with enforcement by the Dept. of Justice through the courts.

"That is the first step toward fascism to me. That is the first step toward real control. And my experience indicates that if government embarks on that road there will be no turning back.

"They will get deeper and deeper into that sort of thing, and I don't think management wants that, and I don't think labor wants that."

Meany made similar points during a traditional pre-Labor Day interview with Washington labor reporters. (Partial text, Page 6.)

And he reiterated the AFL-CIO position that Pres. Nixon does not have the power to nullify legal contracts by freezing previously negotiated pay increases during the 90-day period.

"It will mean millions of dollars that will go into the pockets of the other party to the collective bargaining agreement."

"For instance, the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks figure that beginning Oct. 1, they will lose $304,000 a day right through the rest of the freeze, money coming to them under a contract they signed with the railroads. That $304,000 a day doesn't go into the public treasury. It doesn't go to some charity or some good will organization," said Meany, emphasizing that the money goes in management's pocket.

Meany said labor would present its program to Congress Sept. 13, and said in response to specific questions, "we will ask Congress not to give this tax bonanza to the business community."

"We'll ask Congress not to nullify or allow the President to nullify the federal government employes' wage increase."

President Sets Post-Freeze Planning Talks

"system of wage and price stabilization that follows the freeze will require the fullest possible cooperation" of all Americans.

He said that in addition to meeting with various groups at the White House he had directed the members of the Cost of Living Council to continue meeting with representatives of "all other interested groups."

The address reviewed the program announced on Aug. 15, called on Congress for priority action on the tax portions of the program and laid out some long-term tax and job goals for the next session of Congress.

As to the second phase of the wage-price stabilization, the President told the joint session that "nothing would be more detrimental . . . than to put the nation's great, strong, free enterprise system in a permanent straitjacket of government controls."

He added that "price and wage stabilization, in whatever form it takes, must be only a way-station on the road to free markets and free collective bargaining in a new prosperity without war."

Jerry Lewis to Receive '71 Murray-Green Award

Jerry Lewis will be the 1971 recipient of the Murray-Green award—the AFL-CIO's highest honor. His selection was announced by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany during the annual Jerry Lewis telethon for muscular dystrophy.

The award is named for Philip Murray, late president of the CIO, and William Green, late president of the AFL.

It is made annually, Meany said, for "significant contributions to building America."

Meany hailed the Lewis telethon as "one of the most heart-warming traditions of television" and told union members that it "richly deserves the support of each of us and all of us." AFL-CIO Vice-Pres. Frederick O'Neal serves as labor chairman of the telethon which this year raised $8,125,387 in pledges and contributions.

The award and a check for $5,000 will be presented to Lewis at the AFL-CIO Convention in November.

BLS Says Price Boosts Possible Despite Freeze

Although wages are solidly frozen until at least Nov. 13, workers may be digging deeper into their pockets despite what is supposed to be an accompanying price freeze.

Labor has warned that prices are likely to go up under Pres. Nixon's program because of exemptions and loopholes in the freeze, and a lack of machinery to enforce it. Now, the Labor Dept. also concedes that there may be future rises in the Consumer Price Index, even though some of its reasoning is different.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics said that although the August price index is not due until Sept. 22 "it is not too early to point out that the price freeze will not necessarily produce an unchanged index."

Converting that "double negative" into a positive statement, BLS is saying that there may be changes in August even though there's no certainty about "which direction the index will take, or whether it will move at all."

The August index, BLS explained, will be based on prices collected both before and after the Aug. 15 price freeze and therefore the CPI for August "will not reflect fully the effect of the freeze." Some prices in August may have been at "seasonal lows" and below "permitted price ceilings."

The September index also could be up because many prices on goods and services are collected at three-month intervals. Some price changes from June until mid-August will show up in the September index.

Also, some components of the index, such as used cars and home purchases, rely on the use of averages of prices for several months and may not turn up until the October index.

Perhaps, most significantly, BLS noted that some items on the index are exempt from the freeze—such as fruits, vegetables, and sales and property taxes—and some price increases have been allowed to go into effect after the freeze date.

The BLS explanation took no note at all of the August Wholesale Price Index. This barometer, which nearly always foretells future price increases, rose seven-tenths of 1 percent, seasonally adjusted, its biggest increase in six months.

However, in the face of developments, Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson remained optimistic. He said that "we have a non-inflationary period coming up in our economy and the people can depend upon it."

At 4-Day Week Hearings:

Labor Warns of Cut In Overtime Wages

Unions representing workers employed by government contractors told the Labor Dept. that they strongly oppose any move to abolish overtime pay after eight hours a day.

The administrative hearings were set up to explore what the Labor Dept. described as "widespread interest" in compressing the 40-hour workweek into four 10-hour days.

At the opening of the hearings, both the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the Metal Trades Dept. voiced firm opposition to any change in laws requiring government contractors to pay overtime rates after eight hours in any day.

The building trades "vigorously oppose" any change in the eight-hour provision of the Contract Work Hours & Safety Standards Act, Pres. Frank Bonadio told a Labor Dept. hearing examiner.

Bonadio also challenged the authority of the Secretary of Labor to change the terms of the act by administrative order rather than by a congressional amendment.

"We firmly believe that labor continues to need" present protection against a workday of more than eight hours, Bonadio said. The eight-hour-day standard was achieved after decades of trade union effort "and we believe that federal laws must continue to protect workers against excessive hours of work per day" as well as per week, he said.

"This is particularly true" in the construction industry for employes "whose work is so physically demanding and laden with risks to life and limb which require unusually high degrees of concentration and attentiveness," Bonadio said.

William H. Ryan, national coordinator of the Machinists' government employes department, told the hearing officer that the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. will fight any weakening of present protections.

"The trade union movement worked hard for the establishment of an eight-hour day and we cannot support any lengthening of the work day," Ryan said.

"We submit that we should be moving in the direction of a shorter workweek with no reduction in weekly earnings, and an increased penalty for overtime work."

A change in the law would, Ryan said, encourage the contracting out of work normally performed by government employes.

Government employes at the same time would remain covered by the eight-hour-day law, unless Congress changes the law, he pointed out. Also the impact of the proposal would carry over into plants engaged in government contracts.

Ryan, testifying for Metal Trades Pres. Paul J. Burnsky, said "we support strongly the union and management efforts" through collective bargaining to reduce working hours and to re-schedule workweek assignments "to their mutual satisfaction."

President Asked to End Blue-Collar Pay Freeze

Five labor members of the National Wage Policy Committee on government blue-collar employes called on Pres. Nixon to "immediately rescind his discriminatory action" of Sept. 1 in imposing an additional 90-day wage freeze on federal wage workers.

The committee was established in 1966 to advise the Civil Service Commission chairman on pay rates for blue-collar workers. The labor members joined in asking the chairman, who heads the wage committee also, to send their unanimous expression to the President

They adopted a statement expressing "shock and dismay at the sweeping and totally unjustified action of the President" in barring wage rises for an additional three months beyond the general wage freeze he imposed earlier.

The labor committeemen are Robert Crum of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Paul R. Hutchings of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., William H. Ryan of the Machinists' government employes department, Clyde Webber of the Government Employes and Irving I. Geller, general counsel for the National Federation of Federal Employes, unaffiliated.

Federal wage rates, they said, are by law adjusted annually on the basis of surveys made of private industry rates already in effect. Such rates "in fact allow federal workers only to catch up to rates now enjoyed by their counterparts" in private industry. The imposition of an additional three-month freeze "compounds the inequity," they emphasized.

Their statement continued: "Even during the stress of World War II and the Korean War, no such drastic inequity was placed on the government's own wage force."

They said "certainly the President cannot expect federal wage workers to bear a larger burden in peacetime than they have ever borne in wartime, or to work at rates substantially below those being paid for similar work" in their community.

In addition to having their wage "perpetually lag behind" other wages and the price levels already in existence, they will be hit again at the end of the general freeze period. Price adjustments obviously will take place, but rates for federal wage workers will continue to be frozen, they pointed out.

In consequence, the federal government then will pay higher prices for the goods it buys, for power, commodities and all other goods and services—except the services of its own directly employed workers, the committeemen stressed.

H. T. McCreedy Dies, Ex-Regional Director

Detroit—Memorial services were held Sept. 10 in UAW Region 1B hall for Herbert T. McCreedy, who was AFL-CIO regional director when he retired in 1966. He was 70 when he died of cancer.

Born in Fairgrove, Mich., McCreedy got a job in a Detroit auto plant and joined the Auto Workers in the 1930s. He was an organizer for the CIO in campaigns to organize the telephone and other industries.

His wife Rita and two children survive.

Nixon Policies Face Congressional Test

sion. Unions representing government employes, strongly backed by the AFL-CIO, have mounted a major drive for passage of the resolution.

In effect, Congress is being asked to veto the President's action.

The House Ways & Means Committee has opened hearings on the Administration's tax proposals—including the proposed investment tax credit that would amount to a new federal subsidy for employers.

Treasury Sec. John B. Connally defended the tax cut plan on the opening day of hearings. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany was scheduled to testify Sept. 13 on labor's program for tax justice and reform as an alternative to the giveaway to business.

The House hearings also opened up to congressional scrutiny an earlier multi-billion-dollar giveaway to business which came about last spring when the Administration rewrote the tax depreciation rules.

In its first major action after the recess, the Senate demonstrated that it was unimpressed by the Administration argument that holding down federal spending is more important than meeting the nation's urgent domestic needs.

The Senate Labor Committee had sent to the floor a bill extending the programs of the Office of Economic Opportunity—the anti-poverty command post—for an additional two years.

But it added to the bill a major new child development program strongly supported by the AFL-CIO which would provide a high level of day care for children of working parents—including families above the bare poverty level.

The day care services, keyed to learning and cultural enrichment rather than mere baby-sitting, would be available free to families with incomes up to the Labor Dept. minimum urban budget—about $6,900 for a family of four—and at a sliding scale of charges for those with higher incomes.

Up to $2 billion would be authorized for the second year of the program, but about half that amount would represent funds from incorporation of the current Head Start program into the new concept.

Administration diehards, abandoning hope of knocking out the new program completely, tried to amend it with the intention of limiting the services to families under the $3,900 poverty level. But a motion to leave the eligibility standards up to the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare was soundly beaten, 44-20.

Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.), floor manager for the bill, also mustered a majority to defeat an amendement that would have given the President a free hand to transfer any OEO functions to other agencies.

The Senate bill also would insulate the OEO's legal services for the poor program from political interference by setting up a semi-autonomous Legal Services Corp. to operate it.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the Senate was moving towards a final vote on the legislation. Companion bills are still awaiting action in the House.

A major confrontation between the Administration and congressional leaders was shaping up in the House, where a Sept. 15 vote is scheduled on a bill to give the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission enforcement powers against job discrimination.

The legislation would also give the EEOC exclusive jurisdiction over discrimination cases, ending the duplication and overlapping powers of an assortment of federal agencies in the same field. The leading civil rights organizations and the AFL-CIO are strongly supporting the House bill. The Administration will seek to substitute its own plan to put enforcement in the hands of federal district courts.

In his address to Congress, Pres. Nixon sought to undo some of the damage done to the legislative outlook for welfare reform when he had earlier proposed as part of his economic policy that its effective date be postponed until next year.

The President's latest message urged that legislative action be completed this year.

Groups supporting welfare reform and improvements in the House-passed bill—including the AFL-CIO — had protested that the President's earlier statement was an invitation to further delay by the conservative-dominated Senate Finance Committee.

Nixon also restated his call for revenue sharing and reorganization of Cabinet departments — both greeted unenthusiastically by Congress—and said that in the 1972 session he will submit new proposals on "tax reform to create jobs" and "enlistment of America's technology in meeting the challenges of peace."

Housing Costs Example of Freeze Bias

"Thus under the wage-price freeze, greed and unbridled profits are being rewarded while workers are being penalized," Biemiller said. "A firm decision to place a ceiling on interest rates could have been beneficial to housing, but the Administration abdicated its responsibility. Wage-frozen Americans and federal housing programs will be the losers."

Biemiller praised the subcommittee for its work on a community development bill that has incentives for metropolitan housing authorities, which he termed indispensable to meeting the national goal of 2.6 million new housing units per year.

"It is clear that an initiative body is needed and that this body must be metropolitan in nature and provided with the tools to carry out a metropolitan program," Biemiller said, adding that it is clear that at present, low- and middle-income housing is dependent on "a delivery system which cannot fulfill our nation's housing needs."

The tools which the metropolitan-wide body must have are incorporated in the subcommittee's bill, Biemiller said, because it provides for federal grants-in-aid only after the local housing authority seeks the funds and submits an acceptable program.

This is far superior to the Administration's revenue-sharing proposals which call for an automatic payout without regard to need for low-income housing, he noted.

Biemiller praised the same bill for proposing consolidation of the functions of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development and establishment of an urban development bank. "However, we believe the federally funded Urbank concept should be expanded to provide long-term loans to non-profit, quasi-governmental organizations receiving federal funds and pursuing public policy provisions."

He also urged that Davis-Bacon standards for the payment of prevailing wage rates in the area be retained and said that "to make Davis-Bacon apply to only 12 or more units would be a step backward."

Biemiller said that housing has made "an encouraging showing" during the past six months, climbing to a rate of 2 million new units a year.

"Unfortunately, we still face the problem of rising prices and increases in land and interest rates. "These perennial problems continue to escape solution."

Meany Urges Tax Justice, Protests Nixon Giveaway

For Post-Freeze Period:

Tri-Partite Board Proposed as Model

American labor has declared its willingness to cooperate with a "Phase Two" economic stabilization program developed by representatives of unions, employers and the general public.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, answering questions at a House Ways & Means Committee hearing, stressed labor's insistence that the stabilization machinery be free of government control.

He cited the War Labor Board of the World War II era as the model for a system that functioned effectively without government dictation—or participation.

Even when labor was outvoted on issues, Meany told the committee, it accepted the decision "because we were in the discussion that resulted in the policy." But, he warned, if the government and not a public representative is in the middle, the result is government dictation. "Then it is not voluntary."

Earlier, Meany and six other union leaders presented labor's views on the post-freeze "Phase Two" period to Pres. Nixon at the White House.

The session, at which the President and his top advisers "listened," was the first in a series of White House consultations Nixon called as a prelude to framing a stabilization policy for the period following the current 90-day wage-price freeze. He held subsequent meetings with business and farm leaders.

Follow-up meetings are being held with Cabinet-level officials assigned to draw up recommendations to the President.

Action Asked To Bar U.S. Pay Delay

The Nixon Administration's plan to delay a scheduled catch-up pay raise for federal employes until next July is "outrageous" and should be "flatly rejected," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told Congress.

Either the House or Senate can block the delay and assure payment of the 6 percent raise in January by passing a resolution disapproving the President's "alternate plan" postponing the increase.

That's the course Meany urged in a letter to the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee, which subsequently voted 14-12 for the resolution of disapproval.

He charged that Nixon's move to hold up the pay raise "unfairly singles out for special penalty" a group of workers whose salaries are admittedly behind the private sector of the economy.

Profit Curb Seen Needed For Equity

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO called on Congress to scrap Pres. Nixon's proposals for a multi-billion dollar giveaway to business and substitute an overdue program of tax justice—including an excess profits tax.

Federation Pres. George Meany ripped apart the Administration's latest economic game plan during a three-hour appearance before the House Ways & Means Committee.

He termed the principal tax law changes sought by the President "grossly unfair and one-sided," based on the discredited "trickle down" economic theory.

"For those who have much, the President proposes more. For those who have little, the President proposes less."

And so long as there are restraints on wages, Meany declared, employer profits should be subject to an excess profits tax. He urged Congress to enact such a tax promptly, and to make it retroactive

Meany stressed in his testimony that "every dollar of taxes given away to business and industry is a dollar more that must be paid by someone else, or a dollar's worth of public facilities and services that are foregone."

Few, if any, jobs will be created by reinstituting an investment tax credit loophole "under the blatantly deceptive label 'job development tax credit,'" Meany charged.

It will not put the Vietnam veteran to work. "There is nothing

Sacrifice of U.S. Jobs:

Labor Dissent Hits Trade Proposals

By John R. Oravec

Recommendations of the President's Commission on International Trade & Investment Policy were assailed by its two labor members as being "directly damaging to the interest of the American people and the national economy."

The commission's report fails to deal realistically with the nation's choices in foreign trade, AFL-CIO Vice Presidents I. W. Abel and Floyd E. Smith declared in a dissenting statement.

The recommendations call for immediate negotiations with foreign countries on trade, including the Communist bloc, that would lead to the lifting of all tariffs over the next 25 years. They also propose easing of controls on investments in foreign operations by U.S.-based multinational firms.

Abel and Smith took sharp issue with the majority report of the commission, heavily dominated by business representatives, for ignoring the impact of imports and the outflow of jobs and production from the United States.

They warned that application of the recommendations would speed up the deterioration of the nation's position in international economic relations.

"The strategy and recommendations will make the United States a third-rate industrial power—with the continuing displacement of U.S. production, including high-technology products," the two labor representatives noted in their minority report.

"We do not believe, as the report implies, that America must choose between free trade and the protectionism of the 1970s,

House Dilutes Measure To Strengthen EEOC

The House refused to give the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission enforcement power to crack down on job discrimination.

It scrapped a bill supported by the leading civil rights organizations and the AFL-CIO that would have enabled the EEOC to act against racial, religious and sex discrimination with the same authority the National Labor Relations Board has to remedy unfair labor practices.

The rejected bill also would have ended the overlapping jurisdiction of various federal agencies with job discrimination.

And it would have brought 22 million more workers under the protection of the equal job opportunity law, including public employes.

Instead, the House adopted a toothless Administration substitute bill ardently sought by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and other employer groups.

The Administration measure, sponsored by Rep. John N. Erlenborn (R-Ill.), was substituted for the bill recommended by the House Labor Committee by a close 202-197 vote.

It makes no change in the EEOC's jurisdiction. And it gives the agency no power to compel an end to discriminatory practices. All

Congress Repeals Detention Camp Act

America doesn't need detention camps to retain its freedom, Congress declared.

It voted overwhelmingly to repeal a 1950 law that gave the government the right to hold suspected subversives in detention camps without trial during times of emergency.

Twenty-one years ago, the House and Senate had voted by huge majorities to override Pres. Truman's veto of the Internal Security Act, which included the detention camp provision.

This year, with strong bipartisan support, the House voted 356-49 to repeal it and rejected by a nearly 3-1 margin a compromise effort to merely amend it by barring detention of anyone because of race or national origin.

The Senate then quickly approved the bill by voice vote, sending it to the White House for the President's signature. Not a single senator spoke against the repeal.

The labor-backed repeal bill also included a strong prohibition against detention measures carried out un-

Farm Workers Dedicate New Health Clinic

Delano, Calif.—The first union health clinic for farm workers was dedicated here Sept. 12 on the "Forty Acres" headquarters plot of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

The new clinic is a large single-story structure in the style of early California missions with walls of adobe brick and a roof of red tile. A covered porch upheld by massive wooden beams runs the entire length of the front of the building.

The clinic houses seven examining rooms, an emergency room, a laboratory, X-ray facilities and a pharmacy. It will provide for the first time adequate health care for San Joaquin Valley farm workers.

The clinic will be open 24 hours a day and will be manned by four doctors, three nurses, two health aides, a laboratory technician and an X-ray technician.

"This is a dream that started about nine years ago when a group of farm workers, about 108 of them, met in Fresno to form the union," UFWOC Director Cesar Chevez told the audience of 2,000 at ceremonies dedicating the clinic.

"Today," he said, "we hope that this is the beginning of many clinics that will spread the length and breadth of this country to bring service to farm workers."

Chavez called the clinic a prototype for others in cities throughout California, Arizona, Texas and Florida.

"Everywhere farm workers are organizing they should have their own clinics to take care of themselves and their health problems," he said.

The Ladies' Garment Workers, which has loaned a mobile X-ray unit to UFWOC for the past five years, donated the unit to the Farm Workers.

Cornelius Wall, ILGWU western regional director, also presented UFWOC with a check for $12,000 from the David Dubinsky Foundation as a contribution for a laboratory room in the clinic.

AFL-CIO Organizing Director William L. Kircher said that concern for the health and health care of workers and their families "is the most common characteristic in the history of unionism throughout all of the countries where unionism exists."

House Urged To Bar Delay In Federal Pay

Their wages would be frozen for seven and one-half months after the expiration of the general wage freeze, Meany noted.

"Compounding the unfairness of of the President's position," Meany said, "is the fact that he would use the $1.3 billion the Treasury would save as a part payment on the tax bonanza he would give to big business."

Meany also protested the Administration's reported plans to postpone as well the salary adjustment scheduled for October 1972 and to use outdated wage data for the July comparability raise instead of taking a new Bureau of Labor Statistics salary survey.

In all these actions, Meany said, the President is disregarding "both the letter and the spirit" of the comparability pay law.

The House Committee vote closely followed party lines, with only one Republican voting to disapprove the delay and two southern Democrats opposing the resolution.

CAPITOL HILL RALLY brought several hundred members of the American Federation of Teachers to Washington to protest Pres. Nixon's wage freeze and to kick off a $1 million political action fund. They called for action to correct freeze inequities.

Teachers Press Relief From Wage Freeze

Hundreds of union teachers from all parts of the country brought their "thaw the freeze" campaign to Washington and appealed to Congress and the Administration to correct inequities in the wage freeze that have taken a double bite out of their paychecks.

Delegates to an emergency conference called by the American Federation of Teachers sought and found allies on Capitol Hill for their contention that:

- Contracts negotiated before the freeze should be honored, even though the effective date was not until September, because of the seasonal nature of school employment.
- Salary increments based on experience are not pay raises but part of the normal progression keyed to teaching experience or training.

The delegates held a rally on the steps of the Capitol, visited their congressmen and senators, and were addressed by prominent members of Congress.

AFT Pres. David Selden led a delegation that met with Arnold Weber, executive director of the government's Cost of Living Council. The union followed through with a brief documenting its case for exemption of scheduled salary increments from the wage freeze.

The emergency conference also saw the launching of a new political action program by the union, and the start of a voluntary fund drive aimed at raising $1 million in contributions from the AFT's 250,000 members.

The goal is to "elect pro-education candidates" to office in 1972, and a union advertisement in 10 leading newspapers declared:

"It is time to act to save the schools. The AFT will mobilize the energy, funds and talent of many Americans to correct injustice, remedy inequity, and put an administration into office next year that is committed to public education."

Selden charged at the Capitol rally that "the big guns of Nixon's economic war may be pointed at inflation but they are hitting the schools."

Brown's Term Expires on NLRB

Gerald A. Brown's second four-year term as a member of the National Labor Relations Board expired without renewal Aug. 27. Brown was reported ready to engage in part-time teaching at the University of Texas in Austin. He won a master of arts degree there in 1938.

Pres. Nixon has not named a successor to Brown. But he did name Peter G. Nash, 34, as general counsel for the NLRB succeeding Arnold Ordman, a Democrat who served for eight years.

'Socialism for Rich':

Kirkland Hits Nixon On Shift in Priorities

Minneapolis—Pres. Nixon has reversed America's most urgent priorities in imposing his new economic game plan, Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland charged in an address to the 1971 convention of the Minnesota AFL-CIO.

"Mr. Nixon called on Aug. 15 for the adoption of a new kind of socialism for the rich at the expense of the public interest," Kirkland said. "On Sept. 6—Labor Day—he prescribed sterner competitive free enterprise and harder work for workers. He expressed no sympathy and offered no hope to the poor, the unemployed the aged or the young.

"He didn't explain to them how they can improve themselves through fiercer competition, or how the work ethic can brighten the lives of those who can find no work to do." (Excerpts, Page 4.)

Kirkland pointed out that the Nixon plan would transfer $70 billion from the public treasury to big business over the next 10 years.

It would do this in the form of a 10-percent "job development" tax credit and deferral of federal taxes on profits of foreign export subsidiaries.

"That is $70 billion out of the pockets of ordinary taxpayers. That is $70 billion in public funds that this nation desparately needs for public purposes. And yet the President calls this trickle-down scheme a 'job development tax program.' "

Kirkland questioned how badly America needs new machinery when 27 percent of its productive capacity sits idle or how many new jobs will actually be created by "sophisticated automated equipment that industry does buy."

And, he asked, "What good will it do to increase federal subsidies for the runaway corporations that are already looting the American economy and exporting the jobs and earning power of American workers to the four corners of the earth?"

He stressed that America needs jobs—not richer banks and fatter corporate earnings—and he pointed out that those jobs could be created in the public sector with the $70 billion windfall for business.

The federation secretary-treasurer vowed labor would put up a vigorous fight on those parts of the President's program requiring Congressional approval.

"But beyond this legislative battle lies a bigger job," he said.

"America's problems stem, more than anything else, from a failure of leadership. America needs leaders who can do more than divert public funds into private pockets and exhort workers to work harder to make up the difference.

"She needs leaders who care about human beings. And it is our task to see that she gets what she needs."

He pledged that in the next 14 months, labor will conduct the greatest political education and voter registration drive ever mounted.

"Our aim is to see that America has, as her elected officials, men and women whose goal is to build America and who put the interests of all the people above private greed."

New Columbus Day Holiday Okay If Provided by Contract or Practice

Columbus Day may be granted as a paid holiday under certain circumstances, the President's Cost of Living Council ruled.

It was one of the latest in a number of rulings handed down by the council on the President's wage-price freeze and represented a reversal of an earlier interpretation from the Office of Emergency Preparedness. The OEP had said the freeze prohibited workers from getting the additional holiday with pay if it represented a new benefit this year.

The Cost of Living Council ruled that workers could get the Oct. 11 holiday if such a provision is included in their contracts, if granting federal holidays is an established company practice or if the employer announced the holiday prior to Aug 15.

In 1968, Congress made Columbus Day a legal federal holiday effective this year. Most federal offices will be closed and the Postal Service will operate on a holiday schedule.

But in a related ruling the council said that an employer could not increase the amount of paid vacation given workers even if it is an established practice to give the additional time after a specified length of employment.

"Increases in paid vacation are treated the same as longevity increases and may not be granted during the freeze," the council ruled.

It also said that retroactive wage increase—for work performed prior to the freeze—may be negotiated "provided that both parties can demonstrate that they did not change their positions during negotiations in order to compensate for, or absorb the impact of the freeze."

"However, for work performed after Aug. 15, the actual rate which was in effect during the base period is the ceiling wage for the freeze period."

The council gave an example:

A contract agreed upon Sept. 1 and retroactive to July 1, increases wages from $2.80 to $3 hourly. For the period July 1 through Aug. 15, the worker's wage is $3, but from Aug. 16 until the freeze ends, his wage is $2.80.

The council ruled that a semi-annual cost-of-living increase which was due prior to the freeze—but delayed until the pertinent Consumer Price Index was available—can be paid.

"The increase was due and payable prior to the freeze and retroactive to that date," the council said. "The employes were working at the increased rate prior to the freeze."

A blessing was given also to increases in statewide minimum wage laws scheduled to take effect during the freeze period, but the council declared that " wages and salaries may not be raised to meet scheduled increases in state minimum levels for specific occupational groups."

The COLC said that an employer may switch to a new group health insurance plan providing increased medical services for his employes, provided there is no increase in premium.

"Any savings realized, however, may not be passed along to the employes, since this would be an increase in real wages."

The ruling is applied only to an employer who pays the enitre cost of the group health insurance plan.

While the Cost of Living Council has laid down strict rules on wages, it has only issued "guidelines" on stock dividends.

The latest set of these said that cash or stock dividends on common stock "should be declared at a rate not exceeding the effective rate declared in the most recent dividend period prior to Aug. 15" in order to comply with the spirit of the wage-price freeze.

The council said that extra dividends could be paid if it is an "established practice."

Companies must have declared the extra dividends for the past three years and may not raise the dividend to a higher level than in the past to remain within the guideline. If past practice has been to increase dividends at a particular time of the year, a company may do so.

For Post-Freeze Period:

meeting were Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock and Teamsters Pres. Frank Fitzsimmons, along with AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and Federation Vice Presidents I. W. Abel, Joseph A. Beirne and John H. Lyons.

While labor spokesmen were firm in opposition to government dictation of wages and contract terms, business leaders who met with the President indicated that they took the opposite course.

General Motors Chairman James M. Roche told newsmen that he believed that during the Phase Two period "policy decisions should be in the hands of the government."

U.S. Chamber of Commerce Pres. Archie K. Davis took the position that basic decisions should be made by the all-government Cost of Living Council with the public sector playing no role.

Business leaders also have expressed strong opposition to any excess profits tax while the AFL-CIO has called for immediate enactment of such a measure.

Meany told the House hearings that "so long as profits are unchecked while wages and salaries are restrained, the test of equity is not met"

He suggested legislation modeled after the Korean War excess profits tax, retroactive to July 1, to remain in effect "so long as wages and salaries are subject to any form of freeze, controls, or restraints."

Meanwhile, controversy continued over the 90-day freeze that the President has imposed until mid-November.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson issued a statement stressing that the freeze "should not be interpreted as a moratorium on collective bargaining or as an effort to discourage settlements."

While there is no restriction on agreements providing wage and benefit increases following expiration of the freeze, Hodgson noted that "subsequent revisions of these terms may be needed depending on what policies will prevail following the 90-day freeze." He reiterated that "the policies have not been determined at this time."

In another development, the Meat Cutters filed a suit in U.S. District Court in Washington challenging the constitutionality of the wage freeze.

The suit asks the court to direct national meat packing companies to pay a 25-cent increase for 50,000 workers that had been scheduled to go into effect Sept. 6 under the union contract.

LABOR'S VIEWS on the second phase of economic stabilization—to follow the present 90-day wage-price freeze—were outlined at this White House meeting. Seated around the Cabinet table are union leaders, including AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, with Pres. Nixon and his economic advisers.

Support Mounts for AFL-CIO Stand Opposing Nixon's New Game Plan

Support continues to grow for the AFL-CIO position calling for fair and equitable economic policies and opposing the huge tax reduction for business proposed by the Nixon Administration.

Typical is a letter from a Nashville, Tenn., realtor who said the Nixon program "offends the sense of fair play."

An Alabama utility worker writing AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said: "This fight is my fight and that of all working people who cherish freedom."

The support comes from every section of the country, from liberals and conservatives, workers and college professors, unionists and non-unionists.

A Santa Rosa, Calif., man asks: "Is there anything I can do here in Northern California to help drive Richard Nixon into oblivion?"

From Swampscott, Mass.: "As a member of the intellectual community—not a blue collar worker—I wish to give unqualified support to your stand regarding the President's economic policy. This policy is obviously against the interest of any kind of worker—any man whose living depends on his salary."

"I have never belonged to a union," wrote a retired San Antonio, Tex., man, adding: "I agree with you that if prices and wages are frozen, such items as profits, interest rates, dividends and capital gains should be frozen."

"Give him heck, brother," telegraphed a Warren, Pa., unionist to Meany.

A Hubbard, Ohio, worker said: "I would like to take this opportunity to inform you of the support that exists locally for your position regarding the President's wage and price freeze." He pointed out that union members "feel that the directive was weighted against them" while not calling on corporations, bankers and speculators "to make similar sacrifices."

A Denver teacher wrote Meany: "Keep up the good fight! You are the only one speaking for the working man."

A California woman pointed out that if the President has the power to negate contracted increases, he could "dissolve business and marriage contracts."

"I am not an AFL-CIO member," read a card from Reading, Mass., "but let me indicate my support of your position on the President's economic edicts. Also, I resent the attempt to characterize union leaders as out of step with workers and not being able to understand economics."

A member of the Transport Workers from Ridgewood, N.Y., phrased his support this way:

"Pres. Nixon's 'deep freeze' is nothing more than a brazen attempt, by flim-flam and flapdoodle, to 'suckerize' the American wage-slaves and jobholders in order to make the rich richer."

In addition to the support from individuals, local unions in and out of the AFL-CIO messaged their support in letters, telegrams and resolutions.

Theodore G. Daley, secretary-treasurer of Teamsters Local 445 in Yonkers, N.Y., wrote Meany: "Your strong and direct action in voicing your opposition to the Administration's wage and price freeze is worthy of the highest praise from the working men and women of America."

An Auto Workers Local in Rock Island, Ill., wrote: "The sentiment of the rank and file worker in the shop is one of total opposition to the freeze."

George Fecteau, president of the United Shoe Workers, wrote Meany that: "The effectiveness and soundness of your position has been proven by the reaction of labor's enemies."

The president emeritus of the Letter Carriers, William C. Doherty, Sr., called on the labor press to "explode that phony '65 percent labor support' myth being circulated by the news media."

Sheet Metal Workers in Eugene, Ore.; Service Employes in San Diego, Calif.; Communications Workers from Buffalo, N.Y.; Electrical Workers in Pueblo, Colo., and many more local unions and individuals wrote in support of the AFL-CIO position.

Perhaps the best summary was provided by a Dunellen, N.J., woman: "Each of us has a weak voice when we shout alone, but when we shout together we are heard."

Two Sets of Books Help Firms Minimize Profits

Nixon Administration spokesmen have contended that corporate profits are too low and should not be subject to the President's wage-price freeze, but the actual level of profits may depend on whether you're looking at a company's tax return or its report to stockholders.

"The extent of the difference between tax return profits and shareholder reports can be considerable," the First National City Bank of New York pointed out in the August edition of its Economic Letter.

"The petroleum industry reported twice as much after-tax income to stockholders as to the IRS," the bank said.

The First National City Bank bases its profits report on what corporations tell their shareholders, and for the second quarter the bank said, "earnings rebounded almost to pre-recession peaks. Both sales and margins improved in a widespread recovery that left only six industries in 30 off the bandwagon."

The bank's report closely parallels another one issued jointly by the Securities & Exchange Commission and the Federal Trade Commission, but it shows much higher profit levels than does a report from the Commerce Dept.—based on IRS figures.

First National City said that reports from nearly 1,300 nonfinancial corporations showed an average year-to-year increase of 11 percent in after-tax earnings for the second quarter, on top of a 7 percent increase in the first quarter of this year.

The bank boasted that its survey was "probably closest to the concept of earning power used explicitly or implicitly by management in making decisions." It justified keeping a separate set of books for the tax collector with the declaration that it is the duty of corporate management to "utilize every legal means of minimizing reported income, and therefore, taxes."

The economic letter said that differences in depreciation methods helped cut tax-return income in transportation and public utilities "while financial institutions benefit from tax exemptions for interest on state and local government obligations."

Freeze Less Than Solid For Executive Income

While millions of American workers are sweating out Pres. Nixon's freeze on wages, hundreds of the nation's highest paid executives have quite a bit to be happy about, according to a story in the New York Times Sept. 12.

Times reporter Michael C. Jensen pointed out that executives will continue to receive salaries and bonuses that "in many cases exceed $200,000." But that's not all.

- Liberalized tax laws will allow them to keep higher percentages of their income.
- Stock options are still available—at a time when the market looks attractive.
- Dividends from stock they already own are not frozen, so if business prospers they will, too.
- Increased bonus payments apparently will be allowed by the President's Cost of Living Council if they are tied to company earnings by an established formula.

Jensen quoted Frederick A. Teague, vice president of Booz, Allen & Hamilton, a Chicago-based consulting firm, as saying "neither the freeze nor the immediate possibility of further controls has had a very profound impact on executive compensation."

Another consultant, unnamed, said tax law revisions introduced in 1969 could sharply increase the take-home pay of top executives, for example those earning more than $200,000.

Without increasing his gross income an executive could gain about 16 percent over the 1970-72 period because of the tax revisions, the consultant was quoted as saying.

Another apparent loophole in the freeze is the partnership. Legal and accounting firms, brokerage houses and consulting firms apparently may still divide profits which are not subject to the freeze.

CWA Ratifies Western Union Strike Accord

New York—Ratification of a new contract by 3,100 members of the Communications Workers brought an end to a 104-day strike at Western Union facilities in New York and New Jersey.

The two-year agreement provides for wage increases of 23.8 percent plus improved fringe benefits.

The CWA members walked out June 1, along with 17,000 members of the Telegraph Workers in a nationwide strike against the company. The UTW settled after 57 days on contract terms similar to those ratified by the CWA.

The CWA said that certain items in the new contract directly affected by Pres. Nixon's wage freeze may be renegotiated at the "first legal opportunity."

Another 40,000 CWA members are still on strike in New York City against the Bell Telephone System. They walked out July 14 as part of the nationwide strike, but rejected a pattern agreement that was accepted by the majority of CWA's Bell System workers.

Socialism for the Rich

WE ARE REMINDED again that labor has more than one role to play in a democratic society. The trade union, of course, exists to defend and advance the interests of workers in their places of employment. But an equally fundamental role of the free trade union movement is to defend the rights of free working men against the excessive and oppressive acts of the state. We do not propose to forget or neglect that responsibility, regardless of its effects on our popularity among those caught up in the exuberance of new slogans and new rhetoric.

We will not lie down and roll over. We will not blindly follow Nixon's midnight shifts in the party line. We will resist any effort to reduce the American worker to a tool or instrument of an autocratic national policy.

Mr. Nixon called on Aug. 15 for the adoption of a new kind of socialism for the rich at the expense of the public interest. On Sept. 6—on Labor Day—he prescribed sterner competitive free enterprise and harder work for workers. He expressed no sympathy and offered no hope to the poor, the unemployed, the aged or the young. He didn't explain to them how they can improve themselves through fiercer competition, or how the work ethic can brighten the lives of those who can find no work to do.

PRES. NIXON has reversed America's most urgent priorities.

America's problems cannot be solved and her needs cannot be met by richer banks and fatter corporate earnings.

America's needs are public needs, and the $70 billion the President proposes to give away should be used for public purposes.

It should be used for schools, hospitals and waste-disposal systems. It should be used for low-cost housing and low-cost transit systems. It should be used for cleaning the air and the water. It should be used for training the unemployed, and for retraining and upgrading skills to meet the nation's real needs.

It should be used to promote public safety—to man and equip police, fire and public service departments. It should be used to provide day-care centers and to enlarge medical schools.

These are just a few of the things that Pres. Nixon proposes to short-change in order to enrich corporate America.

AMERICA'S PROBLEMS stem, more than anything else, from a failure of leadership. America needs leaders who can do more than divert public funds into private pockets and exhort workers to work harder to make up the difference. She needs leaders who care about human beings. And it is our task to see that she gets what she needs.

Labor is united as never before in its fundamental aims and goals. To the greatest extent in years, labor is speaking with a single voice—and it is no secret that Pres. Nixon deserves some of the credit for that. His policies are "bringing us together."

Over the next 14 months, in every state and in every city, labor will be conducting the greatest political education and voter registration drive ever mounted. Our aim is to see that America has, as her elected officials, men and women whose goal is to build America, and who put the interests of all the people above private greed.

Quality Education Holds Key To Solution in Busing Dispute

By John P. Roche

THERE IS AN AIR of unreality about the whole busing controversy. Indeed, as one tries to get a fix on the various arguments pro and con (to say nothing of the legal shambles the Supreme Court has created), he is likely to wonder what country is under discussion.

On one hand, he is told that "racial imbalance" automatically creates "bad" education—a proposition absurd on its face. On the other, he hears tearful evocations of the virtues of the "neighborhood school"—an equally preposterous educational notion.

At the risk of alienating everybody, let us take a hard look at the real question that should be under analysis: the quality of education.

First of all, what about "racial imbalance" and the quality of education? A number of commentators have gotten themselves out on an impossible limb by arguing that a racially unmixed classroom is automatically bad. What about the vast areas of the United States where there are no significant "racial" (a word I don't like, but which can't be avoided) minorities? Are we supposed to start shipping members of minority groups out to those schools?

Educationally speaking, the valid point is that the composition of the schools should reflect that of the community. Youngsters should go to school with a cross-section of the population. If there are Negroes, they should be there—not tucked away in a segregated environment. The same principle, by the way, should apply to poor whites, Asian-Americans or whatever.

William Raspberry, the Washington Post's extremely perceptive black columnist, put his finger on the crucial issue. Washington is hopeless from the viewpoint of "racial balance"—more than 95 percent of the children in public schools are Negro.

But Raspberry pointed out that "convoluted efforts to achieve racial balance are not likely to produce educational improvement for the black children . . . what is wrong with the schools . . . is not the absence of white children (but) official unconcern, inadequate expenditure of public money and pervading ignorance as to how best to teach (profoundly disadvantaged) children."

Historically speaking, how has the United States moved to improve the education of profoundly disadvantaged children? Here I speak from experience. When I was getting my doctorate on the G.I. Bill a quarter of a century ago, my wife taught in a rural central school in upstate New York.

BECAUSE THE ONE-ROOM schoolhouses were appallingly bad, the farmers instituted central schools—and buses. More buses than you can imagine—I counted 35 one morning. Off into the countryside they went on roughly a 20-mile radius. On winter mornings at 6:30, as I was driving to Ithaca, the children would be waiting in the dark with lanterns on the roadside. Nobody wasted any tears on the passing of the one-room school; these people wanted their kids to get a decent education.

In other words, busing is a great American tradition devised to improve the chances young people have of receiving adequate training, of attending good (or at least better) schools. It is the quality of the education at the end of the bus ride that counts. There is no point in riding kids across town or country just for the trip.

Similarly in New York City, a bright student from the wilds of Brooklyn seldom objected to the long subway ride that took him to the Bronx High School of Science. From the age of 9 on, my future wife spent 40 minutes each way on the subway going and returning from school.

What this leads to is the suggestion that we somehow move the wild men at both ends of the busing fight off to an island some place while the rest of us get down to the business of education. Some places will need extensive busing, others won't, but the objective should be maximizing the possibilities of young people attending good schools that reflect the overall composition of the community.

Needed Projects By-Passed:

Nixon Tax Plan Would Divert Public Funds to Private Gain

The following is excerpted from testimony presented by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany before the House Ways & Means Committee.

WHEN ALL of the economic proposals are examined closely—who will be the recipients, who will be the losers, who will have to pay out more in taxes, and who will pay less in taxes—it is clear that the President's proposal is a form of socialism for big business.

The American people have been told repeatedly by this Administration that public treasury money cannot be spent in behalf of worthwhile projects that are badly needed and will create news jobs. Such expenditures would be inflationary, they are told. Yet public funds diverted or credited to private corporations, allegedly to spur investment and private spending, are considered by the Administration to be non-inflationary.

A clear illustration of this dual standard is the refusal by this Administration to spend $12 billion of funds appropriated by Congress for public purposes. At the end of 1970, there were about 3,000 applications for federal approval of waste treatment facilities. There were 800 applications for water and sewer projects, 1,500 applications for hospitals and public health centers.

All of these public improvements will cost money to build—money that will pay wages, buy materials, create sound economic expansion. But this Administration refuses to spend public money for the public good.

America has seen the President veto measures passed by Congress for housing and urban development; for health, education, welfare and anti-poverty programs. The President has vetoed manpower programs and public works programs —job-creating programs of all kinds.

Instead, the billions of dollars that would fund these programs will go into the corporate coffers as tax credits, tax deferrals on exports and depreciation allowances that have no relation whatsoever to the nation's actual needs and are of doubtful economic stimulation.

We believe that firm steps must be taken to preclude any further erosion in the federal government's ability to meet the nation's public investment needs. We believe firm steps must be taken to further the goals of tax justice.

The AFL-CIO, therefore, urges Congress to take the following action:

1. Overturn the Treasury's accelerated depreciation ruling. By halting this giveaway, Congress could recoup $800 million for the six months period ended June 30, 1971, and $3.2 billion would be saved in fiscal 1972.

2. Completely reject the Administration's proposal to reinstitute the business investment tax credit. If rejected, Congress would save the U.S. Treasury $3 billion in the current fiscal year, $4 billion in the year ending June 30, 1973, and result in a permanent and growing saving to the Treasury estimated at some $27 billion between now and 1980.

3. Completely reject the Administration's proposed DISC. By refusing to allow corporations to spin off into export subsidiaries and defer taxes, Congress could save the U.S. Treasury from $600 million to $955 million per year.

4. Immediately enact, retroactive to July 1, 1971, an excess-profits tax modeled after that in effect during the Korean War period. Such a tax should remain in effect during any period of freeze, controls, or restraints. Tax rates must be high enough to ensure fair and even-handed application of stabilization policies. Effective machinery should be established to ensure enforcement.

5. We urge speedy congressional action toward completion of the unfinished business of tax reform. The major reforms we recommend are as follows:

(a) Close the capital-gains loophole. The preferential half-tax rate which applies to gains on unearned income from stocks or other property sold at a profit and the zero tax that applies to such gains when passed on at death are the most disruptive and unfair elements in our tax structure. Elimination of the capital gains loophole . . . would yield an annual revenue gain of approximately $10 to $12 billion.

(b) The tax abuses of the oil, gas and other mineral industries should be completely ended. The revenue gain would be $2.5 billion.

(c) The 10 percent minimum-tax rate included in the 1969 Tax Reform Act should be strengthened. This tax requires some tax payments on the part of individuals with large amounts of income from tax-sheltered sources. Doubling the rate would provide a revenue gain of $600 million.

(d) The maximum-tax provisions of the 1969 act should be eliminated. This provides an uncalled-for tax bonanza to top corporate executives and others whose income comes from astronomically high fees and salaries. The revenue gain would be $200 million.

(e) The tax exemption for interest income from state and local bonds should be disallowed. Such income should be taxed in full with the federal government guaranteeing the bonds and providing an interest subsidy to assure that the fiscal powers of the state and local governments are not hampered.

(f) In addition to the reforms in the federal individual and corporate income tax, a major overhaul of federal estate and gift taxes is a prerequisite to the achievement of tax justice. Present law provides a host of opportunities to minimize or entirely avoid these taxes.

It is the AFL-CIO's firm belief that America's needs are too critical and every dollar of the U.S. Treasury too badly needed for vital programs to allow any siphoning off of public funds for private gain. America cannot afford this $70 billion tax windfall to big business. America needs genuine tax reform. The U.S. Treasury must be used in the public interest to build a better America for all Americans, not as a trough for private greed and private gain.

By Press Associates, Inc.

IN JUNE OF 1970, Pres. Nixon, over nationwide television, delivered an address on economic policy and productivity.

In his 180 degree turnabout on economic issues a year later, the President basically altered his views in many areas, but the emphasis he placed on productivity in 1970 was, if anything, intensified.

In his Labor Day address this year, he said that the "new needs of the American worker . . . can be summed up in a single, often misunderstood word: productivity."

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson seems to talk about productivity everywhere he goes. It's his favorite theme.

The stress on productivity has perplexed some observers. No one is opposed to it—certainly not labor or management or the consumer. It's the foundation for a growing economy.

Organized labor's view on productivity goes back to the last century. In 1897, Samuel Gompers, the founding president of the AFL, wrote that it was important for the "consumptive power of workers to keep better pace with their productive ability if the economy is to continue stable and balanced."

It is only logical that higher productivity is healthy for business and healthy for workers. Many labor-management contracts provide for annual improvement factors to encourage workers to be more efficient.

The real question is something to which Nixon and Hodgson only allude: their belief that wage increases should be limited to increases in productivity. That is something entirely different—and debatable.

The President came pretty close to saying this in his Labor Day message when he declared that rising productivity "means that the individual worker gets a real increase in his wages and not just a pay raise eaten away by inflation."

Productivity is not as simple and uncomplicated as the President's Labor Day message would lead one to believe. The formula is simple—output divided by hours of work. But then measuring output is complicated. Physical units of production from cheesecake to automobiles cannot very well be tabulated.

Economists usually meet this problem by adding the dollar value of all goods and services produced and dividing it by the hours worked. Every three months the Labor Dept. issues its own productivity report.

If wages were held to the percentage rise in output per man-hour in the private economy, all wage and salary workers would simply receive the same percentage increase in hourly compensation. The essential flexibility which gives the American economy its dynamism would be sacrificed.

RESTRICTING WAGES to productivity gains undermines the whole concept of collective bargaining. A new contract, for example, may include some catch-up when wages have lagged, or it could represent an attempt to increase the employes' share in the distribution of income among the factors of production.

Trade unionists look upon productivity as only one factor in the negotiating picture. Unions cannot ignore profits of the employer, they cannot ignore wage and fringe benefits for the same or comparable work in the industry or area, a rise in the cost of living or the elimination of substandard wages and working conditions.

Heavy unemployment is a very significant side effect of high productivity. History has shown that advancing output per man-hour, in an economy where production levels have been rising slowly, means more unemployment—layoffs for many workers, short work-week schedules for others and inadequate job opportunities.

In the total picture high productivity is desirable. But to use it to restrain wages is something else again.

Vital for Jobless:

Administration Move to Delay Welfare Reform Hit as Untimely

PRES. NIXON'S PUSH to delay long-sought welfare reform still another year "seems odd" at a time when he's calling for new moves to stimulate the economy, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Clinton Fair declared.

Pointing out that at the same time the President would "give tax cuts to industry and others" he would "let the poor stand alone where they are." Fair charged that such moves are "a really regressive way to attack our economy's problems." He made the statements on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Fair said the labor movement will work hard for major improvements in the House-passed measure as it is before the Senate, including a $2,800 floor and "a guarantee that no recipient would get less (under the new law) than he's presently getting."

He agreed that there is a "sense of delay" on the measure among members of the Senate Finance Committee, but noted that "prior to the President's message," hearings had already been scheduled to begin Sept. 21. He urged the committee to complete its hearing on welfare reform before the tax bill comes over from the House of Representatives.

Fair took sharp issue with Administration attempts to promote the welfare reform bill as a "work ethic" measure. He said that while the bill does provide some public service jobs and day-care provisions that would let more mothers go to work, "to try to sell welfare reform as a form of work program, when it is not . . . is a great mistake." He said that "in the face of 5.5 million unemployed," when "you can't find jobs for people who are able-bodied," it is "ridiculous" to hold out welfare reform as a "work bill."

FURTHER DELAY of long-overdue welfare reform seems an "odd" tactic for Pres. Nixon to promote at a time when he's calling for new moves to revive the economy, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Clinton Fair, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Murray Seeger, left, of the Los Angeles Times and Robert Barr of the Fairchild Publications. The interview program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Montana Labor Backs Fight on Nixon Freeze

Helena, Mont. — The Montana State AFL-CIO unanimously backed Pres. George Meany's condemnation of the Nixon wage-price freeze during its 15th annual convention here.

The 137 delegates re-elected Vincent Bosh as president and James W. Murry as secretary-treasurer. Robert Kokoruda was elected vice president and three new members were elected to the executive board: Terry Melton, Painters; William Potts, Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers, and Wallace Stevens, Fire Fighters.

Resolutions adopted by the convention called for:

- Opposition to a state sales tax proposal, backed by Republicans, the Chambers of Commerce, and corporations, that will be decided in a state-wide referendum Nov. 2.
- Support for a proposal by Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.) for a special Senate subcommittee to investigate interlocking directorships among banks and big corporations.
- Support for the National Health Security program now before Congress.
- Opposition to the Labor Dept. proposal to authorize the states to enforce the provisions of the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

Bosh reported to the delegates that the state AFL-CIO had increased its membership by 5,000 since 1970 to a total of 32,000.

The three-day convention was addressed by Metcalf, Rep. John Melcher (D-Mont.), and Gov. Forrest H. Anderson (D).

Ohioan Named to Fill NLRB Personnel Post

The National Labor Relations Board has announced the appointment of Richard C. Crawford as personnel director, succeeding the retired Daniel E. Matthews.

Before joining the NLRB, Crawford, 37, had been personnel supervisor of the Ohio Dept. of Highways.

NEWEST OFFICE of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute is opened in San Juan, P.R., with the commonwealth's Gov. Luis A. Ferre and Labor Sec. Julia de Rivera de Vincenty cutting the ribbon. HRDI Pres. Julius Rothman is at the left. The institute operates 60 offices across the nation to assist in job placement of disadvantaged and under-employed workers and military veterans.

North Carolina Unions Set Organizing Goals

Asheville, N.C.—An extensive organizing push is being launched at all levels of the North Carolina AFL-CIO—in union locals, central labor units, communities and plants—as a follow-up to marked membership gains in the state over the past two years.

Delegates to the 14th annual state federation convention endorsed the organizing campaign with the objective of increasing wages and union participation. North Carolina ranks low in both union organization and average factory wages.

Pres. Wilbur Hobby, who was elected to his second two-year term, noted that membership in the state federation doubled in the past two years to 64,000. But, he stressed, continued gains must be made to bring the unorganized workers in the state the benefits that union representation can deliver.

The 328 delegates also elected Roger L. Bauguss as secretary-treasurer. Bauguss, a member of the Communications Workers from Winston-Salem, succeeds James W. Hart, who did not seek re-election.

The structure of the state body's executive board was re-aligned to include 11 vice presidents representing areas that parallel the state's 11 congressional districts. The new set up is designed to coordinate increased COPE and legislative activities in the districts.

Board membership was increased from 16 to 20 members with the restructuring and 10 new vice presidents were elected to the expanded board.

Among the 80 resolutions adopted by the convention was a call for an agency shop law as the number one legislative goal of the state federation. Delegates also pressed for a program to educate the public on the hardships caused by the North Carolina "right-to-work" law.

Noting that certain employers have engaged in persistent violations of the National Labor Relations Act over the years, the convention urged Congress to adopt 11 amendments to the law to halt abuses. The resolution specifically cited J. P. Stevens & Co., the giant textile chain which is a major defense contractor despite a long string of federal labor laws violations.

Sen. Fred R. Harris (D-Okla.), one of the key speakers at the three-day convention, assailed Pres. Nixon's wage-price freeze as slanted against workers and favoring big business with a tax giveaway. Harris said Congress should enact tax breaks for individuals to balance the inequities in the Administration's new economic game plan.

The convention also endorsed a state higher education program proposed by Gov. Robert W. Scott, who appealed for labor support of the measure in his address to delegates. Scott has called a special session of the state legislature to enact the program that is designed to "insure a quality educaton for all."

Other speakers at the convention included AFL-CIO COPE Director Al Barkan and three of the five North Carolina gubernatorial candidates: Lt. Gov. H. P. Taylor (D), Hugh Morton (D) and Jim Holhouser (R).

House Dilutes Measure To Strengthen EEOC

the EEOC could do if it were unable to obtain voluntary compliance would be to bring a suit in federal district court—the lowest step in the judiciary system. And the court's findings, in turn, would be subject to two more layers of time-consuming appeals.

Only a minority of Republicans defied the party leadership on the issue and voted with the civil rights coalition. The majority against the bill was made up of the familiar conservative alliance of most Republicans and southern Democrats.

Civil rights supporters were encouraged by the closeness of the vote, which raised hopes that the House might shift its position if the Senate passes a stronger bill. Business lobbyists who aided the Administration had been predicting a 50-vote margin for the Erlenborn substitute.

After adoption of the Administration-business substitute bill, the House passed the legislation on to the Senate by a one-sided 285-106 vote. But the key record ballot on labor's scorecard was the 202-197 vote to discard the original bill in favor of the weak substitute.

The committee bill itself had bipartisan sponsorship—by Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.) and Rep. Ogden R. Reid (R-N.Y.). And it won an important GOP ally when the chairman of the Republican Policy Committee, Rep. John B. Anderson (Ill.), broke with other Republican leaders to support the bill.

Anderson acknowledged that the broad support for civil rights legislation which led to passage of the landmark legislation of the 1960s has been partially eroded.

But, he stressed, "there are still millions of Americans who have not yet achieved complete freedom and dignity. We must move and act decisively against employment discrimination."

The committee bill rejected by the House included an amendment prohibiting the EEOC from imposing racial quotas or requiring preferential treatment. Similar language is in the basic Civil Rights Act dealing with equal employment opportunity.

The effort to give the EEOC power to issue "cease and desist" enforcement orders has been pushed by the labor-civil rights coalition for years.

The House passed an enforcement bill in 1966, but it died in the Senate. Last year, the Senate passed an enforcement bill, but it was blocked in the House Rules Committee.

Management Drive:

4-Day Week 'Ploy' Bid to Cut Wages

When management spokesmen "claim to be the advocates of workers' desires," the labor movement is more than a little suspicious of the motives.

And when management seeks to get the Labor Dept. to drop requirements for overtime pay after eight hours in a day as a concession to "growing interest" in a four-day workweek, it looks suspiciously like an "employer ploy" aimed at cutting wages.

AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald told a Labor Dept. hearing that the trade union movement fought for generations to establish a maximum eight-hour day.

Studies have shown that work injuries increase and efficiency goes down when the workday is lengthened, he noted.

The departmental hearings were called in response to employer pressure for changes or exceptions to the overtime pay requirements in two laws applicable to government contractors — the Walsh - Healey Public Contracts Act and the Contract Work Hours & Safety Act.

Oswald cited to the hearing examiner the statement adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council last month, which declared in part:

"We support union and management efforts, through collective bargaining, to reduce working hours and to reschedule workweek arrangements to their mutual satisfaction. However, the eight-hour standard was achieved after decades of trade union efforts and we believe that federal laws, covering work on government contracts, must continue to protect workers against excessive hours of work per day, as well as excessive working hours per week."

Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., charged at the hearing that allowing a 10-hour day at straight time pay would be an "incredibly regressive" move.

As for employer support for abolition of the eight-hour limit, Clayman suggested a simple profit motive. A worker earning $4 an hour would, under present law, be paid $176 if he worked 40 hours in a four-day period. But if the daily eight-hour limit were removed, the employer would only have to pay him $160—and could pocket the $16 difference.

Painters Pres. S. Frank Raftery testified that a longer workday in often hazardous working environments would pose a serious threat to the health and safety of workers. The nation, he urged, should be moving instead towards a shorter workweek and stiffer penalty pay for overtime.

Earlier, the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the Metal Trades Dept. testified strongly against any relaxation of the eight-hour day ceiling.

NLRB Reports Caseload Hits All-Time High

The National Labor Relations Board set new records in the handing of unfair practice charges in the 1971 fiscal year and posted increases in nearly every type of case it deals with.

The board received 37,212 cases in fiscal 1971, up 3,631 or 10.8 percent from 1970.

The board disposed of 37,200 cases, 15 percent above the 32,353 of the year before.

The NLRB's report for the year also cited:

- 23,770 unfair labor practice charges received, a rise of 13 percent.
- An increase of 7 percent in employe representation cases to 12,965.
- 806 decisions by the 5-member board in unfair practice cases, 21 percent higher than the 668 of 1970.
- An increase in unfair practice decisions by trial examiners of 4 percent, to 927.
- The closing of 4,209 cases by NLRB regional offices, an increase of about 4 percent.
- Issuance of 2,533 formal complaints by the NLRB general counsel, up 18 percent.
- Receipt of 372 decisions of U.S. Circuit Courts of Appeals, a rise of 16 percent, dealing with enforcement and review of board orders. About 87 percent of the decisions affirmed the board's orders, compared with 84 percent the year before.

UNION LABEL WEEK proclamation is signed in Philadelphia by Mayor James H. J. Tate, typical of actions taken by governors and mayors across the country. Pres. Edward F. Toohey, center, and Sec.-Treas. Lawrence R. Stoltz of the Philadelphia Council AFL-CIO witness the signing. The AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. observed Union Label Week Sept. 6-12.

Sacrifice of U.S. Jobs:

Labor Dissent Hits Trade Proposals

because international business and banking operations make such theories out of date.

"Nor do we believe that the choice is between 'open channels of trade and investment' or a 'drift down the road of economic nationalism and regional blocs.' These slogans have little relevance to present realities in international trade and investment.

"We reject the recommendation that 'capital controls are not in the U.S. interest and have become increasingly ineffective,' and that existing, minimal capital, controls should be phased out."

The choices and recommendations offered by the commission are totally unrealistic to meet the current international economic problems, Abel and Smith stressed.

"They ignore the pressing need for action at home to help America's economic position in the world. These are the answers from the 1930s, the 1940s and the 1950s and they will inevitably fail to cope with the outrush of production and jobs from the United States."

Abel and Smith observed that current-day realities are that nations with managed economies subsidize exports, establish barriers to imports, adjust their currency values and change their tax structures to benefit their national interests.

They noted that while the commission acknowledged these conditions, it failed to come up with any practical solutions.

A sharp rise in foreign investment by U.S. companies—climbing from $3.8 billion in 1960 to an estimated $15.3 billion in 1971—caused the rapid transfer of American technology, production and employment to foreign operations, Abel and Smith pointed out.

Yet, they said, the commission recommended "further freedom for unrestricted capital and technology outflows with government subsidy."

The commision, headed by Albert L. Williams, board chairman of International Business Machines Corp., issued 147 recommendations in its report. Seventeen of the 27 members represented business and banking firms. The remainder came from universities, agriculture and the public as well as labor.

As an alternative to the recommendations of the commision, the two labor represenatives proposed a 9-point program adopted earlier this year by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

That program calls for:

- New tax measures for multinational corporations to halt the export of U.S. production and jobs and the removal of tax and tariff incentives for the transfer of production abroad.
- Capital outflow to be curbed, supervised and regulated by the U.S. government, just as other countries influence the investment of their firms.
- Government controls on the export of U.S. technology.
- The incorporation of international fair labor standards in all trade agreements.
- Import quotas to maintain a productive and varied U.S. economy.
- Consumer protection through "truth-in-labeling" arrangements with other countries.
- Full enforcement of U.S. consumer protection laws on imported goods.
- Federal standards for international accounting by U.S. firms with foreign operations.
- Strengthening of the Antidumping Act and liberalizing the escape clause of the Trade Expansion Act.

NATIONAL PRESS CLUB in Washington is picketed by members of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes who walked off their jobs when the club management refused to negotiate a new contract. The union was willing to extend the contract that expired Sept. 1 until Nov. 15, after Pres. Nixon's wage-price freeze runs out. Management demanded a one-year extension of the old contract.

Youth Conference Narrows Gap On Labor's Role in Social Change

Berkeley, Calif.—"Students don't generally recognize that there is no more important force for domestic social change in this country than the labor movement," remarked a California student body president as he summed up a youth institute held here with the aim of bridging a "knowledge gap" between students and workers.

More than 100 student activists exchanged views with top ranking union officials at the meeting, which was sponsored by the League for Industrial Democracy.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland highlighted the two-day conference with a discussion of the trade union movement as a democratic institution.

"Our organization has no secret police, no FBI, no gun with which to enforce policy," Kirkland observed, "but in spite of this autonomy, the movement has reached a consensus on a broader program of basic social reform than ever before in its history."

Other speakers included Norman Hill of the A. Philip Randolph Institute; Pres. Raul Teilhet of the California Federation of Teachers; AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director Don Slaiman, Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller and Research Director Nat Goldfinger; Maclovio Barraza, Steelworkers' political action director for the Southwest; William DuChessi, legislative director of the Textile Workers Union of America; and Pete Guidry and Don Vial of the Center for Labor Research of the University of California at Berkeley.

The participants included young trade unionists and minority youth as well as students. Many had been invited by Frontlash, a non-partisan, labor-oriented youth group working on voter registration among 18 to 21-year-olds.

Coalition politics—unifying workers, minorities, youth and liberals around their common interests—was a major theme of the conference.

"We don't ask for 100 percent conformity with our views," DuChessie observed as he urged students to be equally tolerant and to seek areas of mutual agreement.

"Coalition is the key to progressive social change in this country," added Barraza, a longtime veteran of political and union struggles in the Southwest.

He rejected suggestions of an all Mexican-American political party. "Coalition, not isolation, is the answer," he said, citing several successful examples of coalition politics in Colorado and Los Angeles.

In a discussion on racism, Slaiman urged the participants to approach the issue as a problem to be solved to improve unions, not as a device to undermine the labor movement.

"Otherwise," he said, "you play into the hands of those who wish to divide black and white workers in order to weaken the bargaining power of the unions."

Slaiman strongly defended unions as being the most highly integrated institutions in American society today.

On another theme—union power—Goldfinger acknowledged that "we do have some power—a sort of veto power—but we certainly are not powerful compared to the corporate elite."

Teilhet blamed the anti-union bias in the media and school text books for much of the problems in reaching a rational youth-labor dialogue. And, he reported, unionized teachers are working to help eliminate that bias.

Student response during the discussions was mostly favorable, but did include several arguments.

The AFL-CIO was criticized for not supporting the Farm Workers Heublein boycott and for its position on the upcoming trip to China by Nixon.

Kirkland explained that the federation's structure cannot automatically endorse an action by a member union and that consultation and adherence to procedures must take place beforehand.

He also pointed out that the basic principle of AFL-CIO foreign policy was the creation and the protection of free trade unions, coupled with opposition to governments which annihilate independent unions.

Many of the students indicated satisfaction in obtaining another point of view on a number of usually unquestioned assumptions students hold about labor.

One participant registered surprise at the radical implications of Biemiller's statement that "intelligent government planning to utilize the economic resources of the country for social needs instead of corporate needs" was a major goal of the AFL-CIO.

A third student pointed out that "the very fact these labor leaders would take time to see us indicates they have a greater interest in students than most people realize."

CONFLICTS RELATED to the proposed seating of Communist China in the United Nations are discussed by Shui Hsian-Yun, left, general secretary of the Chinese Federation of Labor, and Director Jay Lovestone of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs. Shui is leading a team of trade union leaders from Nationalist China on a tour of the United States.

Michigan Daily Rejects Furniture Strikers' Ad

Monroe, Mich.—The Monroe Evening News has refused to run a paid advertisement giving the union side of a Furniture Workers' strike against the La-Z-Boy Chair Co., the strikers charged.

UFW District Director Lowell Daily displayed a receipt signed by the Monroe paper's business manager for a display ad to be run in mid-August at a cost of $67.20. But, he reported, after the Evening News took the money it reneged on running the ad.

Daily said the ad is "merely a reasoned explanation of the events which led to the strike" in Monroe and in La-Z-Boy's Florence, S.C., plant.

The paper questioned the union's ad copy on the ground that it might be libelous, and wanted to censor sections quoting the company's financial statement on profits and income and management's offer to the union in contract negotiations, the union said.

UFW Pres. Fred Fulford said the Monroe News "makes no pretense of being impartial." La-Z-Boy Chair Co. is an important advertiser and the company president is a "big wheel" in Monroe and other towns where the firm has plants, he reported.

Union members went on strike Aug. 2 in Monroe and Aug. 3 in Florence. The UFW posted pickets at other company plants in Newton, Miss., Neosho, Mo., and Redlands, Calif., where organizing drives had begun. Also it filed unfair labor practice charges at four locations where management is accused of firings and threats. A company charge of unlawful secondary boycott at a Mississippi warehouse was dismissed by the National Labor Relations Board, Fulford noted.

The UFW has about 500 members in Monroe who had been covered by a union contract for 15 years when the company made what it called a "liberal" offer in negotiations—an offer that "didn't even equal the rise in living costs," according to Fulford.

Another 500 employes of the newly organized plant at Florence were given an offer of 10 cents an hour more in wages, and were told "take it or leave it." The workers are still on the picket line, and La-Z-Boy products have been put on the "Do Not Patronize" list of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

Full support for the strikers was urged on all union members by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its recent meeting in San Francisco. The council noted that UFWA members were "forced to strike to gain reasonable wages and working conditions" after five fruitless months of contract talks.

Urges Rejection:

Meany Condemns Tax Giveaway Plan

here for those Americans who have been laid off in war-geared industries."

Meany urged the Ways & Means Committee to reject this "giant raid on the federal Treasury" and at the same time to pass legislation voiding the new rapid depreciation tax rule the Administration issued earlier this year which gave away an estimated $4 billion a year in revenues.

As for other portions of the President's latest tax proposals, Meany had these comments:

- Labor opposes, as it did last year, the Administration proposal to allow companies to defer indefinitely paying taxes on profits from exports sold through a new form of subsidiary to be called DISC, for Domestic International Sales Corp.

Companies would save hundreds of millions of dollars a year on taxes without any requirement that they increase their export sales, Meany noted. And, he stressed, as in the case of all other proposed loopholes the loss in tax revenue would have to be made up by higher taxes on incomes or a cutback in government services.

- Labor endorses the proposal to eliminate the 7 percent excise tax on automobiles "provided the consumer receives the full benefit."

Meany told the committee that "the sooner the federal government gets out of the sales-tax business the better."

- Advancing by one year—from 1973 to 1972—the already scheduled increase in the personal income tax deduction of $50 for each dependent "is a small, one-shot tax relief proposal . . . calculated to obscure the impact of huge corporate tax giveaways."

It would give a family with an income of $10,000 a year a one-time tax break about equal to the tax writeoff a corporation would receive on the purchase of a single electric typewriter.

Commenting on other aspects of the Nixon new economic policy, Meany noted that the 10 percent border tax on imports "is no more than a temporary stopgap" and "totally inadequate" as a solution to trade problems.

"It is honeycombed with exemptions and does nothing at all to control the operations of the multinational corporations and international banks, mostly based in the U.S., that are exporting American jobs, capital and technology."

Furthermore, Meany stressed, the President proposes to make up for the "tax bonanza" to big business by:

- Taking money from the poor through delay in welfare reform.
- Withholding money from federal employes that they have already earned by delaying scheduled wage increases an additional six months.
- Slashing federal employment by 5 percent, eliminating 100,000 jobs.
- Holding back financial assistance promised to cities and states.

The money Pres. Nixon proposes to hand over to business in tax windfalls, Meany declared, is needed to meet the nation's urgent needs.

"America needs schools and hospitals, parks and recreation areas," he said.

"America needs a vast expansion of medical facilities . . . 25 million new housing units . . . low-cost transit systems in every major city . . . new waste disposal systems."

And, he stressed, this public investment is necessary to put the unemployed to work and give them the purchasing power "to buy the goods of plants now idle."

The work of tax reform wasn't completed by the 1969 amendments, Meany noted. He urged action by Congress to close the capital-gains loophole, repeal the oil depletion allowance and eliminate other special preferences that still allow the wealthiest Americans to escape paying a fair share of taxes.

A special supplement to Meany's testimony warned against the risk in one proposal advanced in Congress with the intent of increasing take-home pay—a postponement in the scheduled rise in the social security taxable wage base next year.

Such a move, the AFL-CIO warned, would endanger the hospital insurance trust fund used to finance the Medicare program.

A more effective and preferable way to increase spending power, the federation testimony suggested, would be to advance the effective date of social security benefit increases provided in a House-passed bill or to increase the benefit hike.

TAX PROGRAM of the Nixon Administration would give billions to the richest corporations at the expense of the nation's needs, the AFL-CIO charged. Federation Pres. George Meany and Research Director Nat Goldfinger go over testimony at House Ways & Means Committee hearings.

'Thanks, But No Thanks!'

British Labor Presses Opposition to New Law

Blackpool, England—Delegates to the 103rd British Trades Union Congress took a strong stand against cooperation with a new industrial relations law enacted by the Conservative Government.

The annual convention of Britain's labor federation voted to "instruct" its affiliates not to register under the new law.

Unions failing to register may lose their present tax exemption, be subject to unlimited fines for violation of new unfair labor practice regulations, and would be denied a place on the ballot under a new representation election system similar to the United States pattern.

The TUC general council—the federation's executive board—had proposed a resolution "strongly advising" affiliates not to register. The delegates substituted the stronger "instruct" motion by a 5-4 margin. But they overwhelmingly voted down a motion calling for expulsion of unions that do register.

The TUC resolution agreed that "sound legislation" will be needed to replace the union-opposed law and proposed that "immediate discussions" be held with the executive committee of the British Labor Party "to work out proposals to form the basis of such legislation."

The controversial issue of whether Britain should join the European Common Market on the terms endorsed by the Government was debated. But by a decisive voice vote, the TUC opposed entry on those terms and called for a general election before any final decision is reached.

A number of resolutions dealt with issues familiar to American union conventions.

Thus, there was concern voiced over a rising rate of industrial accidents and a call for safety legislation and increased benefits for job-related disabilities such as the "black lung" disease of coal miners.

A minimum wage was proposed, with the amount raised over the earlier target set by the TUC council.

A resolution protested government wage restraints that discriminate against public sector workers, and the convention applauded a delegate who warned that "an attack on wages in the public sector is also an attack on wages in the private sector."

Victor Feather, TUC's general secretary, reported that affiliated membership had passed the 10 million mark to the highest point in Britain's history. Part of the 600,000 rise over the past year came from the affiliation of the National Union of Teachers.

Feather continues as the TUC's chief executive officer. The federation's general council, meeting after the congress, chose George F. Smith, secretary of the Woodworkers & Painters, for the one-year term as president of TUC.

He succeeds Lord Cooper, the head of the General & Municipal Workers, who served during the past year and presided at the congress.

Service Employes Win Chicago Unit

Chicago—Employes of the Cook County Hospital voted overwhelmingly for Service Employes Local 46 in a representation election.

The 2,400-employe unit of one of the nation's largest county hospitals cast nearly 1,900 votes in the election, with the SEIU local garnering 75 percent of the total.

SEIU still faces runoff elections for two smaller units, guards and clerical employes.

The 2,400 workers, all county employes, included nurse's aides, laboratory assistants, food service, laundry, housekeeping, custodial and maintenance employes.

Detention Act Repeal Voted By Congress

der presidential emergency powers without due process of law.

This prohibition was clearly aimed at barring any repetition of the World War II roundup of families of Japanese descent and their removal to "relocation camps." Congressmen from both sides of the aisle joined in terming the relocation of Japanese-Americans a blot on the nation's heritage.

Labor, which opposed the 1950 law, strongly supported the repeal action.

A letter to House members from AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller termed the repeal "long overdue."

The law served no useful purpose, Biemiller stressed, and "on the contrary has been a constant threat to the liberties and freedoms of all our citizens."

He termed any type of detention authority "completely unacceptable" and urged retention in the bill of the provision guaranteeing that no American shall be imprisoned or detained "except in conformity with procedures specified by law."

Floor leader for the repeal bill was Rep. Spark M. Matsunaga (D-Hawaii), decorated and twice-wounded veteran of the Nisei infantry battalion that fought with distinction in Europe during World War II.

"There is no place for concentration camps in the American scene," Matsunaga urged. No one else, he said, should ever be treated as Japanese-Americans were during World War II.

44 Senators Protest School Lunch Slash

A proposed multi-million-dollar cutback in the federal school lunch and breakfast programs was strongly protested by 44 senators who wrote Pres. Nixon that the action would mean "there will continue to be hungry children in America's schools."

In March, the letter noted, the Agriculture Dept. said the federal government would contribute up to 60 cents for each free and reduced-price meal served in school cafeterias.

But on Aug. 13, the department said the federal contribution would have a 35-cent ceiling.

The senators asked maximum reimbursement, noting that the current proposals would have a disastrous effect on the school lunch and breakfast programs and will "pose a very real threat to the continued progress of the National School Lunch Program"

The letter was drafted by Senators Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) and Marlow Cook (R-Ky.).

The law on which the program is based states that "any child who is a member of a household which has an annual income not above the applicable family-size income level set forth in the income poverty guidelines shall be served meals free or at a reduced cost."

The senators noted that the states could not make up the loss in federal revenues and "will have no alternative but to reduce planned participation" to stay within the limits of available funds.

The effect on the breakfast program could be even more calamitous, the letter to Nixon pointed out. It noted, as an example, that the state of Kentucky will have to cancel the breakfast program at the beginning of October unless more money is allocated.

Nixon Economic Policies Top Labor Target in '72

Consumers Suffer More Price Hikes

The Consumer Price Index jumped a seasonally adjusted four-tenths of 1 percent during August—double the previous month's increase, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

But the BLS said the increase doesn't mean that the current partial price freeze has had no effect "because the August index is based on prices collected both before and after the announcement of the wage-price freeze on Aug. 15."

Leading last month's advance in prices was a whopping 3.7 percent increase in the cost of gasoline—the sharpest increase in more than a year.

The increase prompted Sen. William D. Proxmire (D-Wis.) chairman of Congress Joint Economic Committee to charge that the Administration indirectly tipped off gasoline companies to boost their prices before the freeze.

The White House denied the charge.

On an actual basis, the CPI rose three-tenths of 1 percent, and the index reached 122.2 in August. It meant that consumers were paying $12.22 for the same cross section of goods and services which cost them $10 in 1967, or just $11.69 a year ago.

And the BLS said it would take $14.21 today to buy the same items and services that cost $10 in the 1957-59 period.

A 63-cent increase over the month in real spendable earnings was reported for the average worker with three dependents, but the worker's purchasing power was still less than in 1968.

The annual rate of change in the CPI during the past six months was put at 4.3 percent compared with 4.8 percent for the six months ended in February and 4.9 percent in the six months ended in August 1970.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson said the statistics "reflect this year's trend to lower levels than last year's plus 5 percent rise."

"Pres. Nixon's recent wage-price freeze assures a continuance of this," Hodgson told newsmen.

The labor secretary said that housewives should be "particularly happy" that there was no rise in food prices during August.

AFL-CIO Calls Delegates to 9th Convention

The AFL-CIO issued its official call to the federation's Ninth Constitutional Convention, to be held at the Americana Hotel in Bal Harbour, Fla., starting Nov. 18—just five days after the President's 90-day wage-price freeze is scheduled to end.

As the call was issued, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland noted, "no one knows what further steps the President will decree."

But, they stressed, the implications of the President's economic policies "will require the careful deliberation and thoughtful action" of the delegates.

The convention will bring together delegates from 116 international and national unions, two organizing committees, six trade

NEW VOTERS are registered at one of the mobile registration units set up by the New York City Central Labor Council and Frontlash, an organization of concerned young people cooperating with the trade union movement. The united activities of the two groups resulted in signing up 47,583 new voters in the city.

1970 Study Reveals:

10% of U.S. Families Trapped in Poverty

Ten percent of America's families lived in poverty during 1970, according to a new Labor Dept. fact sheet.

It listed 5.2 million families officially classified as impoverished—264,000 more than in 1969, reversing a decade of decline.

Poverty households also included 10.5 million children, representing 15 percent of the total population under the age of 18.

The report, based on the latest census data, showed that families headed by a woman had 4.5 times the rate of poverty for families headed by a man. And the percentage of Negro families living in poverty was 3.5 times the white rate—even though more whites than blacks were below the poverty level.

High poverty rates were reported among large families and those headed by a person who is either under 25 or over 64, by a school dropout, by a service worker, farmer, laborer or by an unemployed worker.

The government classifies as poor, nonfarm households where total money income is less than $1,954 for a single person, and less than $2,525 for a couple, and $3,968 for a family of four.

But the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research noted that the poverty level for a family of four has been pushed upwards considerably by sharp consumer price increases.

A 4.4 percent increase in the Consumer Price Index in the 12 months ended July 1971, raised a family of four's poverty breakout point to $4,143.

And if income is from work, the wage earner needs an additional $365 for social security and federal income taxes, bringing the level to $4,508.

In terms of hourly earnings, $4,508 would translate to $2.25 an hour, for 50 weeks at 40 hours a week. If 52 weeks were worked, the hourly wage needed would be $2.17.

The current minimum wage of $1.60 an hour provides full-time earnings of $3,328 a year. The minimum for farm workers at $1.30

Meany, Kirkland Hit President's Record

America's labor leaders hammered away at the Nixon Administration's mishandling of the nation's economy and pledged an all-out 1972 political campaign against the President's record of shattered promises and wrong judgments.

Instead of jobs for the unemployed and help for the cities, the nation is being fed more "propaganda, promises . . . and plain old baloney," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged.

"We can't bring prosperity to this country by rubbing more fat onto the fat cats," Meany said to loud applause from convention delegates representing 600,000 members of the Laborers.

And speaking to a Woodworkers convention the following day, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland served notice that the labor movement won't stand idly by while the President and his "game planners" reverse America's progress.

"Over the next 14 months, labor will be mounting the greatest political education and voter registration campaign ever," Kirkland said.

"Our aim," he said, "will be to retire the business-oriented game planners who have caused this mess, and to see that America has leaders who put the interests of all the people above private greed."

Meany said labor could not support the President's program for postponing $1.3 billion in wage increases for federal employes, cutting out welfare reform and aid to the cities, while promoting a $3 billion tax credit to big business for capital investment as a "job development tax credit."

The tax credit isn't tied to creation of new jobs, Meany emphasized. It is a tax break for all purchases of new equipment—even if companies planned to buy the new equipment anyway.

"So the idea was, if you make the big corporations a little healthier, a little fatter, a little wealthier, some of this will

7% Tax Aid To Business Gets Okay

A somewhat modified version of the Nixon Administration's tax proposals has been approved by the House Ways & Means Committee and is expected to be sent to the House floor in early October under a no amendment rule.

The key features of the Administration plan have been sharply criticized by labor as a "giveaway" to corporations—at the expense of the ordinary taxpayer and the nation's need for government services.

In the version approved by the committee—subject to a final vote after the actual legislative language is drafted—corporations still stand to reap multi-billion dollar tax windfalls. But the committee trimmed back some of the provisions and added to the Administration's thin package of relief for lower-income taxpayers.

Two of the biggest handouts to business remained virtually intact, however.

The committee voted for a permanent 7 percent investment tax credit—in effect forcing the government to pay part of the cost of all equipment purchased by a company.

Originally, the Administration asked for a 10 percent credit this year and a 5 percent credit next

Safeguards for Women Supported In 'Rights' Amendment Proposal

A protective clause added by the House Judiciary Committee has won an AFL-CIO endorsement for a proposed "equal rights" for women amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The committee specified that the amendment couldn't deprive Congress or the states of the power to enact legislation "which reasonably promotes the health and safety" of workers.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller wrote a group of House members that the AFL-CIO supports a constitutional ban on laws and practices that discriminate against women.

But he stressed that "we do not believe that rights and benefits presently enjoyed by women workers should be sacrificed. The rights and benefits enjoyed by women workers under state labor laws are of great importance in low-wage industries such as apparel manufacturing, hotels and restaurants, and retail trade and service in which women workers predominate."

Biemiller urged that these protections "should be preserved and strengthened, not simply wiped out by a blunderbuss constitutional amendment."

Also added by the House Judiciary Committee was an amendment authorizing continued exemption of women from the draft law

Women's organizations that have been most active in promoting an "equal rights" amendment have opposed any change or qualification, including a draft exemption, in the original language declaring that

Fosco Re-Elected:

Laborers Set Out Organizing Goals

By Tom Castor

Miami Beach—Laborers Pres. Peter Fosco began his first full five-year term as head of the 600,000-member union with total organizing of the construction industry as the first and major goal of his administration.

"Give me your full cooperation and complete support and in the next few years we shall organize the work in the building and construction industry for our membership like this international union has never organized before," he told the more than 2,300 delegates.

Fosco, who was elected president by the international's executive board in 1968 to succeed Pres. Joseph V. Moreschi, said such an organizing drive would apply to "not only commercial and industrial construction, but highway and utilities, residential, rehabilitation, demolition, and landscaping."

Success in such a campaign, he said, would "secure the future for this international union, its affiliates and our membership."

He said the union already has begun effective organizing in the public employe field, "selecting specific targets from among housing authorities, service contractors, and federal, city and state blue-collar workers."

Fosco charted the success of organizing efforts in the past three years in which employes in concrete products and manufactured housing industries have been signed up.

Other aims listed by Fosco were:

- A national agreement to rehabilitate housing with the federal government.
- Release of $12 billion in appropriated federal funds which would finance $20 billion of needed construction. Fosco said he would propose that the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. hold a national conference to map strategy for prying lose the funds.
- Activation of state bodies of the Laborers National Political League because the wage-price freeze has taught the union, Fosco said, "that all the gains we made at the collective bargaining table can be taken away from us in the political arena. We must understand the urgency to become deeply involved in all aspects of our political life."
- Vigorous enforcement of federal job safety provisions.
- Additional job training and upgrading programs for Laborers.

Fosco, Sec.-Treas. Terence J. O'Sullivan and eight internatinal vice presidents were re-elected without opposition.

The delegates, representing 860 locals from across the United States and Canada, heard AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany describe the new Nixon economics as "propaganda, promises and plain old baloney."

A battery of Cabinet members at the convention tried to portray the Nixon economic program in a more favorable light.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson received a markedly cool reception as he told the delegates it was particularly heartening "how the American public—all segments of the public, including workers—has been so willing to accept the idea (of the wage-price freeze) and so quick to cooperate. Every poll has shown this."

Transportation Sec. John A. Volpe insisted that more people are working today than ever before and that they are receiving the highest salaries ever and saving more money.

Sec. George Romney of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development "thanked" the Laborers delegates on behalf of the President for "their cooperation" in the wage-price freeze and said the country needs a disciplined economy.

"There are only two ways to discipline an economy: one is competition, the other is absolute authority," said Romney, as to indicate that the Administration favors competition.

Unity Stressed In Aerospace Negotiations

The Machinists and the Auto Workers will meet in Los Angeles Oct. 2 to draft a plan to help 90,000 aerospace workers "get equity and fair treatment despite the unfair Nixon wage freeze," their presidents announced.

IAM Pres. Floyd Smith and UAW Pres. Leonard Woodcock told a Washington press conference that progress in negotiations with four big aerospace manufacturers has been "nil" since Pres. Nixon announced his wage-price order.

They said "we are calling a joint meeting of the local leaders" of unions in the four companies—Lockheed, McDonald Douglas, Boeing and North American Rockwell. Locals from other aerospace locations also will be invited to send representatives.

They said they "intend to see that aerospace workers do not lose out because of the accident of an arbitrary date set by Pres. Nixon. . . . They cannot be penalized because their contracts expired a few weeks later or earlier than contracts in other industries."

By Oct. 2, union contracts with all four corporations will have passed their expiration date. Negotiations have been under way in some cases since May, the two unions said.

Stereotypers To Continue Merger Talks

Indianapolis—The Stereotypers voted overwhelmingly at their 68th convention to continue negotiations with the Printing Pressmen for a merger agreement.

Pres. Alexander J. Rohan of the Pressmen, who addressed the convention, predicted a successful conclusion of the negotiations, now in the second year.

Delegates voted 85-19 in favor of continuing the merger talks.

The convention condemned Pres. Nixon's freeze order as unfair to workers and loaded in favor of big business. The wage freeze, a policy statement noted, provides no process to implement negotiated agreements.

A convention resolution called for congressional passage of the National Health Security program to provide a health care system which all Americans can afford.

No election was held at this year's convention and Pres. James H. Sampson and Sec.-Treas. Frank C. Creamer will continue in office. Denver was chosen as the 1972 convention site.

AFL-CIO Cites Crisis Of Older Workers

Finding suitable employment for older workers, especially those who are disabled, is "difficult" when economic conditions are good and is "virtually impossible" in times of high unemployment, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman told a platform meeting for the White House Conference on Aging.

The meeting was held to prepare statements on vocational rehabilitation policy for the White House Conference, scheduled for Washington Nov. 28 to Dec. 2.

Seidman told the platform meeting that the best way to insure broader opportunities for the old and the handicapped would be the "achievement of a full employment economy."

"A program to provide jobs for the handicapped at the expense of those presently employed is not a satisfactory program," he declared, "but neither should we attempt to relieve unemployment by excluding older and disabled people from the labor market."

A fault of today's society, he said, is that it prescribes roles for its members to play only until they reach their later years, when there is "no preparation nor a clear role—just a hazy picture of gray heads and rocking chairs."

Seidman questioned "whether employment of older workers should be almost totally the responsibility of the private profit sector of the economy."

"There is a dire need," he said, "to enlist older Americans in public service projects that would help their own communities become better places to live.

"We all know in our own communities of the unmet need for socially useful and economically necessary activities that do not lend themselves to private enterprise, but nevertheless could provide employment opportunities which would have great value to both older workers and society."

He criticized existing federal programs for the aged as lacking "real coordination" and for overlapping and duplicating functions.

"The chances of rehabilitation and re-employment of a physically or mentally handicapped individual are minimized when he is also socially handicapped by unemployment, economic deprivation, discrimination and prejudice," Seidman stressed.

Risdon Dies at 52, Official of LPIU

Walter F. Risdon, vice president of the Lithographers & Photoengravers in charge of the union's legislative and union label committees, died at 52 of a heart attack. His death closed a union executive board meeting he had been attending and canceled a national legislative conference he had arranged to start Sept. 20.

Funeral services were held Sept. 22 at Columbia Baptist Church, Falls Church, Va. His wife Virginia and two daughters survive.

Risdon was a photoengraver at the former Washington Times Herald and the Bureau of Engraving & Printing before his election to union office. As LPIU vice president he also headed the union's technological development committee.

'Equal Rights' Support Keyed To Safeguards

"equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex."

The controversy over the amendment has centered on whether it is necessary to strike down laws intended to protect women against exploitation and harsh working conditions in order to protect them against various forms of legal discrimination such as state restrictions on married women owning or setting up businesses.

Last year, the constitutional amendment was forced to the House floor by a discharge petition and passed overwhelmingly under a procedure barring any changes in the wording. But it died when the Senate added qualifying language exempting women from the draft and the groups pushing the amendment withdrew their support.

The protective language supported by the AFL-CIO was added by the House Judiciary Committee on a 19-16 vote on a motion by Rep. Charles E. Wiggins (R-Calif.).

Opponents of the change have served notice they will seek to strike out the additional language on the House floor.

If the safeguard clause is eliminated, Biemiller said, the AFL-CIO "would be compelled to oppose" the amendment.

Breakthrough Contract Signed by Upholsterers

Austin, Tex.—The Upholsterers signed a first contract with Economy Furniture, Inc., achieved after a three-year struggle that included an unfair-labor-practice strike.

Union members in the company plant here ratified agreement terms unanimously, Pres. Sal B. Hoffmann said in a letter of thanks to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and all who helped the workers win union protection and a contract.

Almost all the members are Americans of Mexican descent. Hoffmann said their struggle "may in some small way have demonstrated to workers in the Southwest" that through organization into bona fide labor unions "they can start on a path which will lead to their fuller participation" in the democratic process.

The UIU won bargaining rights by an overwhelming majority vote of workers in May 1968. They walked out six months later in a strike found by the National Labor Relations Board to have been caused by management's refusal to bargain in good faith.

The company appealed to the courts and began to bargain only after the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans ordered it to negotiate. The strike was called off six months ago after the court ruling.

During the strike, the AFL-CIO Executive Council rallied the labor movement in support of UIU Local 456. It charged in a 1969 statement that management not only refused to bargain but also "engaged in name calling" with particular emphasis on the Mexican-American background of the employes.

The federation started a strike relief fund with a $10,000 conrtibution and urged all unions to contribute.

Oppose Compulsory Arbitration:

Rail, Airline Unions Seek Selective Strike Amendment

Railroad and airline unions urged an amendment to the Railway Labor Act that will permit selective strikes and provide "real collective bargaining," instead of a compulsory arbitration plan favored by the Administration.

Pres. James E. Yost of the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept. said the six shopcraft unions he represents support a pending bill that would bar nationwide strikes but preserve the right of railroad workers to conduct selective strikes. He told a House subcommittee that the right to strike is essential to true freedom.

Edward J. Hickey, Jr., general counsel for the Railway Labor Executives Association, representing the shopcrafts and eight other unions, said all the unions oppose the Nixon Administration's emergency proposals for handling labor disputes and believe they would bring more disputes, not fewer.

Pres. John J. O'Donnell of the Air Line Pilots submitted a statement saying the Railway Labor Act amendments favored by the Air Transport Association, and the Administration, would "inhibit reasonable free play between the parties" to contract negotiations.

Under one "option" in the Administration plan, an arbitrator would be required to choose intact between the "final" contract proposals of labor and management.

Yost and Hickey both urged the subcommittee to act favorably on a bill sponsored by Chairman Harley Stagggers (D-W.Va.) of the House Commerce Committee, and others, and to oppose the Administration proposal for Railway Labor Act amendments.

The legislation proposed by the Administration, Yost said, "goes much too far to remedy the defects which it states now exist" and would if enacted "needlessly curtail" the benefits of the present law and endanger the legitimate interests of railway and airline employes.

Yost testified that in the 45 years the Railway Labor Act has been in effect, there have been "only three nationwide rail strikes, each lasting but a few days, and only one major airline strike."

He told the subcommittee "there have been only seven instances in this total period of 45 years where it has been necessary for the President or the Congress to intervene."

Hickey listed the shortcomings in the Administration's proposed amendments and said they would aggravate congressional problems with rail labor disputes, instead of lessening them as Labor Dept. spokesmen contend.

"We have heard the Railway Labor Act blamed over the years as the cause of breakdowns in negotiations, long delays in reaching argeement," stretched-out mediation efforts and "ultimately the intervention of the Congress," Hickey declared.

"It is not really the fault of the Act . . . The essential ingredient of a practical and effective way for the rail unions to strike has been missing."

Under present law the employers could maintain an "inflexible position" in negotiations "secure in the knowledge . . . that the President and Congress would not permit a national shutdown and the dispute would be settled by . . . high level arbitration," the witness testified.

What has been "sorely needed" is an "effective incentive for real collective bargaining" as in industries like steel and automobiles. The whole process will "come alive and quicken if a genuine right to strike by employes is legislated," Hickey said.

Leaders of other transportation unions are scheduled to testify as the hearings continue.

SUMMER JOBS were found by the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute for 538 Philadelphia inner city teenagers—including Veleda Broaddus, right—through a Neighborhood Youth Corps program sponsored by the Negro Trade Union Leadership Council. Veleda was assigned to the HRDI regional office, where she is assisted by secretary Mary Howe. Twelve AFL-CIO unions were among the employers participating in summer hiring programs.

Black Unionists Urged To Press for Unity

Philadelphia—Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel urged black workers to "become forceful spokesmen for unity" and to "speak out firmly against any activity that promotes racial polarization." The only course of action that would cure the ills of America must come through "a coalition of Negroes, liberals and the trade union movement," he declared.

Abel's remarks were delivered at a testimonial honoring his retiring assistant and 30-year staff veteran, James H. Jones.

Citing unemployment in the ghettos, rotting inner cities, inadequate health care, and poor schools, Abel insisted that "there is no hope for America if black people, liberals and the labor movement go their separate ways."

Abel went on to compare Jones with A. Philip Randolph, telling the packed hotel ballroom that both of the men "convinced many black people to assume their rightful role in society by becoming active in the labor movement."

The audience heard Jones honored for his work in civic affairs, education, race relations, juvenile delinquency, voter registration and praised by Abel for developing a USWA program for equal job opportunity "long before the civil rights movement gained the prominence that it has today."

The tribute to Jones was jointly sponsored by the USWA, the Negro Trade Union Leadership Council and the State of Israel Bonds.

Woodcock Hits 'Inequities' of Nixon Policies

The Nixon Administration's new economic policy is "rife with inequities," Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock charged.

Testifying before the congressional Joint Economic Committee, Woodcock said Pres. Nixon's proposed "tax giveaways" to corporations "will have little, if any, effect in reducing the present intolerable level of unemployment."

A similar point had been made by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in earlier testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee.

Woodcock proposed an "income equalization tax" if the second phase of the Administration's economic stabilization program involves continued restraints on wages with corresponding curbs on other forms of income.

He suggested a special tax that would keep profits, dividends, capital gains and other non-wage income from rising faster than the average increase in wages.

Discussing the "phase two" policy—after expiration of the 90-day wage-price freeze—Woodcock stressed the trade union movement's position that stabilization decisions be made by voluntary agreement of labor and management "with deadlocks broken by public members who are independent of any form of government control and whose impartiality and integrity is beyond question."

House Panel Approves Modified Nixon Tax Bill

year. But the committee opted for a flat 7 percent—with no expiration, date.

And despite the fact that Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) had echoed some of labor's criticism of the big handout the Administration gave to business by rewriting the tax depreciation rules earlier this year, the committee wrote the windfall into permanent law. Efforts to trim back the amount were voted down.

In another area, the committee did cut back on the heavily criticized proposal to allow companies to defer indefinitely taxes on profits from exports sold through specially created subsidiaries. The committee limited the tax deferral to exports exceeding 75 percent of the average of the past three years, substantially reducing the revenue loss to the Treasury.

To sweeten the package, the committee made a $25 increase in personal income tax exemptions effective this year, instead of next year as the Administration had proposed. And it voted to raise the minimum standard deduction for lower income families along with other changes that will provide modest reductions to individuals and families.

One effect would be to remove additional low-income families from the tax rolls.

While the Administration indicated it would have preferred its original package—and especially its version of the export subsidy—Treasury Sec. John B. Connally praised the Ways & Means Committee for acting "so promptly and affirmatively" on the Administration program.

The committee-approved package also includes the non-controversial retroactive repeal of the 7 percent excise tax on automobiles. And the committee added a similar repeal of the 10 percent excise tax on light trucks, effective Sept. 23.

Mills said the committee will take its final vote on the package bill Sept. 28, with the expectation of bringing it to the House floor about Oct. 5.

Union Winner in South Dakota Vote

Sioux Falls, S.D.—Maintenance and engineering employes of the State Highway Dept. voted for the State, County & Municipal Employes in the first state-wide employes' election in South Dakota history.

The vote was 780 in favor of representation by AFSCME Local 1922, and 240 against. Some 150 challenged votes were not counted. Supervising the balloting was Henry E. Carter, new state labor commissioner.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Clifford W. Shrader said two groups of state employes and one unit of municipal workers had previously voted for union representation under a public employe law enacted in 1969.

Price Boosts Push Index Up .4% in August

The BLS reported that supermarket prices showed no change for the first time since January, but are 3.1 percent higher than they were a year ago.

While the prices of processed food items are frozen until mid-November, fresh foods—such as fruits and vegetables—are not subject to price controls.

The price of fruits and vegetables nevertheless decreased 1.9 points from July but those prices still are 7.6 percent higher than they were in August 1970.

The BLS explained that its survey of food prices for the August index were made the first three days of the month.

It may take several months before the full effect of the price freeze will show up in the CPI, the Labor Dept. said.

Mortgage interest rates and property taxes, which are not affected by the freeze, were higher, and almost all the increase in the price of services—five-tenths of 1 percent—was due to increased household and medical care costs.

Reversed Priorities

TODAY'S POLITICAL CLICHE—"reordering national priorities"—has been applied with a vengeance by Pres. Nixon. But he has applied it in reverse.

Unprecedented and unhealthy tax relief to corporations would be the ultimate effect of the keystone of the President's new economic program. It would reverse progress in America. The government of compassion which many believed had come into being would be halted. Corporate profit-and-loss charts—not the public need—would have first priority. The poor, the cities and states, federal employes, wage and salary earners—all would foot the bill and the sole beneficiaries would be the wealthy and the corporations.

The Nixon tax package, now before Congress, is a radical departure from the concept of a graduated income tax based on ability to pay. Instead of tax justice, it would add to already existing loopholes to benefit those who already have more than their share of America's wealth.

The proposed investment tax credit, which the President contends, in the face of abundant evidence to the contrary, would create substantial employment, would cost the federal treasury $4 billion the first year. Combined with already ordered accelerated depreciation allowances, the new tax gimmicks for corporations would mean a $70 billion loss in federal revenue over the next 10 years.

In the next decade, America needs the $70 billion in tax revenue Mr. Nixon would give away. After all, taxes pay for the schools, hospitals and parks that America needs. The $70 billion could be used for a frontal assault on air and water pollution. These are the social needs that would wind up at the bottom of Mr. Nixon's priority totem pole, no matter what rhetoric he uses.

THE AFL-CIO BELIEVES America should continue on the path of social progress, along which the nation was moving, before Mr. Nixon called a halt.

We want to eliminate the waste in America—the human waste of unemployment, the waste of health resources, the waste of educational potential, the waste of 27 percent of this nation's productive capacity now unused, the waste of great national resources, the waste of air and water—the waste that can only be eliminated by public investment, full employment and expansion of consumer purchasing power.

These must be America's priorities. And the key to solving all of them is jobs—full employment.

It took Mr. Nixon 2½ years to discover—although he still has not admitted it—that America has serious economic problems and that these have been grievously aggravated by his economic policies.

When he did reverse his program, without warning, consultation, explanation or apology, he acted in near panic. The confusion, uncertainties and conflicting positions that have followed that weekend in Camp David should not be duplicated again. There is no valid reason why the Congress should be stampeded into hurried, unwarranted actions.

America does need to reorder its priorities, but it must first reject the President's retreat to the day when corporate wealth was king in America. And the responsibility falls squarely on the Congress, which must decide, without panic or partisanship, whether public need or corporate profits are more important.

A Word Edgewise:

Chinese Nationalists Could Turn to Moscow for Help

By John P. Roche

IN ALL THE DISCUSSION about Pres. Nixon's changing policy toward the Chinese People's Republic, the Republic of China has been taken for granted as an inert piece on the international chessboard. Few people have speculated on the possibility that Taipei might have an ace or two up its sleeve, even though there have been rumors of secret discussions between Chiang's regime and Moscow, and the ubiquitous Victor Louis did turn up on Taiwan, presumably in quest of medical treatment.

Yet, when you think about it, there is no reason to believe that the Chinese Nationalists are prepared to lie down and play dead while Nixon and Chou sit around discussing the future of Taiwan.

And in the Sept. 20 issue of the New Leader, G. F. Hudson, formerly director of Far Eastern Studies at St. Antony's College, Oxford, presents a compelling case for what he calls "Taiwan's Radical Alternative."

Hudson, who has a massive reputation as a China expert, suggests that the Nationalist government may well turn to Moscow. And be warmly welcomed.

Hudson, who has always argued that Soviet policy toward the Chinese Communists was based on Russian interests rather than ideological solidarity (I recall him predicting the Sino-Soviet split in the early 1950s), suggests that the major Soviet goal in Asia is containing Red China.

With the United States handling the southeastern perimeter—Japan, Korea, Taiwan—Moscow was free to concentrate on the central Asian and Manchurian frontiers. But with Pres. Nixon apparently disengaging, that flank would be left in mid-air.

Thus the Russians have become very friendly with the Japanese. (It was interesting to note that at the Chou-Reston summit meeting, Chou denounced the Moscow-oriented Japanese Communist Party for collaborating with the rearmament program of the Sato government. This must have come as a surprise to Sato.) And there is no reason to think that Moscow would not be prepared to adopt the Chinese Nationalists if we cast them loose upon the waters.

What has to be remembered is that Chiang Kai-shek was originally the pride and joy of the Comintern (somewhere in his collection is a warmly inscribed photograph of Stalin). In 1927, however, Chiang went into business for himself and killed all the Communists he could lay his hands on. (In recent years, the Soviets have probably regretted the fact he didn't catch them all.)

But even after the Kuomintang, a party organized on Leninist principles, purged its Communists, Chiang Kai-shek's son remained in Moscow. Hudson notes that he was there from 1925-37 and returned in 1945 to ask Stalin to mediate the Chinese civil war.

Unlike Madame Sun Yat-sen, who went to Moscow and became an ornament of the international Communist movement, Chiang's son never became an apparatchik. Indeed, he — Chiang Ching-kuo—is now Vice Premier of the Republic of China and the Generalissimo's heir presumptive. He would have no difficulty in speaking Russian.

FROM MOSCOW'S VIEWPOINT, in Hudson's words, "as long as the USSR aspires to be the world's second naval power and remains at odds with (Peking), the use of sea and air bases on an island approximately halfway between Vladivostok and Singapore and 100 miles from the coast of South China would certainly be an attractive proposition.

"Conversely, it would threaten Peking far more than the U.S. presence in the area, for it would complete the encirclement of China. . ."

The Chinese Nationalists, in short, are not helpless waifs, and one of the most interesting questions to speculate upon is whether Chou (who would never underestimate the shrewdness of the Nationalists) would not prefer the American "imperialists" and their "running dogs" on Taiwan. The thought of Soviet missiles replacing American would not be reassuring in Peking.

Bayard Rustin Says:

Real Welfare Fraud Committed By Exploiters of Poor People

THE EXPLOITATION of the politically powerless has become a tragic consequence of the recession. Because of the sickness of the economy reactionary politicians are able to take advantage of the defenselessness of the poor, uneducated and handicapped and call their actions "reform."

In the name of "reform," Wallace, Reagan and their ilk are pushing through reductions in already inadequate payments to welfare families by methods often unconstitutional and always inequitable.

And even in states governed by moderates and liberals there are similar efforts to reduce payments, tighten eligibility requirements and prosecute fraud. Liberals reluctantly agree to the changes out of political necessity, faced as they are with the outcries of resentful taxpayers.

What has led us to the situation where, for instance, an Alabama mother, who previously supported her three small children on $206 a month, must now get by on $130 because of Wallace-initiated welfare cutbacks? Who is to blame?

First of all, it is unfair to reproach beleaguered taxpayers. True, the animosity with which working class people regard welfare is sometimes motivated by racial prejudice. But usually their indignation is based on economics, not race.

They suffer because of inflation, and they suffer because of the government's efforts to curb inflation. Property taxes soar, and they feel their homes are jeopardized. Unemployment increases, bringing anxiety about layoffs.

Feeling abandoned by government, they strike out at the most convenient target, the welfare family who, because of misleading and sensationalistic press accounts, they perceive as deceitful idlers.

Unfortunately, these myths are encouraged by cynical politicians. This approach is dishonest both to the poor and to the working class taxpayer, who is deceived into believing that the problem somehow rests with the character of the poor rather than with the conditions that created their poverty. It is these public officials who are committing the real welfare fraud.

While dishonest, this strategy does have political value. If reactionaries can convince workers that welfare families are by nature shiftless, immoral and devious they can drive a wedge between the alliance of workers and poor which has been a potent voting bloc for candidates who will fight for social and economic justice for all classes.

It makes it increasingly difficult for liberals, who rely on the support of both the poor and workers, to pursue the struggle for economic and social reform.

Unconstitutional residency laws and massive investigations of welfare families will accomplish little beyond the soothing of a few conservative consciences. As many studies have shown, such measures will not result in any significant decrease in welfare rolls since the overwhelming majority of those on relief are either too old to work, physically handicapped or mothers who must care for minor children.

MORE IMPORTANT, they will do nothing to eradicate the problems of poverty and ignorance which lead to bulging relief lists. Welfare in itself is nothing more than a system to permit a family to maintain an existence that is a daily struggle for survival. There is nothing in the welfare system which helps the poor break out of their cycle of poverty.

To make real gains against poverty will require a massive commitment by the federal government to improve education, job skills and health care.

Poverty and welfare will only be eliminated when the unskilled are given the opportunity to train for decent paying jobs, when ghetto schools are improved and when the government ensures that there will be jobs available even for those lacking skills.

Pres. Nixon has consistently demonstrated that the elimination of poverty occupies a low priority in his Administration. He has vetoed measures to create jobs, to provide more federal funds for schools and to improve health services.

Nixon's welfare reform bill, which might do some good, has also been given a low priority. But even that measure is far from an adequate answer to the problem of poverty. The poor will not cease to exist because the federal government, rather than the states, administers welfare, nor because an inadequate income is made a little less inadequate.

The availability of a decent job, and the educational opportunity the job requires is the answer, not simply administrative reform.

Boost to Profits:

President's Tax Giveaways Offer No Spur to Increase Jobs

HUGE GIVEAWAYS to corporations in Pres. Nixon's tax proposals add up to a "raid on the public sector" at the expense of the long-overdue economic spur needed to cut unemployment, AFL-CIO tax expert Arnold Cantor charged.

Most of the corporate tax savings would "go into dividends and . . . retained earnings," declared Cantor, not toward "real job stimulation." He made the statements on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Cantor, an economist in the federation's Dept. of Research, stressed that with only 73 percent of U.S. industrial capacity now in use, there is little chance that "industry, faced with lagging consumer demand and all this excess capacity, is going to jump in, because of a couple of tax breaks, and start hiring people."

He also cited a Commerce Dept. survey that shows almost half of U.S. plants and machinery are "less than five years old," which cuts the probability of any extensive renewal and replacement.

Cantor renewed organized labor's call for an excess profits tax to "offset the business bias in the President's package," and said that the excess profits tax used during the Korean War could well serve as a model.

Noting that the President has put a lid on the "income of workers" through his wage freeze but has left the "income of business . . . profits" free to rise without restraint, Cantor declared that such one-sided action is "grossly inequitable" and will not solve the nation's economic crisis.

The "funds taken from wage earners" largely go to greater corporate profits, with little ever reaching the economic mainstream, he said.

Cantor said that such distinguished economists as Lawrence R. Klein and Vigaya G. Duggal of the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School recommend "a profits tax formula which would assure that after-tax profits are no greater than they would have been in the absence of wage restraints."

Reporters questioning Cantor on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Eileen Shanahan of the New York Times and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine.

AT A TIME when the Nixon Administration is clearly showing its business orientation both for multinational corporations abroad and conglomerates at home, Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) is urging new and more effective ways of curbing corporate monopolies.

His concern over what has been happening in the business world during the past 10 years as corporations grow bigger and bigger through mergers and conglomerates, is more than justified.

Celler is chairman of the House Antitrust subcommittee and has just finished a study of mergers and acquisitions of conglomerate corporations that threaten the American economy with domination by "virtually self-contained economic domains."

"Growth of these vast corporate structures, even though accompanied by an increase in number of much smaller and less powerful companies that operate under the umbrella of major companies, presages imposition of cartel-like structures throughout American business," a subcommittee staff report said.

"Some observers foresee a situation where the American economy will be dominated by a few hundred business suzerainties under whose influence a multitude of small, weak, quasi-independent corporations will be permitted a subordinate and supplemental role."

The report sharply questions the generally held idea that mergers are brought about to increase productivity and efficiency.

"In general," the report said, "the major acquisitions by the companies studied were corporate organizations that were profitable and successful before acquisition. The main effect of the merger or acquisition was to transfer control and management of an already successful enterprise to a new group."

Actually, the report found, acquired companies were less efficient after merger than they had been before.

The report also noted that merger negotiations opened the way to all sorts of stock speculation and manipulation by insiders, privy to what was going on and that trust departments of major banks became involved in deals and cross deals.

In a section devoted to the social costs of mergers, the report notes that major areas have lost corporate headquarters which are now concentrated in a few giant cities such as New York; that labor-management relations have been seriously eroded and that economic power has become increasingly centralized.

The report cites numerous authorities to show that conglomerate power not only gives it power over its competitors but "represents a bargaining advantage over labor." It cites a staff report of the Federal Trade Commission, saying:

"THE ULTIMATE SANCTION that makes collective bargaining viable and responsible is the economic power that it can wield through a strike. By conferring the power to cross-subsidize, business conglomeration may change the balance of bargaining power with trade unions."

To meet the merger problem, the subcommitte recommended support for suggested legislation by Celler. This would establish an Office of Industrial Organization in the Executive Office of the President. The office would bring together currently fragmented antitrust agencies in the federal government and centralize administration of the antitrust laws in it.

The job of the new antitrust office would be to foster competitive market conditions; to prevent corporate activities that tend to create a monopoly and to prevent "any undue concentration of economic power in interstate or foreign commerce."

Ever since 1887, when Congress enacted legislation to control the railroads, it has sought through antitrust laws "to contain the social, economic and political dangers inherent in a continuing increase in the concentraton of economic power in large business organizations," the Celler report says.

Obviously this effort has had a highly limited effect. It is surely time for a new start.

LONG-OVERDUE job stimulation is shoved to back-burner priority by the "huge corporate giveaways" in Pres. Nixon's tax plan, AFL-CIO Economist Arnold Cantor, center, warned on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Eileen Shanahan of the New York Times and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Rollcall on Enforcing Job Bias Law

Labor and civil rights groups joined in supporting a bill giving the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission the enforcement power it needs to stop illegal job discrimination.

But the House on Sept. 16 voted 202-197 to substitute an employer-backed bill that would leave the EEOC powerless to do anything but sue in federal court if the non-discrimination law is violated.

On labor's scoreboard, the 69 Democrats and 133 Republicans who voted for the ineffective substitute bill were Wrong (W). The 168 Democrats and 29 Republicans who voted against the substitute cast Right votes (R).

1970 Study Reveals:

10% of U.S. Families Trapped in Poverty

an hour, provides an annual salary of $2,704.

The report showed that 15 percent of the nation's young people—under 18—are living in impoverished families. And Census Bureau statistics last May showed that 1.1 million families headed by persons 65 or older are living in poverty.

More than 47 percent of all single people 65 or older—2.7 million—had incomes below their respective poverty level.

Despite the 1970 increase, the number of poverty families was 3.1 million less than in 1959, the first year for which poverty data was recorded.

In the 1960s, there was an average annual decline of 4.9 percent in the poverty population, but in 1970, the number of poor persons increased by 1.2 million. or 5.1 percent, to a total of 25.5 million.

It was the first time on record there had been a significant increase in the poverty population.

The Labor Dept. said that sex of the family head is an "increasingly important factor in the poverty status of families."

The number of poverty families headed by a woman in 1970 totaled 1.9 million, the same as in 1959, whereas the 3.3 million poor families headed by a man in 1970 represented about half the 1959 figure.

"Although families headed by a woman constituted only 11 percent of all families in 1970, they accounted for 37 percent of all poor families," the report said. The proportion of poor black families that were headed by a woman was even greater—57 percent.

Poor families included 3.7 million white, 1.4 million black and 68,000 of other races. The percentages of all families poor—for each of these three groups—were 8 percent white, 29 percent black and 14 percent for other minority group families.

There were significant differences in the age compositions of the white and black poor.

In 1970, children under 18 accounted for about 36 percent of white persons living below the poverty level, as compared to 54 percent of all Negroes who were poor.

In contrast, elderly family heads and single persons accounted for 19 percent of all poor white persons and only 7 percent of the Negro poor.

Of the 5.2 million poverty families in 1970, only 2.3 million did not have a family member who worked during the year.

It would have taken approximately $11.4 billion to raise the income of all poor families and single persons above the poverty line.

In terms of 1970 dollars, this figure represents about a 7 percent increase in the income deficit of poor families over the previous year.

The median income deficit for poor families was about $1,100 in 1970. For white families the deficit was closer to $1,000 compared to $1,300 for Negro families.

HAPOEL TROPHIES from Israel were presented to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany by Martin L. Cohen, right, chairman of the U.S. committee for Israeli olympic games and manager of Ladies' Garment Workers Local 105 in New York. Meany served as honorary chairman of the U.S. committee. Hapoel is the sports branch of Histadrut, the Israeli labor federation. The United States was among 20 countries that had participants in the sporting event held earlier this year.

Marble Union Elects Lawhead As President

Arlington Heights, Ill.—The Marble, Slate & Stone Polishers elected Wylie Lawhead as president at their 17th biennial convention. Lawhead, from Bloomington, Ind., had been a vice president since 1959.

He succeeds William Peitler, who announced on the final day of a three-day convention that he was not a candidate for re-election. Peitler, of Silver Spring, Md., had been president since 1960.

Lawhead took office for the balance of Peitler's term and for the new four-year term beginning next Jan. 1, He has been a union member for 22 years and an active leader of quarry unionists in southern Indiana. The union's president also serves as secretary-treasurer.

The convention returned four vice presidents for another term and elected six new ones. Re-elected were Michael Hogan, Francis Burns, Jack D. McCarthy and Joseph D. Fallon. New vice presidents are Pascal DiJanes, Frank Fiano, Alex Pennie, Clarence Smith, Alfred Buono and Ray Fecci.

The delegates reported chilling effects of the Nixon wage freeze on negotiations and were sharply critical of the Administration's policies.

Convention sessions were attended by 107 delegates representing 8,600 members in 127 local unions.

South Carolina Labor Scores Wage Freeze

Charleston, S.C.—Pres. Nixon's economic freeze was condemned at the South Carolina AFL-CIO's 15th annual convention for causing increased hardship on workers because of its inequities.

Delegates called for national action to protest the President's proposals if the unfair provisions of the new economic policy are not corrected after the 90-day freeze.

State Labor Council Pres. Sinway Young told the delegates that the freeze would have significant impact on the 1972 elections in South Carolina. Speaking under a 50-foot-long banner that read "Nixon and Strom Through in '72," Young said that voters could further vent their dislike for the Administration's economic policies on their ballots. He called for the defeat of Nixon and Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) next year.

Ironically, Young noted, that the Nixon freeze has done more to unite the labor movement in South Carolina than any other incident in recent years.

He said that union members should unify their vote with the newly enfranchised young voters to bring about a change in the political atmosphere in the state and the nation to achieve labor's goals.

The 250 delegates at the three-day convention adopted a resolution of support for members of the Furniture Workers on strike against the La-Z-Boy Chair Co. in Florence since Aug. 3.

The state labor council is setting up an economic assistance program for the furniture strikers that will be financed by voluntary weekly contributions from union members in the state. Delegates kicked off the program with a collection at the convention and also contributed to members of the Ladies' Garment Workers, who also are striking two plants in the state.

Other major convention resolutions called for:

- Changes in state laws to give public employes the right to strike.
- Congressional passage of the National Health Security bill.
- Full funding for the Occupational Safety & Health Act with enforcement authority retained by the federal government, rather than passed on to state agencies.
- Federal quotas on imports.

Speakers included Nicholas Zonarich of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., Stanton Smith, coordinator of the federation's state and local bodies, Lt. Gov. Earl Morris, state Labor Commissioner, Ed McGowan and State Rep. Isadore Lourie.

TV Income Climbs For Screen Actors

Hollywood—The Screen Actors Guild collected $14.7 million for its members from the television industry, not counting payment for commercials, the union announced for the 10-month period ended Aug. 31. This was an increase of 22.6 percent in a year's time, Executive Sec. John L. Dales reported.

The money was paid to the union by TV producers as residual fees for work done by union members in domestic and foreign television productions, plus payment for theatrical pictures sold to television. The totals do not include TV commercials, paid directly to actors.

Minnesota Convention Spurs Political Drive

Minneapolis—The Minnesota AFL-CIO convention voted full support for Federation Pres. George Meany's position on the wage freeze and his efforts to correct the inequities that pile an added burden on workers.

To back up their unanimous endorsement of organized labor's opposition to the freeze, the 760 delegates approved a 5-cent increase in the state federation's monthly per capita tax. Most of the revenue from the increase will go into a voter registration fund of the Committee on Political Education.

COPE had earlier announced that an all-out drive was being launched to register new voters in an effort to elect labor-endorsed candidates at all levels of government.

The convention called for wage adjustments for public employes and urged the Nixon Administration's Cost of Living Council to allow immediate pay increases for workers who earn less than $7,800 a year.

Delegates also called for an end to U.S. miliary involvement in Indo-China.

The three top officers of the state federation were re-elected and a constitutional amendment was adopted extending their terms of office from two to four years. The officers are Pres. David K. Roe, Sec.-Treas. Neil C. Sherburne and Executive Vice Pres. Leonard LaShomb.

Leading speakers at the three-day convention besides AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland included Norman Hill of the A. Philip Randolph Institute and Minnesota's Democratic Senators Walter F. Mondale and Hubert H. Humphrey.

Humphrey called for the creation of an economic stabilization board following the 90-day Nixon freeze that would have authority to regulate profits, along with wages and prices. He said the board should be made up of representatives from labor, business, agriculture, consumers and the public.

Mondale told the delegates that immediate efforts to correct economic conditions must be accompanied by "additional reforms that will finally bring economic justice and security to all American working men."

These reforms must provide for "meaningful tax justice and relief, safety from occupational accidents, protections from costs of sickness, and adequate pensions," he said.

A women's rights seminar was conducted at the convention with participants from labor organizations, political groups and the state government.

John Irving Appointed To NLRB Legal Post

General Counsel Peter B. Nash of the National Labor Relations Board named John S. Irving as associate general counsel for operations, succeeding H. Stephan Gordon, who resigned. Irving will supervise the operation of 31 regional offices and eight resident offices of the NLRB.

Irving, 30, has been executive assistant to the Under Sec. of Labor. Before that he was an NLRB attorney and attorney-adviser to Sam Zagoria, former board member. He is from Plainfield, N.J.

Irwin Fills Post On Foreign Affairs

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson has announced the appointment of Donald M. Irwin as Deputy Under Secretary for International Affairs. He succeeds George H. Hildebrand, who is now professor of economics and industrial relations at Cornell University.

Irwin, 46, has been a management labor relations official and most recently has been on the staff of the Michigan State University School of Business Administration. He held a Labor Dept. post from 1955-57.

Irwin will direct the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of International Affairs.

Trade Union Educator Otto Pragan Dies at 67

Otto Pragan, senior staff associate at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center since 1969 and former assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, died of cancer at 67. He had been ill for nearly a year, but continued to work until July.

Pragan was a specialist in vocational education who helped draft legislation, write programs and conduct training classes for pupils varying in background from union officers to school dropouts.

He helped draft feasibility studies that led to the development of the Labor Studies Center and was a consultant on the establishment of the American Institute for Free Labor Development. He taught courses for labor unionists from Latin America and helped develop studies for unemployed workers in need of trade training leading to useful jobs.

Funeral services were scheduled for Sept. 24 in Washington, D.C., Pragan's wife, Gina, and daughter, Mrs. Karen Saltzman, survive, with three grandchildren.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said in a message of sympathy that Pragan "made a significant and lasting contribution" to workers and their families through his "devoted and nationally recognized efforts to improve the quality of education" in America.

Pres. Paul J. Burnsky of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. said Pragan was largely responsible for stimulating and developing a leadership training program for shop stewards and local officers in major federal installations in the continental U.S., Hawaii and the Canal Zone.

Born in Vienna, Austria, Pragan migrated to Akron, O., in 1942 after receiving a University of Vienna doctor of philosophy degree in economics and law. Later he won a library science degree from Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland.

He was director of the Akron Public Library's business and labor service until 1949, director of research and education for the Chemical Workers until 1961, and an AFL-CIO labor educationist until 1969, when he helped launch the Labor Studies Center.

At Medical Society Meeting:

Meany Prescribes Health Security Bill

Doctors and patients alike "are victims of our non-system of delivering and financing health care," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a meeting of physicians in the nation's capital.

Talking to the District of Columbia Medical Society, Meany said "the medical care system is a confusing, inefficient, often inaccessible and always expensive piece rate, cost plus, unevenly distributed system.

"The patients pay for it in money and physicians pay for it in long hours."

The federation president assured the doctors there is a "better way"—the Health Security program backed by the AFL-CIO and introduced in Congress by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.).

Organized labor, Meany stressed, is proud of America's medical achievements, but it wants that "standard of excellence to be available to all, at a cost that all can afford." It does not mean regimenting doctors or turning them into victims of "socialism," he said.

It means that the patients should have the right to choose his own doctor and his own health care system and that the physician has the right to choose how he wants to practice medicine—on a solo basis or as part of a group.

The fragmentation of medical care, the involved form and record keeping, the use of hospitals versus out-patient or office treatment and testing were reviewed by Meany in his talk to the doctors.

He stressed that there is common ground between the physician and the patient and organized labor, that "we are all patients," and that there is a common understanding of health both in terms of sickness and finances.

Under the Health Security program, Meany stressed, "you could practice medicine the way you've always wanted to. You could give the patient the care your best professional judgment tells you he needs—no more, no less."

The program would not own nor run the hospitals, he said. It would not employ doctors, and no doctor would be forced to practice under the program.

But the Health Security program would help eliminate the waste of duplicate and overlapping facilities and would help train more health manpower, he noted.

The approach to health care advanced by the American Medical Association—Medicredit—Meany characterized as "a backdoor approach when we should be going through the front door."

He termed the Nixon program the "fall back" position of the AMA, that also fails to meet the needs and is basically sickness insurance rather than health care.

The AFL-CIO president summed up:

"The great debate over national health insurance has moved from union halls and meetings of social workers to meetings such as this one. That is good.

"It would be better if the debate now moved past invective, scare techniques and fear to an honest appraisal of all programs."

Union Watchdogs To Police Prices

Three unions, the Meat Cutters, Machinists and State, County & Municipal Employes have initiated programs to identify and report stores and companies that are chiseling on the wage-price freeze.

AFSCME members have surveyed supermarkets in New York City and found that they did not have available for public inspection a list of top prices charged in the base period before the freeze began.

IAM Sec.-Treas. Eugene Glover called upon all local financial officers to check their bills carefully to spot illegal price increases.

And Leon Schacter, a Meat Cutters vice president, said price policing will be established in stores and plants where his union has representation.

"We've got to go after the price gougers or the impact will be that much worse," Schacter said.

Ports of Call

New Freeze Rulings Disclose Little Give

The Cost of Living Council ruled that wage increases are allowed in cases where they are necessary to bring wages in line with minimum-pay laws or eliminate discrimination and that there is no ceiling on welfare payments during the 90-day freeze.

But there was little else in the way of a reprieve for persons caught in the President's pay freeze.

The Office of Emergency Preparedness continued to deny requests for exemptions from the freeze for wages, prices and rents. The number of denials now total well over a hundred, not counting those reviewed and resolved at the OEP's 10 regional offices.

The OEP meanwhile, issued more specific guidelines applying to construction, incentive compensation and steel wage rates, and the Cost of Living Council ruled that the freeze applies to the job rather than the worker.

In its specific guidelines, the OEP ruled out wage increases for a number of steelworkers, stating that 1971 increases in wage rates effective prior to Aug. 15 cannot take effect for:

"1. Companies which traditionally adhere to the steel wage pattern and whose contracts expired prior to the freeze date if a strike delayed the signing of a new agreement until after Aug. 14, 1971, and

"2. Companies that traditionally adhere to the steel wage pattern, if they have a 'lag date' after the larger steel companies, and their 'lag date' occurred after Aug. 14, 1971."

The guidelines exempted wage increases in the construction industry if they were part of collective bargaining agreements submitted to the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee or a craft dispute board prior to Aug. 15.

The OEP said employes who regularly receive a percentage of profits of a business may receive them during the freeze even "if that amount exceeds the dollar amount paid in the year pior to the freeze."

Also affecting the construction industry was a memorandum from the Workplace Standards Administration which said all Davis-Bacon wage determinations will take into account the freeze. The Davis-Bacon Act requires that an area's prevailing wage rate be paid on all federal construction.

One Cost of Living Council ruling—that the freeze applies to the job, not the worker—said workers transferred from one location to another because of a shutdown may be paid up to the highest rate for the job at the new location.

Arnold Weber, executive director of the Cost of Living Council, said groups or individuals seeking reconsideration of a decision may submit requests "on the basis of new information" and will receive "prompt consideration."

He declined, however, to make public the deliberations of the council, declaring that "no useful purpose would be served" by so doing.

AFL-CIO Calls Delegates to 9th Convention

departments, 51 state central bodies (including Puerto Rico) and 739 local central bodies representing 13.6 million union members.

Meany and Kirkland noted that the AFL-CIO's last biennial convention in October 1969 warned of "a growing danger of recession."

They added: "We find no comfort in the fact that the warning proved tragically correct, for too few listened.

"The White House ignored it. And each month, as unemployment grew and inflation continued, Administration prophets proclaimed prosperity was at hand and did nothing to achieve either full employment—the absolute foundation of prosperity—or to halt the rising cost of living.

"Suddenly and with no advance warning, the President acted on Aug. 15. He imposed an unequitable and unworkable freeze on all wages and most prices for 90 days. It is a program that hurts workers the most.

"As this is being written, no one can forecast what is going to happen. However, one thing is certain: The President's present program does not meet the test of equity and the trade union movement must—and will—continue to press for fair play."

The call concluded by urging that at the convention, "we should renew our resolve to move ahead progressively—in the spirit of American trade union philosophy for a better life for all the citizens of our nation."

trickle down, and we will have some more jobs."

The AFL-CIO president quoted a United Press International survey of big corporations that showed there will be very few, if any, new jobs produced by the proposed investment credit.

Another measure of Aug. 15 drew a sharp denunciation from Meany—the suspension of negotiated wage increases during the 90-day freeze period.

"Never in the history of this country, in peace or in war, has any other American President ever relegated to himself the power to cancel contracts. And then, in addition, they ruled that while you lose this money during the 90-day period, you cannot negotiate for it after the freeze."

Meany drew applause from convention delegates meeting in Miami Beach when he told them "somehow I feel our members want that money; it is coming to them, and somehow I feel they are going to use every possible legal means within their power to get that money."

He stressed the AFL-CIO position that contracts nullified by the President's order are "automatically subject to renegotiation at the collective bargaining table without restrictions of any kind."

In Kansas City, Kirkland told Woodworkers' delegates that they should take Nixon at his word on the "work ethic" only they should apply it to the 1972 campaign and elect a new Administration.

"Let us apply some of that work ethic that Mr. Nixon talks about to the task of political action and to the aim of restoring government of, by and for the people," Kirkland said.

"The friends of this Administration are going to have a lot of money and all the Madison Avenue propaganda artists that money can buy on their side.

"We can't begin to match their financial power, but we can overcome it by hard work," he said.

Kirkland said that America doesn't need a prescription of harder work for workers, but a sufficient number of jobs so that workers can "get back to the job of building America and creating a clean, orderly, just, democratic and free society that America can be.

"That will happen only when America has the kind of leadership she needs and deserves."

He urged the delegates to "make sure that our fellow union members and our friends and neighbors understand what is at stake, and what the choices are."

Vermont's Stafford Fills Senate Seat

Robert T. Stafford, a moderate Republican who represented Vermont in the House since 1960, has taken his seat in the Senate as the interim replacement for the late Winston L. Prouty.

Stafford, a former governor, was named to the vacancy by Vermont Gov. Deane C. Davis (R). Stafford is expected to be the GOP candidate in a Jan. 7 special election to fill out the five remaining years of Prouty's term. The Democratic and Republican candidates will be picked in a Nov. 16 primary.

Stafford and Prouty had similar COPE records in Congress, with more "right" votes than the average for most Republicans.

Crafts Praised For Work on Disney World

Lake Buena Vista, Fla.—The president of Walt Disney Productions praised the role of union craftsmen in the construction of the Disney World Vacation Kingdom near Orlando.

"Seventeen international unions and their local Florida affiliates have provided skilled workmen," said Pres. Donn B. Tatum. He noted that at the height of construction, about 7,000 building trades craftsmen were employed in the complex.

"It is a remarkable achievement for the building trades unions that with so many different skills represented on the job site, the project was virtually strike free during the period since 1968" when construction began.

The park is scheduled to open in October.

New Trade Bill Designed To Stem U.S. Jobs Export

Disputes Bill Assailed as 'Compulsion'

By Eugene A. Kelly

The AFL-CIO spelled out for Congress its firm opposition to any form of compulsory arbitration in the transportation industry and its support for legislation that would encourage collective bargaining settlements accompanied by the right of unions to strike selectively.

Federation Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller and Associate General Counsel Thomas E. Harris told a House subcommittee that labor opposes a Nixon Administration bill giving the President new powers to end strikes not only on railways and airlines but also in the maritime, longshore and trucking industries. Leaders of unions in the affected fields also testified against the measure.

The labor witnesses uniformly spoke in favor of a bill by Chairman Harley Staggers (D-W.Va.) of the House Commerce Committee, and others, that would encourage both sides to bargain while permitting selective strikes under specified conditions.

Biemiller said unions have long urged that emergency strike bans under federal law "should be no broader than necessary to safeguard the national health or safety." Partial or selective strikes should be permitted, he said, where health or safety considerations do not require a total strike ban.

"The Staggers bill, which we support, confirms the right of unions to engage in selective strikes, as defined in the bill, but gives the Secretary of Commerce power to require that operations on struck lines be maintained to the extent necessary to the national health or safety," he told the subcommittee.

Biemiller said he was "rather bewildered at the peculiar coverage" of the Administration bill, since it adds industries not covered by the Railway Labor Act.

The inclusion of trucking in the Administration bill "seems as flighty as the inclusion of maritime," he said.

"I have no commission to speak for the Teamsters, but anyone with the slightest information on the subject knows that no Administration has ever found it necessary to invoke the Taft-Hartley 80-day-injunction provisions in the trucking industry. What, then, can be the justification for proposing more stringent emergency procedures for that industry?" he asked.

Nixon Views Profits Curb As 'Unfair'

A profits freeze wouldn't be "fair" to successful business firms, Pres. Nixon said in a nationally broadcast question and answer session. But he insisted that workers will have to bear up under "inequities" until the wage freeze is lifted.

Nixon's remarks came as protests against the pro-business orientation of his new economic policy continued to mount and after the nation's largest consumer organization formally asked him to set a ceiling on coroprate profits and roll back interest rates.

Other proposals from the Consumer Federation of America asked a halt to the "indiscriminate freezing of wages," particularly in the case of low-paid workers "hardest hit by the escalating cost of living."

As has been the case with White House meetings with other groups, the President "listened" politely to the consumer representatives.

But his answer in effect came several days later in a nationally broadcast appearance before the business-oriented Economic Club of Detroit.

It wouldn't be fair to penalize a successful business by limiting its profits, the President argued. "It think we ought to reward success rather than penalize it."

Besides, he said, the government is a major beneficiary of higher profits because it takes in more taxes and all of the shareholders in the company benefit likewise. And "more profits means more jobs."

Short of Labor's Goals:

Mixed Gains Scored In State Legislatures

By Tom Castor

Organized labor made mixed gains on the state legislative front focusing on improvements in unemployment and workmen's compensation laws, but the gains in most states fell far short of the standards urged by the AFL-CIO.

The states' legislative performance underscored the need for mandatory federal standards, especially for jobless benefits. The AFL-CIO has repeatedly called for federal legislation requiring that maximum weekly benefits equal at least 66⅔ percent of the average state wage.

Pres. Nixon asked the states to meet that standard two years ago to avert the need for federal action.

Two months ago, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany reminded Nixon in a letter that only Arkansas, Hawaii and the Virgin Islands have fully met the standard with Utah very close to it, using a 65 percent formula.

"May we expect that you will now ask the Congress for federal action, as you clearly implied in your message two years ago?" Meany asked the President, citing the plight of "millions of unemployed and the need for restoring purchasing power in the economy."

Besides the Arkansas bill, which fully meets the recommended standards, one of the better unemployment compensation provisions this year was enacted in Pennsylvania with a top weekly benefit of $81, or 60 percent of the average wage.

The Pennsylvania benefit represents a $21 increase in weekly compensation which is available for 30 weeks. The one-week waiting period was made compensable after four weeks of joblessness.

Severance and dismissal allowances may no longer be deducted from unemployment benefits, and reductions for pensions have been modified to benefit retired workers who are still in the labor force.

Many state federations sought improvements in their states' minimum wage laws and some managed to win wage floors higher than the federal standard of $1.60 an hour.

Connecticut won a $1.85 minimum while Maine enacted a $1.80 floor and tied future increases in the state minimum to improvements in the federal rate. California currently is seeking a $2 minimum.

A flock of anti-labor bills were introduced around the country, including a measure against farm workers that was offered in 10 states. The California AFL-CIO waged a fierce battle to defeat the bill as did Oregon and Wyoming. Reports indicated that the bill was doomed in most states.

Legislatures not meeting this year in regular session were Kentucky and Virginia.

A brief summary of the actions state legislatures took this year follows.

Labor Backs Controls on Global Firms

By David L. Perlman

A job-saving foreign trade and investment bill has been introduced in both the House and Senate with strong labor endorsement.

Its goal is to stop the outflow of American jobs, capital and technology without retreating to economic isolationism.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller termed enactment of the trade legislation "essential" to maintaining the United States as an industrial, producing nation and preventing its deterioration into a low-wage service economy.

The authors of the bill, Rep. James A. Burke (D-Mass.) and Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.), are senior members of the congressional committees dealing with trade legislation—the House Ways & Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee.

Their bill would plug tax loopholes and wipe out financial incentives that have encouraged the growth of multinational corporations that use American money and technology to shift production and jobs to low-wage areas of the world.

And without building high tariff barriers, it would prevent further erosion of U.S. industries and employment.

Hartke and Burke stressed that the old arguments of "free trade" versus "protectionism" no longer are meaningful in an era in which giant corporations cross national boundaries and America's trading partners increasingly erect non-

Census Bureau Polls Public on 'Game Plan'

The Nixon Administration, which has steadfastly maintained that the President's wage-price freeze has the support of the American public—including rank-and-file union members—is now taking a poll to find out if that's really true.

The Census Bureau will survey 2,500 households in conjunction with its quarterly poll on consumer buying power and it will make sure to find out if the head of the household is a union member.

The survey is now under way at the request of the Cost of Living Council which wants a similar poll taken in October, according to a Census Bureau spokesman who said he didn't know whether the same questions would be asked in the second survey.

The spokesman said the labor-affiliation question is on a par with those on age, sex, education and income and that all these inquiries are designed "to determine how the aggregate population as a whole and different components of the aggregate were affected by the price-wage freeze."

The question asking whether the head of the household is a union member is the last question on the survey. It is to be asked if the breadwinner is "an employe of a private company, business or individual for wages, salary or commission" or if he is "a government employe."

The interviewer need not ask the question if the head of the house-

High Jobless Areas Hit 10-Year Peak

The number of major employment centers with "substantial" unemployment—a jobless rate of 6 percent or more—jumped to 64, the highest level in 10 years, the Labor Dept. announced.

The department also reported a net increase of two, to a total of 776, in the number of smaller cities with joblessness exceeding 6 percent.

Added to the "substantial" listing among major job centers were San Francisco-Oakland and Gary-Hammond-East Chicago, Ind.

The report was based on figures collected mainly in mid-July when the national unemployment rate was 5.8 percent. It jumped to 6.1 percent in August.

New Trade Bill Seeks To Stem Export of Jobs

tariff barriers to protect their own industries by restricting imports.

"Old remedies have not worked," Hartke told the Senate. "The textbook theories of the Thirties and the Forties no longer apply in today's world of international trade."

The new legislation is needed, he urged, "to protect the best interests of America against the worst practices of international corporations."

Burke told the House that "communities from Maine to Florida, from New York to California, from Georgia to Washington, are economic disaster areas." And while a new trade law by itself will not solve all of the nation's economic problems, the government would no longer have to "sit by and watch a company's desire for profits abroad weaken America's production and tax base at home."

The Burke-Hartke bill includes these key provisions:

- Tax incentives that encourage establishment of production facilities abroad would be repealed.

Profits earned in foreign operations would be taxed on the same basis as domestic profits. Corporations would be allowed to deduct foreign taxes from U.S. taxable income as a business expense. But they would no longer be able to subtract the full amount of their foreign taxes as a credit against their U.S. tax bill.

Also ended would be the foreign tax credit on payment of royalties received by American firms for the use of patents outside the United States. This would discourage the export of technology.

- A three-member independent commission would be set up to regulate U.S. foreign trade. The new agency would replace the Tariff Commission, take over functions of the Treasury, Commerce and Labor Departments, and have much more power to regulate imports than these agencies have under existing law.

- The commission would be empowered to set quotas for all goods coming into the United States, except for products already covered by quota legislation or voluntary agreements and items not produced in the United States.

The quota would be keyed to the percentage of the U.S. market held by imports during the 1965-69 base period. Thus when U.S. production expands, imports could also rise to maintain the same ratio. But they would not be allowed to flood the market and wipe out U.S. industries and jobs.

- The 1921 Anti-Dumping Act would be updated to speed remedial action when a foreign nation unloads goods in the United States at less than fair value in order to capture a market. Present procedures take as long as two years.

- The President would be empowered to ban or regulate the flow of capital overseas if he determines that employment in the United States would be decreased by the transaction. He also could, for the same reason, prohibit any holder of a U.S. patent from producing the patented product abroad or licensing a foreign firm to produce it.

- Repeal of two sections of the tariff code would remove part of the incentive for U.S. manufacturers to ship components across the border to Mexico and other low-wage nations for assembly and other "labor-intensive" work. Under existing law, the manufacturers pay only a token "value-added" tariff when the goods are returned to the United States for sale at U.S. prices under American brand names.

- Goods sold in the United States containing foreign-made components would have to be so labeled, and advertising for the products would be required to list the countries from which the components came.

The preamble to the Burke-Hartke bill spells out the problem:

"In recent years rapidly increasing imports, sometimes promoted by foreign government assistance or unregulated unfair trade practices, have all but eliminated certain domestic industries, and are threatening to destroy critical portions of the United States production base.

"It is the intent of Congress . . . to insure that this destruction does not occur."

Benedict Named To Mediation Unit

The White House announced the appointment of Peter C. Benedict as a member of the National Mediation Board, which serves the railway and airline industries in labor disputes.

Benedict, 45, is labor counsel for the Republican minority on the Senate Labor Committee and formerly was on the staff of the National Labor Relations Board.

Benedict will fill a term expiring in July 1974. He succeeds Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., who resigned from the mediation board.

Q. & A. on Trade, Investment

The following questions and answers on foreign trade and overseas investment were prepared by the AFL-CIO Departments of Research and Legislation.

How many jobs have been lost due to imports?

More than 1 million U.S. workers lost jobs between 1966 and 1971 because of imports, according to AFL-CIO estimates. Trade related employment is not separated from other job figures gathered by the U.S. government. But recent estimates from business and government spokesmen illustrate the problem: Henry Ford II recently said that for every 1 per cent import penetration of the U.S. auto market, 20,000 jobs are lost. With imports at 20 per cent of the auto market, Ford's statement means 400,000 jobs have been lost in the auto industry alone. The Tariff Commission has recently said that 20,000 jobs were lost in the TV industry.

Do export-related jobs make up for jobs lost to imports?

Exports have been rising less rapidly than imports. From 1968 to 1970, exports rose 20 per cent and imports rose 26 per cent. But the job impact is not in the same ratio. Imports of finished manufactured goods—like cars and TV sets where large numbers of workers are involved—rose 33 per cent. Among our leading exports are coal and chemicals, where very few workers are needed for a huge amount of production.

In real life, a shoe worker who loses a job in Massachusetts does not get a job in the chemical industry in Ohio. Statistics don't answer workers' problems. But even the statistics show that in 1966 only 1.3 million manufacturing jobs in the U.S. were related to exports—including executives and professional workers. As automation increased, production per worker rose in the 1960s. Though exports rose from 1960 to 1966, 27,000 fewer workers were needed for every $1 billion in exports.

Are all job exports related to the trade statistics?

No. In the 1970s a new kind of job export is taking place as U.S. companies shut down plants in the U.S. and expand production abroad. Counted as exports are the machinery sent overseas to produce in foreign countries for sale in the U.S. and other markets. The export of production means an export of jobs.

What industries are affected?

Electronic products and shoes, glass and automobiles, steel and clothing, toys and desk calculators, mining, farming, fishing—new and old industries. But these are only the tip of the iceberg. In the 1970s every kind of U.S. production is affected. So-called "U.S." firms have plants in as many as 100 countries. For example, Remington Rand makes two-thirds of its manual typewriters in Italy and South America and recently shifted all its calculator manufacturing from the U.S. to Japan.

Does the U.S. government keep track of these problems?

Not really. In August 1971 the Commerce Dept. published a survey of U.S. companies with foreign affiliates in 1966, without reporting related trade flows.

What happens to the economy or to communities from import and production losses?

The overall economy becomes weaker. Workers lose good-paying jobs for poorer-paying jobs or leave the labor force altogether. Production is lost, with a loss of purchasing power to local merchants and local communities dependent on payrolls. Federal, state and local taxes from workers and plants are lost to revenue-needy governments. Potential local industrial growth is shipped abroad, as with the Dodge Colt made in Japan by Chrysler Mitsubishi or the Chrysler Cricket made in Ireland. America could become a nation of "insurance salesmen" if the changes are not slowed.

Who wants the U.S. to keep its wide-open status in trade?

1. Some of the biggest international firms in the world. These giant firms now spread their production abroad, many with the U.S. as their base, but the world as their territory.

2. Many other countries which have almost a one-way street into the U.S. market for many products. These nations have barriers and restraints on U.S. imports. Many nations have special trade agreements that work to exclude or penalize U.S. products.

Aren't U.S. wages the cause of high prices and therefore "pricing us out of the world market?"

Throughout the '60s, U.S. wages have risen less than wages in other industrial countries. Yet the U.S. had a higher trade surplus in 1960 than in 1970. Despite this fact, there is a constant attempt to make U.S. labor the scapegoat for every problem in the country. If America wants lower wages and, thus, a lower U.S. standard of living, no one, including Congress and the President, is saying so. Shoe workers, rubber workers and others have already faced wage cuts. Regardless of high U.S. production, many companies moved abroad for other reasons, such as tax benefits and requirements by foreign governments that production must take place in the country.

Isn't the problem just like Smoot-Hawley?

No. Smoot-Hawley was the Tariff Act of 1930, which started after the 1929 crash (it didn't cause the depression) in an entirely different kind of world. Telephones and 747 airplanes now connect the countries of the world so that everything has changed. There are huge industrial countries—Japan, the six countries in the Common Market, Sweden, Norway, etc.—which meet to discuss their problems constantly. And, of major importance, the multinational companies themselves make this a new problem. It was impossible in 1934 to make a group of TV components in one country, fly them to another country where labor was 12 cents an hour, and then sell the TV set for $100 in the United States.

Why shouldn't we be for the removal of all U.S. non-tariff barriers?

In addition to quotas, there are other alleged U.S. non-tariff barriers that foreign trading nations want to see removed by us. Does anyone seriously want to see these removed? Among them are: The Wholesome Meat Act; the Fair Packaging & Labeling Act of 1966; Quarantine and Food & Drug laws and regulations; Flammable Fabrics Act of 1953; inspection requirements for boilers and pressure vessels; Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966; Merchant Marine Act of 1935; the Jones Act; and the Gun Control Act of 1968.

Won't there be a trade war?

No. First, to those who argue that U.S. restrictions would trigger a trade war, I.E. du Pont executive Charles McCoy says: "In the give and take of international trade, there is always a trade war under way." Other countries can understand that the United States has new problems. The United States has been reducing its tariffs since World War II. They have not been matched by other countries. Other nations have been adding new barriers to trade.

Second, because U.S. firms have such large investments in other countries with interchanges of parts (engine made in one country, parts in another and the whole unit assembled in a third) that for these countries to shut out trade in 1971 would be to "beggar themselves." The U.S. has no plans to stop trade. Our need is to stem the inrush of imports that are smothering our production capacity.

Air Line Pilots Seek Protection on Job Injuries

Extension of federal workmen's compensation laws to cover airline flight-crew members has been urged by the Air Line Pilots Association.

In testimony submitted to the National Commission on State Workmen's Compensation Laws, ALPA Pres. John J. O'Donnell emphasized that airline crews "continually cross state lines in the pursuit of their livelihood, yet no federal law protects them or their families in the event of job-connected injury or death."

The commission, established under the Occupational Health & Safety Act of 1970, is investigating complaints on the inadequacies of workmen's compensation programs. A deficiency most frequently cited has been the ambiguities of present state compensation laws.

For example, a Louisiana-based pilot, flying for an airline incorporated in Georgia, may suffer injuries in Texas, on a flight from Florida to California. There are no federal guidelines, O'Donnell pointed out, that could be used to determine which state would be responsible for the pilot's disability claim.

O'Donnell also cited the inconsistencies of state and federal compensation coverage. The maximum disability payment in Texas, for instance, is $47 a month, compared with benefits for federal employes that range as high as $429 a month.

Kirkland Tells Transit Union:

Jobs, Buying Power Key to Economic Lift

Las Vegas, Nev.—Big business needs markets a lot more than it needs subsidies and it won't get those markets until the nation gets a sufficient number of jobs to generate purchasing power, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told delegates to the Transit Union's convention here.

Kirkland reiterated the labor movement's opposition to Pres. Nixon's proposed "job development tax credit," which gives big business a tax break on buying new machinery in hopes that additional industrial capacity will mean new jobs.

He estimated the cost of the program to the public treasury at $70 billion over the next 10 years and said the Administration apparently feels that if enough money is taken from the taxpayers and given to business "some of it will trickle down to the people it was taken from and that will solve America's problems."

"Well, that is nonsense," Kirkland said. "It is the classic Republican answer, and it has never worked."

"No matter how much money industry is given, it is not going to hire workers and produce more goods until it has a market for the things it makes.

"And there will be no great upturn in the market for consumer goods until the people who need these things have the money to buy them."

Kirkland also noted that the Administration has proposed the tax credit at a time when 27 percent of the nation's productive capacity lies idle.

"So what America needs most is jobs—jobs in the public as well as the private sector," he declared. "The billions of dollars that Mr. Nixon wants to give away is public money that should be used for public purposes.

"Money spent in this way would create jobs, pay wages, buy materials, increase purchasing power and strengthen the private economy," he said.

The federation's secretary-treasurer listed just a few of the current public needs:

- Twenty-five million new housing units.
- A workable low-cost public transit system in every major city.
- New sewage systems, new solid-waste disposal systems and new systems to clean the air and water.
- An enormous expansion and renovation of our overcrowded hospitals and nursing homes.

"It is time to get back to the job of building America," he said. "It is time to restore the public interest at the head of the list of the nation's priorities."

This is the message that the AFL-CIO is carrying to Congress, asking that it close tax loopholes instead of creating new ones, Kirkland said.

"We are asking Congress to reshape the tax structure fairly and equitably, instead of widening the gap of inequity that has created this crisis."

Pennsylvania AFL-CIO Names New Treasurer

Resignation of Robert T. McIntyre as an AFL-CIO field representative was announced by AFL-CIO Director of Organization William L. Kircher following McIntyre's appointment as treasurer of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO.

McIntyre fills the unexpired term of Earl C. Bohr, veteran Pennsylvania unionist who resigned as treasurer. A native of Scranton, McIntyre is 40. He came to the regional staff seven years ago after service as a member of Scranton Local 81 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, recording secretary of the Building & Construction Trades Council and a delegate to the Scranton AFL-CIO.

McIntyre formerly served as community services director in his home area.

Survey Finds Unionists Oppose Freeze Bias

A nationwide survey by the New York Times has found union members generally "antagonistic and often bitter" toward Pres. Nixon's wage-price freeze.

In the nation's factories and shops, correspondents for the Times found, "workers were repeatedly critical of the President for not freezing profits, dividends and interest rates while offering special tax concessions to business."

Administration officials, smarting under sharp criticism of the President's latest economic game plan from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and other union leaders, have tried to argue that rank-and-file members do not share that viewpoint.

"Mr. Meany appears to be out of step with the needs and desires of America's working men and women," Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson said at one point.

But Times reporter Damon Stetson, drawing on his own interviews in several cities and reports from correspondents in other areas, found union members and union leaders very much in step.

If, indeed, there was an initial favorable reaction to the President's program as public opinion polls claimed, it didn't last long as the inequities of the freeze made themselves felt.

"This disenchantment is particularly emphatic among workers who have lost out on a wage increase or whose contract negotiations have been stalled by the freeze," the survey report noted.

And it reported that "union workers made it clear in interviews around the country that they would be strongly opposed to any post-freeze approach that was not evenhanded in its restrictions on both labor and business."

Some sample comments:

From a Pittsburgh steelworker laid off last month: "They still haven't touched dividends and profits. All the weight is falling on the working man."

On an aerospace assembly line in St. Louis: "If they are going to put on a freeze, then they should freeze everything."

In a Kentucky coal field: "It's us they is always choking so that the rich folks can stay fat."

From a Toledo glass plant: "I feel like I've been cheated."

And from a Detroit welder: "I think the freeze stinks."

NEWSMEN interview Kankakee, Ill., teachers outside the Iroquois County jail where five members of Teachers Local 886 are serving 60-day terms for leading a 1969 strike in the face of a no-strike injunction. Union members picketed daily there and also in Chicago, where AFT Local 1600 Pres. Norman Swenson was jailed for 30 days for refusing to end a 1966 strike.

Anaconda Copper Strike Settled With Big Gains in 3-Year Pact

Butte, Mont.—A determined coalition of copper strikers held out for 85 days to win major contract improvements from Anaconda Copper Co., then sought the approval of the Administration's Cost of Living Council for wage and fringe benefits they said were in line with the pattern set earlier at Kennecott Copper Corp.

Three-year contracts covering 6,100 members of a dozen unions were ratified by the strikers after agreement was reached in nine days of intensive negotiations at Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service offices in Washington, D.C. Labor and company negotiators agreed to seek approval of the raises in a later meeting with freeze administrators.

Montana unionists held out for two extra months on the picket line before winning acceptable terms. These included an extra 15 cents an hour in wages as a "catch up" for Anaconda workers, and an agreement for a study of work rule changes opposed by four unions—the Boilermakers, Carpenters, Ironworkers and Pipefitters.

More than 35,000 copper workers in a 26-union group led by the Steelworkers walked out July 1, with some agreements reached by July 24. The Anaconda workers were the last to settle.

Another settlement involved 1,000 USWA members at the White Pine, Mich., Copper Co., who had been out since Aug. 1. They approved a company offer in line with ones reached earlier with seven other copper firms, and returned to work.

The White Pine settlement marked the first time management had agreed to the full wage package accepted in comparable negotiations elsewhere, Peter Bensoni of Duluth, acting director of Steelworkers District 33, reported. He said it halted the "growing gap" between wages at White Pine and similar firms.

The Montana agreement calls for wage increases of 55 cents an hour, including a 5-cent catch-up raise, in the first contract year; an additional 2.5 cents an hour for health and welfare improvements; a lump sum payment of $3,500 for death, retirement or disability; a state-wide pay standard, won for the first time; a one-year job reclassification study, and supplemental unemployment benefits that are basically unchanged.

Second year improvements include wage hikes of 12.5 cents an hour, plus 20 cents more under the reclassification program; increases in increments and shift differentials; a cost-of-living bonus without a top; an increase in pension benefits to $7.50 per month times years of service, with an immediate $15 monthly increase for current retirees; and an additional $3.50 per month per employe for health and welfare benefits.

Third year improvements are a 12.5-cent wage increase, additional raises in increments, another $3.50 a month into the health fund and one half cent more per hour for supplemental unemployment benefits.

Pres. Paul J. Burnsky of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., who assisted Montana unions in final negotiations, said the settlement was "one of the finest" in the copper industry this year.

Connecticut Poll Nixes Nixon Policy

New Haven — Only one out of four union members here approve of Pres. Nixon's new economic policy, the Connecticut State AFL-CIO found.

The state labor federation mailed a questionnaire to union members in New Haven, along with a postage-paid reply envelope.

A tally of the first 194 replies showed only 49 supporters of the President's program, including his wage-price freeze and tax proposals. The remainder were either flatly opposed to the entire program or opposed to a large part of it, the state federation reported.

Dock Union Approaches Showdown on Contract

New York—Longshoremen locals from Maine to Texas were poised for a strike that would close all ports if employers cancel a guaranteed income clause in contracts due to expire Oct. 1.

ILA Pres. Thomas W. Gleason said he hopes a strike of 60,000 dockers will not be necessary, but if it is, "we're prepared," he said.

Leaders of all ILA locals on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts authorized Gleason to take any action he deems necessary to protect union wages and working conditions.

A move by employers to force strikes in New York or any other port will bring a walkout in all ports, Gleason said. With negotiations stymied by the employers' ultimatum, federal mediators offered their services shortly before the deadline.

Gleason told newsmen he hopes the employers will change their minds and permit negotiations on new terms to be resumed. But under no circumstances will the union agree to retrogressive steps in any port. Gleason emphasized that "if one port goes down, they all go down."

Also due to expire Oct. 1 were contracts in the soft coal and railroad industries. The Mine Workers, who reported some progress in negotiations, and the Railroad Signalmen are free to strike on that date.

Meanwhile a walkout of West Coast longshoremen and warehousemen continued into its fourth month. Pres. Nixon sent Director J. Curtis Counts of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service to assist the negotiators, and last week-end met in Portland, Ore., with both sides in an effort to speed up a settlement.

Nixon told employer representatives and Pres. Harry Bridges of the unaffiliated Longshoremen & Warehousemen that he will "have no choice but to invoke the Taft-Hartley law" if an East Coast srike is called and the West Coast shutdown continues.

The T-H law authorizes the President to force the strikers back to work for 80 days by obtaining an injunction.

On the East Coast, officers of the ILA and the Committee of North Atlantic Shipping Associations have been meeting since Aug. 18 in contract negotiations. The employers have declared they will not renew the contract clause, won three years ago, that guarantees 2,080 hours of work a year to dock workers in New York and some other ports.

Gleason has advised ILA members to stay on the job as long as negotiations continue. There is "no point in striking" during the Nixon wage freeze unless employers try to undercut contract conditions, he said in letters to all locals.

Portable Pension Plan Launched by Carpenters

The Carpenters announced the start of the union's first portable pension plan providing expanded benefits for members in both the construction and industrial divisions of the union.

The new labor-management pension plan will enable members to move freely from area to area and from construction to industrial employers while retaining full pension rights, Carpenters Pres. Maurice Hutcheson said.

The new plan will help stabilize the work force, said Hutcheson, and underscores the union's support of new technological developments.

Also announced was a union-sponsored program of reciprocal agreements covering the use of existing local Carpenter pension funds. These, too, will stress the portability of pension rights for both jobsite and manufacturing workers.

Hutcheson said members covered by the new plan will enjoy these advantages, not previously available:

- Continuous portable coverage as a carpenter moves from one participating employer to another, anywhere in the nation.
- Special benefits for industrial workers tied directly to individual contributions, and earlier vesting of benefits than is available under most other plans.
- Cost savings in administration of a broad-scale plan.
- Greater investment opportunities because of the national scope of the plan.

At the conference establishing the national pension fund, the union named Vice Pres. William Sidell as its trustee and management named David Stirling, Jr., board chairman of the Stirling Homex Corp.

Stirling is a pioneer in union-made modular housing. His firm has produced more than 15,000 housing modules to date. He said of the new plan:

"Its international scope, its provisions for early vesting and portability, and other special features will enable every employer to attract the best workers available and to provide greater security for present employes. This will facilitate expansion of construction and manufactured housing, and enable us better to meet the housing needs of this country."

He added: "Industrial housing offers the potential of new jobs at all skill levels, as well as increased building capacity."

The new plan brought praise from Chairman John J. Sparkman (D-Ala.) of the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing & Urban Affairs, as a "powerful weapon to overcome America's tragic housing shortage."

Siderography Union Presses Merger Talks

Philadelphia—The Siderographers voted at their 32nd biennial convention to continue merger negotiations with one union and to open unity talks with another.

The Siderographers had accepted a merger invitation at the 1969 convention from the 400-member union of Plate Printers, Die Stampers & Engravers. But little progress has resulted from those talks so far, the 14 members attending the convention were told. The Siderographers membership is at an all-time low of 20.

The convention instructed its officers to investigate the possibility of merging with the Lithographers & Photoengravers. The union's four Canadian members already hold a dual membership in the LPIU.

James C. Small of New York was elected to a two-year term as president, succeeding F. Warren Perkins, who retired. Former Sec. James C. Bullis of Ottawa, Ont., was elected vice president.

The convention also elected John P. Ryan of Annandale, Va., to the newly combined post of secretary-treasurer.

A boost in the per capita tax from $3.50 to $4 a month was approved to meet the union's increased operating expenses.

Over Strong Union Protest:

Labor Dept. Rule Weakens State Safety Enforcement

By John R. Oravec

The Labor Dept. is pressing an interpretation of the new occupational safety law—over the objections of organized labor—that would permit states to ignore the key "walk-around" provision on inspection of work places.

The "walk-around" provision requires that workers or their union representatives be given an opportunity to accompany safety compliance officers during inspections.

The department's interpretation and a loose timetable for state implementation of job safety programs based on "paper promises" from governors were vigorously protested by the two labor members on the National Advisory Committee on Occupational Safety & Health.

George H. R. Taylor, safety specialist for the AFL-CIO, and John J. Sheehan, legislative representative for the Steelworkers, charged that Labor Dept. lawyers are second-guessing Congress on the intent of the law.

The confrontation arose as the advisory committee reviewed guidelines for state safety programs issued by the Labor Dept.'s Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

Labor Under Sec. Laurence H. Silberman told the committee that states need not incorporate all the federal enforcement criteria—including the "walk-around" provision—in their programs.

Silberman claimed that Congress did not intend that state safety plans be mirror images of the federal law. Citing a subsection of the act, Silberman said that states could substitute their own provisions on job safety and health provided they are "at least as effective as" the federal act. He particularly referred to the "walk-around" provision.

The authority for determining if the state safety plans are "at least as effective as" the federal criteria is left up to Occupational Safety & Health Administration, headed by Assistant Labor Sec. George C. Guenther.

Guenther reiterated Silberman's point: Congress set two criteria—one for the federal government and another for the states, he said, declaring that they are not identical.

Taylor and Sheehan questioned the Labor Dept.'s authority to read the double standard into the law. They stressed that Congress focused on federal job safety enforcement and that if it had intended that enforcement authority be shifted back to the states, it would have made specific provisions.

The two labor representatives on the advisory committee also expressed concern over the delays permitted the states in fully implementing job safety programs.

Under the Labor Dept.'s guidelines, a state can have a "developmental plan" approved and funded by the federal government even though it does not meet all criteria stipulated in the federal law.

The states could take as long as three years to fully meet the criteria, OSHA officials said, before the Labor Dept. would step in to revoke the plan for noncompliance and return total enforcement authority to federal inspectors.

During this three-year period a state could operate a "developmental program" of job safety with a promise from the governor that the legislature would provide funds and set standards for enforcement.

Sheehan said the "developmental plans" are really "non-plans" because no governor can definitely assure the federal government that the legislatures would act according to his promises.

Guenther admitted that there could be difficulty in getting effective job safety programs through the state legislatures. For this reason, he said, there would be concurrent federal and state enforcement of job safety provisions.

OSHA officials reported that 47 states, Puerto Rico and the District of Columbia, have reached agreement with the Labor Dept. for the development of safety programs. Ohio, New Mexico and South Dakota have not made such agreements.

Gov. John J. Gilligan (D) of Ohio said he was opting for federal enforcement because the state's industrial commission "has no intention of mounting an adequate job-safety program."

The state commission, which is loaded with holdovers from the previous Republican administration, has the responsibility of wooing industry into Ohio besides enforcement of state job safety standards.

Federal guidelines do not specifically forbid state safety agencies from holding this dual responsibility, which organized labor considers a conflict of interest.

What the revised federal guidelines do say is that the other responsibilities of the state agency charged with job safety enforcement "shall not detract significantly from resources and responsibilities assigned to administration of the plan."

Oregon AFL-CIO Launches Drive To Defeat Nixon in '72 Elections

Eugene, Ore.—Political action geared to the defeat of Pres. Nixon in the 1972 elections emerged as the major thrust of the week-long 16th annual Oregon AFL-CIO convention.

Speaker after speaker attacked the inequities of the Administration's wage-price freeze for its double standard of a tax giveaway to big business and an added burden on workers.

Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) told the 400 delegates that the freeze actually froze the nation's economy deep in a Nixon recession. He said the President's freeze order was "born in confusion" and that to wipe out its inequities a freeze is also needed on interest rates and dividends.

Jackson called for a massive public works program tied to a full employment policy to snap the economy out of its recession. He urged a revival of government-sponsored employment programs of the 1930s to meet the needs of cities for new housing, better schools, more sewage treatment plants and highways.

Oregon's Republican Gov. Tom McCall told delegates that phase two of the new Nixon game plan would be even more crucial than the first 90 days of the freeze. He cited the need for an excess profits tax on business and a ceiling on interest rates to bring about equity.

But Sen. Mark O. Hatfield (R) challenged labor to improve productivity as a means of justifying wage increases. He also warned that Congress would consider passage of compulsory arbitration legislation because of rail and dock strikes.

However, Oregon's other Republican senator, Bob Packwood, charged that Congress was avoiding the responsibility of making decisions on key issues—that it would rather the President made the decisions.

Delegates contributed $3,175 to the state Committee on Political Education on the slogan "Nixon out, our friends in" for next year's election campaign.

The convention re-elected the top officers of the state federation without opposition. They are Pres. Edward J. Whelan, Sec.-Treas. Glenn E. Randall and Vice Presidents Earl Kirkland and Nellie Fox. Lloyd Knudsen, executive director of legislation and political education, was also re-elected.

In the more than 60 resolutions adopted, delegates attacked the Nixon wage-price freeze as containing far more benefits for business than for the workers.

Other resolutions called for:

- Support of the National Health Security program to provide adequate health care for all Americans.
- Opposition to any form of compulsory arbitration and imposed settlements in labor-management relations.
- A minimum wage of $2 an hour now and $2.50 in scheduled steps.
- Legislation to bring a total end to job discrimination against women and expanded day care facilities open 24 hours a day with employers contributing to their operating funds.
- Uniform voter registration laws in the state and the nation.
- Amending the state federation's constitution to hold regular conventions in odd-numbered years and COPE conventions in even-numbered years.
- Added efforts to increase involvement of union members in political, government and COPE activities and stepped up organizing efforts.

The convention came out in opposition to "no-fault" auto insurance on the grounds it would penalize safe drivers and exclude protection of the courts. Construction of a major hydroelectric dam and reimbursement of employers for apprenticeship training also were opposed.

Glass Bottle Union Wins Owens-Corning Vote

Berlin, N.J.—The Glass Bottle Blowers won a National Labor Relations Board election at the Owens-Corning plant here over the Teamsters. The vote was 180 for the GBBA and 49 for the Teamsters.

New York Voter Drive Pays Off

Thousands of new voters were registered this summer in New York through a double-barreled operation of the city AFL-CIO and young adults of the Frontlash organization.

While Frontlash volunteers criss-crossed the town with mobile registration units, unions of the New York City Central Labor Council concentrated their efforts in shops, plants and worksites. The combined effort resulted in signing up 47,583 new voters.

Frontlash volunteer teams were everywhere—on strategically selected street corners in all boroughs of the city and at other busy locations. They were on Wall Street, the Staten Island Ferry, in Chinatown and Harlem, the New York Public Library and even at Gimbel's and Macy's department stores.

Frontlash teams focused on registering the newly enfranchised young workers, reported Edward Rothstein, New York Frontlash coordinator. They were assisted by union members recruited by Ed Pastel, the summer registration coordinator of the labor council.

By Aug. 31, the last day mobile registration was allowed by the state until next January, the Frontlash registrars had signed up 19,432 new voters. Another 28,151 previously unregistered union members were put on the election board rolls by union registrars.

Frontlash conducted a sample survey of 2,000 new young voters who had been registered. The results are: 1,058 or 53 percent Democratic; 541 or 27 percent Independent; 197 or 10 percent Republican; 162 or 8 percent Liberal; 42 or 2 percent Conservative.

Railroad Bargaining

UNIONS HAVE LONG urged that emergency strike bans under Taft-Hartley should be no broader than necessary to safeguard the "national health or safety," and that partial or selective strikes should be permitted where the "national health or safety" does not require a total strike ban.

The proposal of the Administration bill in this regard is not satisfactory. It leaves it up to the President and his appointees to decide whether to have a total strike ban or to permit a partial or selective strike, and the industry involved will always be able to persuade them that anything less than a total strike ban is impossible or impractical or unprofitable for the industry. We have had twenty-four years experience to that effect under the present Taft-Hartley provisions.

As respects the Administration proposal on "final offer selection," we are as much opposed to that as we are to any other form of compulsory arbitration and we do not care whether it be labelled "final offer selection" or "mediation to finality" or whatnot.

We are opposed to compulsory arbitration because we believe that collective bargaining can and should be preserved and restored to full effectiveness in the railroad industry. That means that the right to strike must be preserved and restored, for collective bargaining cannot operate with full effectiveness unless the right to strike exists as a possible last resort. It is the contemplation of this ultimate test of economic strength, or sometimes, the test itself, that induces the parties to reach agreement.

THE RAIL CARRIERS have undermined collective bargaining by undermining the right to strike. Congress views a nationwide strike stoppage as unacceptable, and the carriers have succeeded in recent years in transforming their labor disputes into industry-wide shutdowns in order to ensure the intervention of Congress. The carriers have done this in two ways. When the railroad unions have sought to engage in selective strikes so as to minimize the impact on the public and the likelihood of congressional intervention, the rail carriers have gone into court and secured injunctions prohibiting the unions from striking at all unless they strike nationwide. A decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia last spring finally vindicated the right of the unions to engage in selective strikes in at least some circumstances.

The other device by which the rail carriers have transformed disputes into nationwide shutdowns so as to secure congressional intervention is by proposing harsh and retrogressive changes in working conditions whenever they are faced with or anticipate union demands.

Then, after the procedures described by the Railway Labor Act have been exhausted, the carriers unilaterally put these proposals into effect simply for the purpose of provoking a nationwide shutdown.

We believe that once the possibility of selective strikes is effectively guaranteed, the carriers and the unions will have the incentive to settle their disputes through collective bargaining. Certainly we think that this proposal should be tried before resort is had to increased government compulsion, as contemplated by the Administration bill.

Nixon's Shift in Foreign Policy Takes On 'Real-Politik' Look

By John P. Roche

THE BRITISH foreign policy establishment over the last 25 years has usually taken a caustic, even patronizing view of the way in which we conduct our foreign affairs. To these critics we seem like a well-meaning, bumbling giant who gets souped up by some moralistic slogan or other and starts breaking the furniture, tripping over his own feet, and generally behaving in a most ungentlemanly way.

The British have, in particular, scorned our rejection of the world of "real-politik," of the concept of the balance of power, of the notion that international politics are of necessity if not immoral, amoral.

In this country, eminent conservatives like George F. Kennan and Walter Lippmann have echoed this complaint. One can disagree with their premises, but the position merits serious consideration.

Kennan suggested years ago, for example, that we would be far better off today had we left the Japanese alone in the 1930s. What difference did it make to us in the light of our national interest who controlled Manchuria, or—for that matter—China? Lippmann, similarly, has always been allergic to "mainlands," favoring a "blue water" strategy for the United States, one that rests on islands.

This insular concept was reflected in his rejection of our intervention in Greece, Korea, and Vietnam. (Indeed, I have it on the highest hearsay that just before the invasion of Normandy, Lippmann enraged Gen. Eisenhower and his staff by informing them it would be a strategic disaster.)

What underpins this world view is its scorn for "moralism," for going out into the world to do good deeds. Without putting words in anyone's mouth, a spokesman for this view of national interest would presumably be delighted that the Soviet Union is now stuck with India, and a "real-politiker" of my acquaintance was in fact heartbroken to have Bolivia back in the "Free World." He thought the Communists and Bolivia deserved each other.

What has fascinated me in a clinical sense and appalled me personally over the last three years is the extent to which Pres. Nixon has moved into this strategic posture.

Admittedly the conditions were ripe: the American people were tired of hearing the trumpet, sick of the frustrations of Vietnam, concerned with the alleviation of domestic problems. And a new generation had moved into the limelight, one that was (thank God) spared the searing experiences of depression and war, but—as a consequence—considered its elders to be hopelessly hooked on the past. My students are convinced, for example, that the foundation of American foreign policy from 1945 to Vietnam was "hysterical anti-communism."

THE IRONY of this passeth understanding. I don't recall any anti-Communist hysterics impelling Harry Truman, Dean Acheson, George Marshall or the other American leaders who implemented the "containment policy." True, there was a group that verged on hysteria, one whose outstanding spokesmen were Joseph R. McCarthy and . . . Richard Nixon. The liberal "cold warriors" specialized in defensive measures such as the Truman Doctrine, the Marshall Plan or the North Atlantic Treaty. It was John Foster Dulles, Richard Nixon & Co. who whooped up "liberation."

No one can say that Nixon is a dogmatist. Everywhere you look, you sniff the spoor of traditional balance of power, amoral, "real-politik." "Deal with the big boys," "Get the children off the street"—these are the real slogans of our time.

One sensed it at the time of Cambodia when the President justified the incursion purely as a way of saving American lives. Nothing was said about the plight of the Khmer people, threatened by a totalitarian invasion. Similarly, if the President has any regrets over casually sandbagging the Japanese government on his way to Peking, they have not been expressed.

For years Joseph Stalin tried to get an American President to sit down with him and divide the world into spheres of influence. He must be chuckling in his grave at the thought that perhaps "Nixon is the One."

Alternative to War:

Vietnam Points Up Failures To Aid Emerging Nationalists

The following is excerpted from "Lessons from Vietnam: Alternatives to War," by Irving Brown in the September 1971 AFL-CIO American Federationist.

THERE COULD HAVE BEEN alternatives to Vietnam in the past. There should be alternatives in the present and for the future. Whether this happens depends on whether we have learned the lessons of the past. If not, as Santayana has said, we are doomed to repeat the past.

What was the alternative to a major war in Vietnam itself? Prior to the involvement of great masses of American troops and officers in a war to maintain the rights of people to their own kind of self-determination, the Western World could have supported the nationalist movement in those early days and helped the Vietnamese to attain their independence in a peaceful and democratic manner.

This meant a political solution at a very early stage—at a stage when the Communists were not in complete control of the nationalist forces. In fact in the early post-World War II years, prior to 1953, many nationalists were breaking with the Communists.

These were the years when men like Tran Quoc Buu, the present leader of the South Vietnamese labor movement, were refusing to go along with Ho Chi Minh and his cohorts while remaining nationalists dedicated to the struggle for independence.

What appeared to be America's identification with French colonialism prevented a more active American policy of seeking out and encouraging the democratic mass movements within the country, who were not yet committed to the Communists.

It was quite clear in the immediate post-war years that international considerations would relate not only to reconstruction and rehabilitation in the war devastated areas but to the colonial areas where the rise of nationalism and the drive for self-determination would overshadow all other considerations. In these developing areas the freedom slogans of the war became the slogans of the national liberation movements.

This inability to understand that the national liberation movements were not necessarily directed against the free world was a fatal flaw in those years. Without that flaw, it might have been possible to prevent major wars of attrition or, at least, to mass wide support against any Communist uprising or agression. In those early post-war years, most of the nationalist leaders saw their ideals and movements as a continuation of the original ideas and ideals of the western nationalist and revolutionary movement of the 18th and 19th Centuries.

It was the failure to continue our war for freedom against the Nazis in the post-war political arenas that provided an opportunity for the Communists to identify with the national liberation movement and support the all-out demands of the extreme nationalists.

In dealing with the problem of propaganda and the making of foreign policy, account must be taken of the fact that the rise of the Soviet Union to a world position has changed fundamentally the nature of diplomacy, especially as related to the non-governmental areas, where propaganda and organization problems are intimately connected.

The Soviets in their non-governmental operations (WFTU, Communist parties, women and youth organizations) appear not as the representatives of a country but as the symbol of incarnation of an idea which has taken root among great masses of people. The Soviet Union is a symbol not of a geographical unit or entity but a great idea—no matter how deformed or degenerate that idea has become over the last 50 years.

On the other hand, American operations in the field of information and propaganda tend to appear as a defense of a country, of a geographical unit irrespective of or almost hostile to any ideological concept. Government-issued information cannot compete with indigenous organizations speaking and working for an ideology.

In fact, we have seen how far this is going in our country on the campuses and in university classes, where not only students but the faculty have taken up the cudgels for an all-out ideological offensive against America in the international arena.

TO COPE WITH this kind of propaganda and organizational situation in the world today, America and the West will have to meet the revolutionary and ideological offensives which have become more diverse, less monolithic in appearance but yet totalitarian and aggressive in spirit and act. It could be possible to counter with both an organizational and ideological offensive if we could proceed on the following principles:

- National liberation, self-determination and anti-colonialism are not necessarily directed against the West. Rather the opposite is true, namely, that the source of the ideals of the anti-colonialists can be traced to the West, to the revolutionary ideas and actions of the 18th and 19th Centuries.

- The world conflict is not between two geographical and national units, Russia and the United States, but between free, open societies as against dictatorial, closed ones. Nor is this a struggle between two absolutes but between relative freedom and absolute dictatorship.

Consequently, the United States and the West must work with and support national organizations abroad, especially in the labor and youth sectors, to combat the Soviet-Communist degeneration of the original ideals of the Russian Revolution.

The West must carry on the fulfillment of the original ideals of the American, English and French revolutions while exposing the Soviet regime as having destroyed its revolutionary ideals and having physically liquidated or exiled most of its founding fathers.

Nixon Plan Scored:

Congress Urged to Reject Delay In Scheduled Federal Pay Hike

CONGRESS SHOULD reject Pres. Nixon's proposal to block long-scheduled pay improvements for federal employes until next July 1, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald said in noting that government workers have not yet reached full wage comparability with private industry.

Pointing out that federal workers are subject to all aspects of the general 90-day wage freeze, Oswald declared that the added six-month delay of federal pay adjustments due to take effect Jan. 1 makes them "bear the brunt" of such handouts to business as investment tax credits and stepped-up depreciation allowances.

He appeared on the public service network radio interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Oswald noted that the federal pay increase Nixon is now trying to block was approved by Congress nearly a year ago, in line with congressional policy set in 1960 aimed at making federal pay comparable to private industry.

Federal employes ask only that they be "treated the same as everyone else," Oswald stressed. He said that even the federal pay increase of last January has been washed out by a 7.5 percent cost-of-living rise since January 1970. "That means that federal workers are already 1.5 percent to 2 percent behind in the last year and a half, in terms of the cost of living," he asserted.

Oswald rejected the contention that "if prices are frozen or severely restricted, the federal employe will not be that much worse off" in July 1972. He said that "the President has used rhetoric" about "prices being absolutely rigid," but Administration economists have indicated that their intent is only to slow down the rate of price rise, and that it will not be a rigid situation."

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE OTHER DAY, Cowles Communications, Inc. announced that Look magazine would cease publication Oct. 19 after 34 years as a bi-weekly, mass-circulation publication.

Gardner Cowles, chairman of the board of Cowles Communications, laid the blame on the economic turndown plus soaring postal rates. Some 1,000 editorial and clerical workers will lose their jobs.

Whether Look would have been able to continue publishing without the increase in postal rates may be questionable, but the heavy impact of mailing costs in the final decision was undeniable.

Cowles, in a prepared statement, pointed out that in the next five years, Look would have been subjected to proposed postal rate increases of 142 percent, raising its postal cost from $4 million a year to $10 million.

"It seems ironic to me at this time," Cowles said, "especially when the federal government is urging all businesses to hold down costs and prices, that it should itself be a prime offender with its gigantic postal rates."

Andrew Heiskell, board chairman of Time, Inc., was equally caustic. He said:

"It is always bad news for the country when a responsible journal is forced to close down. It is particularly bad when that development is, in part, engendered by an arm of the government—in this case, the Postal Service, which has already taken the first step in raising second-class mail rates to irresponsibly high levels."

The "irresponsibly high levels" to which Heiskell refers, is the 142 percent proposed increase in rates over a five-year period. The same postal rate and fee increase would hit the labor press a far, far heavier blow, 750 percent over the five years.

In testimony before the Postal Rate Commission, Kenneth Fiester, president of the International Labor Press Association, said that the Postal Service, in fact, "explicitly calls for more favorable treatment for bigger, heavier publications with a higher advertising content."

FIESTER TOLD the hearing that "the Postal Service was not created for fat cats. It was created to encourage the widest possible dissemination of all facets of opinion, including minority opinion."

Unless the rate commission lowers its target to a major degree, it's likely that a vast number of trade union publications and similar organs will not be able to survive.

What has concerned many observers with the passage of legislation creating the U.S. Postal Service is that mail delivery has become a revenue producing business rather than a service for all the people.

Benjamin Franklin and Thomas Jefferson conceived of the postal service not as a business but as a service. From the days of the colonial system, it was the prevailing American belief that low-cost distribution of the printed word, whether it be letter, newspaper, magazine or book, was essential to people of a free society.

This holds particularly true as far as trade union publications are concerned.

"It is obvious that successful collective bargaining depends on an informed membership," Fiester said, "just as the successful operation of a democratic society depends upon an informed electorate."

"How is this goal of an informed membership going to be achieved? Not, unfortunately, through union meetings, which—lacking a crisis like a strike vote or a dues increase—are as badly-attended as precinct meetings of the political parties."

He said it is the "union paper, at whatever level, that must provide the continuing flow of information to the union member about his union."

Whether it's the loss of Look or of a trade union paper, the fabric of our free society becomes more and more tattered.

CONGRESS SHOULD reject Pres. Nixon's plan to block long-scheduled federal pay improvements even after the 90-day wage freeze expires, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Harry Conn, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and James F. Welsh of the Washington Evening Star. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

How to Buy:

Careful Shopping Still Essential In 90-Day Economic Freeze

By Sidney Margolius

A RUSH TO BUY CARS and a real threat of higher food prices despite the freeze have become the main points of interest and concern in the 90-day wage-price freeze.

The increased interest in car purchases stems, of course, from the pending removal of the 7 percent excise tax which amounts to about $200 on the average new car. The actual removal of the excise tax must be approved by Congress.

But many dealers are guaranteeing that they will give buyers a refund of the excise tax as soon as Congress approves it. One manufacturer, American Motors, even is offering an immediate refund without waiting until Congress acts.

In line with the freeze, manufacturers also have rescinded, at least for the 90 days, the price increase previously announced on 1972 models. The new models had been slated to go up an average of about $200, with the largest precentage increases on the new small cars like Pinto. But the major buying interest is on the big supply of leftover '71 models because of the additional discounts available.

But better compare prices to make sure you actually are getting the extra discounts normally given on leftover models, as well as the excise tax reduction. Remember to check the legally required car sticker first to see what the list price is.

On intermediate-size cars dealers usually have a margin of about 20 percent off the list price or about $500 with which to bargain, plus similar or slightly higher margins on accessories. On full-size "popular-price" models dealer margins range from $600 to $800, as an indication of how much negotiating you may be able to do.

Also keep in mind that dealers now must provide on request at least some technical data on safety performance of their cars.

Beginning with 1970 models the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act has required that performance information be made public on braking ability, passing acceleration and tire reserve load. You also can order copies of the publications which have this test information for all cars from the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20240. Prices for these publications are $2 for Performance Data for New Passenger Cars and Motorcycles, and 40 cents each for A Comparison of Braking Performance and A Comparison of Tire Reserve Load.

While these tests cover only three of the numerous factors you need to evaluate a car before you buy, they do show revealing comparisons between different models. For example, the 1971 tests showed that sub-compacts like Pinto and Vega with disc brakes had the shortest stopping distance.

However, it is not possible to generalize that one manufacturer's products are superior in most or even one characteristic to those of another make. But there were significant differences even among cars made by the same manufacturer.

THE WEAKEST LINK in the price freeze is in the most important component of your living costs—food. Only processed foods are price-controlled. This means that retail prices of fresh fruits and vegetables and eggs can go up as farm prices rise. On the other hand retail meat cuts and frozen poultry are controlled since they are considered to be "processed." But since livestock prices are not controlled, and we are coming into a season of high livestock prices anyway, the danger is that retailers will use hidden price increases to pass along rising livestock prices.

Some of most sensible advice in this situation was given by Barbara Rader, well-known food writer, who warns consumers to watch the quality and availability of meat cuts during the price-freeze period. Especially watch the trim, Mrs. Rader advises.

Most of the "hardware" produce items such as potatoes, onions and cabbage should be no problem since they usually are abundant and at their lowest prices in the fall.

Most accurately, what the Nixon Administration has promulgated is a wage freeze and a price slowdown.

New Life for Carl:

Street Dude Turns Union Journeyman

CARL CARSON has made a complete turn from criminal to first class honest citizen, from an all-thumbs street dude to a skilled mechanic—through trade unionism.

He is a graduate of Project Build, the program sponsored by the Greater Washington Central Labor Council and the Building Trades Council to aid youths to qualify for apprenticeship in the building and construction trades.

His home was one familiar to many young men in the Washington, D.C. area—no father, and a mother who had to work to support the family. "My mother was too protective, almost too good. She wanted me and my brother to have everything, but the everything she was able to give just wasn't enough for me," Carl said.

Before he reached his teens Carl found a way to get some of the things he wanted. By 14 he was a polished pick-pocket. At 15 he was sent by the courts to the Receiving Home for Children—the charge, stealing. After release from the Receiving Home, Carl was in and out of most of the correctional institutions in the Washington metropolitan area.

"When I became 21 I found myself leaving Lorton Youth Center and entering Lorton Reformatory," he said. "The guys I met in prison gave me all kinds of tips and advice, trying to teach me how to become an expert criminal. There was no program, then, to help teach me how to become an expert citizen and stay out of jail. I had to do everything I knew how to do, trying to resist becoming a hardened criminal."

While in Lorton Reformatory, the supervisor of the work-release program took an interest in men like Carl, men who showed they wanted a new life. The supervisor told Carl of Project Build, designed to help young men learn a trade.

Carl came to Project Build, at 23, an all-thumbs street dude.

His journeyman instructor, Rufus Jones, introduced Carl to cement masonry. But even more than that, he encouraged Carl to really work at learning his trade, to attend classes to improve his academic knowledge and to aim at being a journeyman, a first-class mechanic in cement finishing.

Roland J. Williams, executive director of Project Build, took a special interest because he viewed Carl as a man struggling to change his whole way of life.

"Sometimes things got pretty bad for me," Carl said. "I wasn't used to taking orders, getting myself dirty, to getting up early in the morning and working eight hours a day. I saw Mr. Jones and Mr. Williams and I said to myself, if they made it I can make it too. I just have to."

WHEN HE FINISHED pre-apprenticeship training, Carl described himself as a man who felt that life now had some hope for him.

"I was ready to work because the counselor at Project Build helped me to realize that I wasn't an empty vessel that somebody else had to fill. The counselor helped me to understand that I had ability to do, to become a first-rate mechanic if I really wanted to."

He is now married to a young lady he happened to meet at Project Build. He has a son for whom he can provide a comfortable living out of the good wages he earns as a cement finisher.

Staff members of Project Build remember Carl Carson and the many young men like him. Roland Williams remembers the time when Carl celebrated his "anniversary" with a return visit to the training center. That was the first year that he had not been arrested or incarcerated since he was 15 years old.

Last month, Carl Carson, 27, ex-con, present cement finisher, became a journeyman, a first-rate mechanic and a first-class citizen. —(PAI)

Soup to Nonsense:

Aging Process Does Nothing To Bridge Generation Gap

By Jane Goodsell

A WHILE BACK when I was a kid, I didn't understand grownups. They made no sense. They laughed when there wasn't anything to laugh at. But when you told them the funniest joke in the world (What did the big toe say to the little toe? Don't look now but there's a heel following us.) they hardly cracked a smile. When they got together with other grownups they never did anything fun. They just sat around and talked.

When they went to restaurants and could order anything they wanted (like hamburgers and hot dogs and raspberry pop) they chose the dumbest things on the menu—like oysters and chicken livers and icky kinds of fish.

They weren't interested in really keen radio programs like "Myrt and Marge." But they tuned in every night to hear some old guy drone on and on about the news. When there was company coming, they made you get all dressed up so you could come in and say hello, and the company could say, "My, how you've grown!" and "What grade are you in now, dear?"

Grownups got all excited about things like the stock market and who'd be elected President—things you couldn't even see. But when something really exciting happened (like the family next door's guinea pig having babies) they acted as though it didn't matter at all.

They picked the worst times to tell you to clean up your room and wash your hands and to go to bed. They couldn't understand why you liked Dr. Fu Manchu movies when they scared you to death. They couldn't understand anything. They believed in Santa Claus, but they thought the bogey man was silly.

IN THE NATURAL COURSE of human events, I became a grownup. And now I don't understand children. Why can't they ever sit still? How can they get bubblegum in their hair? How can they like peanut butter on chocolate cake? How can they stand cotton candy and pronto pups? How can they not like asparagus and mushrooms?

How can they sit there playing the same rock record over and over? Why are they so messy? So silly? Why can't they keep track of the time? Why haven't they enough sense to know when they're tired?

Why are they always losing things? Why do they forget everything you wish they'd remember? Why do they remember the things you wish they'd forget?

I don't understand kids. They don't make any sense.

Modest Gains Won in State Legislatures

Improvements in Jobless Benefits Still Far Short of Labor's Goals

ALABAMA—Maximum benefits for both unemployment and workmen's compensation were increased from $50 a week to $55 with an additional $5 increase effective July 1, 1972. Amendments to the state's workmen's compensation laws extended coverage to all occupational diseases.

The State AFL-CIO succeeded in blocking attempts to raise the legal interest rate above 8 percent on small loans and revolving charge accounts.

ARIZONA—Here the state central body helped defeat a bill aimed at penalizing striking teachers by stripping them of seniority and another measure forbidding strikes by public employes. Also defeated was a growers' bill that would have prevented organizing of farm workers and a measure aimed at weakening child labor laws.

COLORADO — Labor-backed legislation raised workmen's compensation benefits for temporary and permanent disability from $59.50 to $64.75 maximum. The AFL-CIO also won a law allowing consumers to cancel a credit contract within 72 hours of signature.

CONNECTICUT — The minimum wage was increased to $1.85 an hour effective Oct. 1 and extended to public employes. Legislation also brings migratory workers under the minimum in three stages, reaching the $1.85 level by Oct. 1, 1973.

Labor also backed passage of laws permitting the establishment of non-profit health care centers anywhere in the state and legislation prohibiting employers from using electronic surveillance devices in employe restrooms.

DELAWARE — The legislature extended unemployment benefits for 13 weeks and raised the weekly workmen's compensation maximum to $75. Organized labor was successful in blocking a bill that would have lowered the minimum wage floor for full-time working students.

IDAHO — The state central council won a totally new workmen's compensation program which doubled benefits, making them 60 percent of the worker's average wage, with a maximum of 90 percent of the average state wage, or $106. Unemployment benefits were raised from 50.5 percent to 55 percent of the state's average wage, or $65 weekly at the maximum.

INDIANA — Unemployment benefits were extended for 13 weeks when the national jobless rate is 4.5 percent, or higher, and the benefit was increased to a maximum of $65 weekly, with the program extended to an additional 140,000 workers. Workmen's compensation benefits were raised to a maximum of $75 weekly.

IOWA — Jobless benefits were raised to 55 percent of the average wage as of July 1, 1973, and maximum benefits were increased this year to $64 under the present 50 percent formula.

A new wage garnishment law prevents an employer from firing a worker whose wages are garnished, no matter how many times his wages have been attached. It exempts weekly income of $48, or less, and protects at least 75 percent of a worker's pay after deductions.

KANSAS—A public employe collective bargaining bill won by labor provides for mandatory collective bargaining in the case of state employes, but stipulates that bargaining will be on a voluntary basis between unions and local governments.

LOUISIANA—All public employes were brought under the state's unemployment compensation program in which maximum weekly benefits were increased to $60 as of Aug. 1.

MAINE—The state minimum wage was raised from $1.60 to $1.80 effective Oct. 1, and the legislation stipulated that any increase in the federal minimum above $1.80 and up to $2 an hour will automatically trigger an equal hike in the state minimum. Coverage was extended to all employes except students working in summer camps.

Another law won by labor requires an employer with 100 or more workers to give 30 days notice, or severance pay, in the event of a plant closing.

MARYLAND—Workmen's compensation was extended to public employes and office workers and some farm workers and the weekly benefit was raised to 66⅔ percent of the average state wage, or $85. The legislature decreed that if fire fighters contract heart or lung disease, it will be assumed to be job-related without contest.

Unemployment benefits were raised from $65 to $78 a week maximum.

MASSACHUSETTS — Labor won an increase in unemployment benefits from 52.5 percent to 55 percent of the average state wage, effective October 1973, and an increase in workmen's compensation from a ceiling of $70 a week to $77 effective Nov. 1, with an additional $3 increase next year.

MICHIGAN—Labor-backed measures raised the state minimum wage to $1.60. Workmen's compensation laws were amended to give an employe appealing a case 70 percent of the award he would be receiving during the time of appeal.

MINNESOTA—A credit control law won by the AFL-CIO limits revolving credit charges to 1 percent per month or 12 percent a year.

Another law provides maternity benefits for unwed mothers and minor female dependents and health coverage for the children of these mothers. Unemployment benefits were increased from a top of $57 to $64, and workmen's compensation from $70 to $80 on total disability, and to $73 for partial disability.

MISSISSIPPI—Jobless benefits were raised from a top of $40 to $49 weekly effective Jan. 1, and the state federation was instrumental in killing a bill that would have prohibited strikes by public employes.

MISSOURI—Workmen's compensation benefits were raised from a maximum of $57 to $63.50 and the death benefit was increased from $18,000 to $22,500.

MONTANA—The state central body scored a number of firsts, among them the first minimum wage law in the state's history. The new $1.60 minimum also will apply to farm workers who will be brought under the rate in three years.

The AFL-CIO won a state requirement for overtime pay for all work after 40 hours—a proposal that has been repeatedly introduced since the 1930s.

Jobless benefits went from $42 to $52 a week, and workmen's compensation was raised to a $60 maximum for a person with payments not limited to 26 weeks as they formerly were. They will now be paid until the worker is eligible for social security benefits when they will be reduced by 50 percent. Montana is one of few states with this provision.

NEBRASKA—Unemployment benefits were increased from a ceiling of $48 a week to $56 and workmen's compensation was increased from $55 to $62. The system provides for lifetime benefits for widows unless they remarry and for dependent children to the age of 23 if they are in school.

Organized labor beat back an attempt to repeal the state's Public Recognition Bargaining Law which was defeated by 2 votes.

NEVADA—The state federation won an extension of the Local Government Employe Management Relations Act to all government employes. The law provides for fact-finding and final and binding arbitration of disputes.

Unemployment compensation was increased to 50 percent of the average wage, or a maximum of $72.50 with no waiting period, and the benefit period was increased by 13 weeks during times of high unemployment. Health benefits and pensions were increased by 30 percent and silicosis patients are to receive supplementary compensation of up to $6,125.

NEW HAMPSHIRE — Labor won an increase in unemployment benefits which were raised to $75 a week maximum and a workmen's compensation to a top of $92 a week.

NEW JERSEY—The state federation won a law providing for dues checkoff for public employe unions and also a measure prohibiting auto insurance companies from cancelling policies without giving reasons.

A package of legislation for farm workers requires that those working on a piece rate basis be paid the legal minimum wage and that employers provide drinking water and toilet facilities in fields where seasonal farm workers are employed.

NEW MEXICO—The unemployment benefit period was extended by 13 weeks, and workmen's compensation was increased to a maximum of $48.

NEW YORK—The State AFL-CIO turned back attempts to cut negotiable items in public worker contracts but failed to get the legislative approval needed on a pension improvement agreement for New York City workers.

The state minimum wage was extended to domestic workers.

NORTH CAROLINA—The state minimum wage was increased to $1.45 effective July 1 and to $1.60 effective July 1972. Unemployment benefits were increased $7 to $52 a week maximum and workmen's compensation provisions were broadened to cover byssinosis.

The state federation defeated a proposal that would have blacklisted any public employe involved in a work stoppage and obtained "meet and confer" rights for public workers. The AFL-CIO also won a law protecting home owners against fly-by-night repair firms.

NORTH DAKOTA—The AFL-CIO won a $300 a month wage minimum for public employes not covered by wage board provisions.

JOBLESS BENEFIT improvements, including an increase in the maximum benefit to $81 a week, are signed into law by Pennsylvania Gov. Milton J. Shapp (D). Seated with Shapp are David Gingold, vice president-director of the Ladies' Garment Workers Northeast Dept., left, and Pres. Harry Boyer of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO. Standing, from left, are Robert McIntyre, new treasurer of the state federation; Sec. Paul J. Smith of the State Labor & Industry Dept.; AFL-CIO Sec. Harry Block; Executive Vice Pres. Michael Johnson of the AFL-CIO, and Earl C. Bohr, retiring treasurer of the state federation.

It also gained an increase in unemployment compensation to 50 percent of the average wage.

OHIO—Cost-of-living clauses were included in both workmen's compensation and unemployment benefits schedules based on the Consumer Price Index. The increases will be figured on an annual basis.

Workmen's compensation went from a top of $63 to $84 weekly on temporary total payments and by a like amount on permanent payments.

Unemployment compensation went from $66 to $84 maximum in a bill which Democratic Gov. John J. Gilligan is expected to sign.

OKLAHOMA — About 30,000 state employes were brought under the unemployment compensation program and benefits were increased from a ceiling of $49 a week to $60. Temporary disability payments were raised to $60 a week and the maximum death benefit to $25,000.

The state minimum wage was increased from $1 to $1.40 an hour and coverage extended to all restaurants with eight employes or more. The State AFL-CIO won a law providing collective bargaining rights for firemen, policemen and teachers.

OREGON — The state labor council won enactment of a labor-management act covering all cases not under jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board. The law, which the state federation drafted, provides for all questions of compliance to go directly to court.

Unemployment benefits were raised $7 to $62 weekly at the top and workmen's compensation from a ceiling of $60 weekly to $85. Working women are to receive the same as men.

RHODE ISLAND — The state central body devoted its efforts to helping win enactment of a progressively graduated income tax and to blocking major cuts in education and welfare appropriations.

SOUTH CAROLINA — Unemployment benefits were raised to 50 percent of the average wage, from $53 to $56 weekly maximum and the State AFL-CIO won a grievance procedure for public employes.

SOUTH DAKOTA — Amendments to the state's Public Employe Law provide for exclusive recognition of bargaining agents certified by secret ballot and for written agreements.

Workmen's compensation benefits were increased to 66⅔ percent of a worker's wage with the maximum benefit $56. The maximum death benefit was increased to $25,000.

TENNESSEE—Jobless benefits were increased by $5 to a top of $55 weekly and the maximum workmen's compensation benefit from $47 to $55.

TEXAS—Jobless benefits were raised by 40 percent to $63 weekly, and workmen's compensation was broadened to cover employes of certain local governments.

Another law requires the State Dept. of Health to license and regulate migrant labor camps.

UTAH—Workmen's compensation benefits were raised to a maximum of $79 for a worker with four dependents, and unemployment compensation regulations were amended to allow a striking worker to collect benefits from a second job if he fullfills the length of service and earnings requirements.

WASHINGTON — Workmen's compensation benefits were raised to 75 percent of the average wage or a maximum of $485 a month and coverage was extended to virtually the entire workforce.

Unemployment compensation was extended to all state employes effective Feb. 1 and to employes of non-profit institutions.

The state federation defeated an attempt to eliminate the 12 percent limit on retail credit purchases won by labor in 1968. Labor estimates that the proposed increase to 15 percent would have cost the state's consumers $23.5 million a year.

WEST VIRGINIA—The state minimum wage was increased to $1.20 effective July 1 and will go to $1.40 next year and to $1.60 by July 1973.

Workmen's compensation benefits were raised from $66.50 to a maximum of $77.55, or 55 percent of the average weekly wage of $141. Unemployment benefits were increased to $71, or 50 percent of the average wage.

WISCONSIN — Unemployment benefits were increased from $73 to $84 a week maximum with 13 weeks of added coverage.

The AFL-CIO also is supporting a bill still in the legislature that would raise workmen's compensation from $79 to $90 a week at the top and for the first time make new benefits retroactive in some cases.

CWA Scores Bell's Efforts to Break Strike

The Communications Workers asked public utility commissions in nine states and the District of Columbia to prevent the Bell Telephone System from using supervisors to break a strike of telephone company employes in New York state.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne filed formal complaints against company transfer of supervisors from far-away states while the strike continues. It began July 14 and stayed in effect in New York after locals representing nearly 40,000 workers voted to reject company offers accepted by other CWA Bell units outside New York state.

The transfer of supervisors to New York constitutes a "threat to the satisfactory telephone service which . . . residents are paying for and have a right to expect," Beirne said.

He added: "If the removal of these supervisors . . . does not constitute a threat to proper telephone service, then the supervisors must be unnecessary." If so, operating costs cited to establish rates in their home locations have been "artificially inflated by the presence of unnecessary personnel," Beirne said.

The CWA president asked for a prompt investigation by public utility commissions in California, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Florida, Kentucky, Georgia, North and South Carolina and the District of Columbia.

LABOR CHAIRMAN Hunter P. Wharton of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped presents the first copy of the AFL-CIO guide, Working Together, to Chairman Harold Russell, left, of the overall President's committee. Wharton, an AFL-CIO vice president and head of the Operating Engineers, called for intensive labor efforts to find jobs for disabled Vietnam war veterans.

Railway Disputes Plan Opposed as Compulsion

way & Airline Clerks said Congress should consider giving the President power to seize and operate common carriers when negotiations break down. He called the Administration proposal for mandated settlements one which would "simply sell the employes down the river."

Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers, who also heads the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., described a feature of the Administration's bill calling for "final offer selection" as a winner-take-all form of mandated settlement that would aggravate unrest in labor-management relations.

"We find this proposal to be a gimmick that is nothing less than poorly disguised compulsory arbitration," Hall said.

Others due to testify included Presidents C. J. Chamberlain of the Railroad Signalmen, Harold C. Crotty of the Maintenance of Way Employes and Charles Luna of the United Transportation Union.

Biemiller told the subcommittee that the carriers have taken advantage of the fact that "Congress views a nationwide strike as unacceptable."

The Administration bill is unsatisfactory, he said, because "it leaves it up to the President and his appointees to decide" on strikes to be allowed. The industry "will always be able to persuade them that anything less than a total strike ban is impossible or impractical or unprofitable for the industry," he declared.

Biemiller said labor opposes compulsory arbitration in transportation disputes "because we believe that collective bargaining should be preserved and restored to full effectiveness in the railroad industry."

That means "the right to strike must be preserved and restored," he said, for collective bargaining "cannot operate with full effectiveness unless the right to strike exists as a possible last resort."

The rail carriers have in recent years succeeded in transforming their labor disputes into industry-wide shutdowns to "ensure the intervention of Congress," he pointed out. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia "finally vindicated the right of unions to engage in selective strikes" for a national agreement. But "we believe the Staggers bill is needed to settle that issue once and for all, and to define with precision the exact reach" of the selective strike, he testified.

The Administration bill would give the President three new alternatives to the present 80-day Taft-Hartley injunction: an additional 30-day injunction, authority for a presidential panel to authorize a partial strike or lockout, and the "final offer selection" under which a panel could choose one offer by labor or management, without change or modification, and force its acceptance.

Sleeping Car Porters Study Future Job Cuts

Chicago—Members of the Sleeping Car Porters debated ways to protect their railroad jobs against further slashes but came to no final conclusion at their seventh triennial convention.

Delegates from two dozen divisions reported membership down to 2,100 from the 1967 total of 3,300. The drop resulted from the elimination of many passenger runs and the takeover May 1 of the remaining runs by Amtrak, the quasi-public corporation set up by Congress.

The National Railroad Passenger Corp.—Amtrak for short—dropped 178 passenger trains but continued to operate 182 trains connecting 300 cities. Delegates to the 46th anniversary convention of the Porters reported many lost jobs, and long layoffs between runs. Proposals on the subject were referred to the executive board for study and possible action.

Attending their last convention as officers were Sec.-Treas. William H. Bowe and Vice Pres. T. D. McNeal, who retired with the thanks of the delegates. Bowe, who held his post nine years, will continue to serve as president of the New York division and treasurer of the New York City AFL-CIO.

Elected for new three-year terms were Pres. C. L. Dellums, Vice Pres. L. J. Shackelford, Jr., and Sec.-Treas. W. W. Seymour, Denver. The latter two replace the retiring officers. Named to the executive board were A. R. Dailey, W. C. Isaacs, A. R. Blanchette, L. H. Greene, Jr., and the top officers.

Dellums announced that international union headquarters will be moved in October from New York City to 5253 Thrill Pl., Denver 80207.

The convention adopted resolutions endorsing the new "black caucus" in Congress and condemning racial violence and anti-Semitism.

It heard guest speakers including President Emeritus A. Philip Randolph, Henry Harrison of the Doll & Toy union, W. R. Barber of the Railroad Retirement Board, and Mrs. Rosina C. Tucker, secretary-treasurer emeritus of the Porters' auxiliary.

Bill Backed to Ban Tainted Meat Imports

Meat imported into the United State should comply with the same health and purity standards required of federally-inspected domestic products, the Meat Cutters told a Senate panel.

The union gave its endorsement to a bill by Sen. James B. Pearson (R-Kan.) that would bar the importation of meat containing "economic poisons or drugs" such as insecticides or hormones that would be prohibited or restricted if the meat were processed in the United States.

Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman wrote Sen. James B. Allen (D-Ala.), whose Agriculture subcommittee is considering the bill, that "the consumer must be protected against harm to his health or his pocketbook regardless of whether the product comes from a foreign or domestic manufacturer."

Labor's Plan Outlined:

Disabled Veterans Assured of Job Aid

Disabled veterans of the Vietnam war need and will get labor's help in their search for useful jobs, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Hunter P. Wharton assured members of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped at a Washington, D.C. meeting.

Wharton launched a cooperative new effort to open opportunities for disabled veterans by presenting Chairman Harold Russell of the President's Committee with the first copy of a new AFL-CIO guide for labor groups. Its title: Working Together—the Key to Jobs for the Handicapped.

Wharton, president of the Operating Engineers, is the new chairman of the labor committee that works with the handicapped. He succeeds Gordon Freeman, president emeritus of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

"I don't need to tell any of you," Wharton said, "how bad the job situation is, and how great the competition for jobs. But disabled veterans need our help, and we must find ways to help them."

Russell, who was an active member of the Meat Cutters before he lost both hands in World War II, expressed thanks "on behalf of millions of handicapped workers" for labor's past help in getting jobs and training for such workers—7 million to date.

Now the nation must find work for 225,000 disabled veterans returning from Vietnam—a higher percentage of disabled than in the Korean war or World War II, he said. The success of any training effort "depends on you," he told the union representatives.

"After all, they did lay their lives on the line for us," Russell said. "They can with your help show that disability does not mean inability."

Pres. Julius Rothman of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute described federation programs for returning veterans, and said provision must be made for the disabled and disadvantaged veteran also.

"We in the AFL-CIO believe that all veterans have earned the right to training and a job opportunity," Rothman said. "We are determined to help them."

With more than 1 million servicemen a year to be discharged from military duty, labor organizations must tailor their programs to help the returnee. Many have no jobs, limited education and no skill, Rothman noted.

He said HRDI cooperates with central labor bodies through the Jobs for Veterans Committee, the Veterans' Assistance program and Operation Transition. Enrolled in the latter program to date are the Bricklayers, Carpenters and Plumbers who, under contract with the federal government, start apprentice training programs for veterans six months before their discharge from the armed services.

HRDI, he said, "will cooperate with you, with central bodies and rehabilitation groups to put disadvantaged people into jobs, and to help them lead satisfying lives."

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Lee W. Minton, chairman of the federation's Veterans Committee, said the committee is being restructured, at the request of Pres. George Meany, to meet the needs of all veterans, including the disabled.

The booklet, Working Together, is AFL-CIO Publication 42, revised. It will be distributed by the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped, Washington, D.C. 20210. The committee timed its release for National Tmploy the Handicapped Week, Oct. 3 to 9.

Laborers Ask Step-up Of Housing Programs

Miami Beach—Delegates to the 16th Laborers convention urged the Nixon Administration to put increased emphasis on home-building and asked the President to suspend the 10 percent import tax as far as Canada is concerned. The union called for restoration of free trade between the United States and Canada.

In their housing resolution, the more than 2,300 delegates called on the Administration to "further intensify programs to encourage the development of industrial home-building, to train workers in the new technology of this field and to promote rehabilitation and revitalization of our decaying communities."

The convention gave its full support to the AFL-CIO position on the President's wage-price freeze and urged Nixon to devise a program that "does not unfairly discriminate against working people, but calls for an equality of sacrifice among all segments of society."

The resolution told Nixon that organized labor "should play a major role in the formulation and the administration of any such economic regulatory program which may follow the 90-day freeze."

The measure noted that the freeze represents a windfall for employers who do not have to pay negotiated wage increases, but may pocket the money.

It charged that the freeze subjects the Building & Construction Trades unions to further restrictions "after having already been singled out for wage controls earlier this year" under the Administration's Construction Wage Stabilization plan.

Pres. Peter Fosco called the convention the most "meaningful" in the union's 68-year history.

Delegates supported a recommendation from officers that the per capita payment to the international be increased from $1.25 to $2 a month.

The $2 payment is to be distributed in this manner: general fund, $1.40; death benefit fund, 25 cents; international pension fund, 8 cents; regular convention fund, 7 cents, and local union and district council pension fund, 20 cents.

Delegates also directed that minimum local dues be raised from $4 to $6, stipulating that even in locals where dues already are $6 or more a month, dues shall be increased by at least $1 no later than Jan. 1.

Convention Hits Inequities:

Woodworkers Term Nixon Freeze Unfair

Kansas City—The Nixon Administration's wage freeze came under sharp attack from officers, delegates and guest speakers at the 27th convention of the Woodworkers.

During the week-long session, delegates representing more than 100,000 members of the IWA in the United States and Canada re-elected officers, approved broad changes in the union's constitution and adopted a number of policy resolutions.

Re-elected without opposition were Pres. Ronald F. Roley, First Vice Pres. Keith W. Johnson, Second Vice Pres. H. Landon Ladd, Sec.-Treas. William Botkin and Trustee H. E. Geiger.

In his opening address, Roley charged that Nixon's economic policies have fueled rather than curbed inflation, caused growing unemployment and "by freezing wages, placed an unfair burden on the working men and women of this nation."

Voicing support for the AFL-CIO position on the Nixon policy, Roley said he does not disagree that there is a need for controls on the economy.

"But I certainly have a quarrel with those who say the controls should be on working people alone," he said. "I know there are delegates sitting in this convention hall who are not receiving wage increases because of the freeze.

"At the same time, there are no controls on profits, dividends, interest rates and other income which working people do not normally enjoy."

Roley told the convention that wages always have been controlled by the collective bargaining process, but that the law of supply and demand no longer operates to keep prices at a reasonable level because "corporate power has been concentrated in the hands of a few huge conglomerates which can withhold products until they get the price they want."

Roley also criticized Nixon for appointments to the U.S. Supreme Court and the National Labor Relations Board and warned that "the effect of these appointments will be felt by working people for decades to come."

Similar criticism of the Administration was expressed in convention talks by Donald MacDonald, president of the Canadian Labor Congress.

MacDonald compared the current Nixon economic plan with a price and wage control program placed in effect by the Canadian government in 1968.

"A prices and incomes commission was created and it quickly became apparent that all its energy was directed toward forcing workers to accept wage guidelines—a wage straitjacket might have been a more accurate term," MacDonald said.

"The commission went through an exercise—it was really no more than that—with regard to keeping prices down. The whole program was a failure.

"We are still experiencing price increases despite heavy unemployment. We have, in fact, the worst of both worlds."

The IWA delegates unanimously adopted a resolution that "flatly rejects" the Nixon economic plan and "calls on the United States government to recognize its obligations to all sections of the economic community of North America."

The resolution also placed the IWA on record to "emphatically reject any wage freeze now and after the 90-day freeze period, and also reject the concept that the working class bear the burdens of the corporate elite and the political administration."

Much of the convention time was spent on a report by a committee formed in 1969 to update the IWA constitution. Changes approved ranged from increasing the term of elected officers from two to four years—effective in 1973—to broader programs of coordinated bargaining and services to regional councils and local unions.

Resolutions approved by the delegates included a strong protest against the proposed nuclear test explosion on Amchitka Island, endorsement of a concerted drive to encourage registration and voting by the 18 to 21-year group, support for the Kennedy-Griffiths National Health Security legislation, improved workmen's compensation programs, and opposition to bills that would deny welfare benefits and food stamps to strikers.

Meat Cutters Win Minnesota Election

Pelican Rapids, Minn.—The Meat Cutters were selected to represent the 383 employes of West Central Turkeys, Inc., here in a National Labor Relations Board election. The vote was 201 for the union, 126 against.

AFL-CIO Regional Director Carl Winn reported that the company apparently tried to frustrate the Meat Cutters' organizing drive by hiring 84 migrant workers. But the tactic backfired when all 84 signed union authorization cards.

Study Finds Reinstatement Fails To Remedy Most Illegal Firings

Fewer than half the workers who lose their jobs because of union activity are ever successfully reinstated—and something needs to be done about it, a member of Congress declares in the September issue of the American Federationist.

"Reinstatement isn't enough," Rep. Lee Aspin (D-Wis.) concludes on the basis of a study he started while working for a doctoral degree in economics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1964. Later he expanded his survey of National Labor Relations Board cases in the New England states, and now gives his findings in the AFL-CIO's monthly magazine.

"Among the changes needed to make the National Labor Relations Act an effective law," Aspin writes, "are improvements in the particularly weak section of the law pertaining to the rights of individuals wrongly fired for union activity."

Aspin advises that "employes fired for exercising their right to join and assist labor unions need more help than the law and the National Labor Relations Board are giving them."

The law requires that a person illegally fired for union activity must be offered reinstatement to the same position he was fired from, or a "substantially equivalent" position.

What happens in cases where the NLRB orders the employer to comply with the law? The NLRB itself "has very little idea" of what happens to reinstated employes, Aspin found after sampling 71 cases covering 194 employes who were fired between July 1, 1962, and July 1, 1964, in the NLRB's New England region.

Most of the cases—62 of 71—rose out of organizing drives and most—50 of the 71—were settled informally.

What Aspin's study found was that at first, most illegally fired workers wanted reinstatement with their former company.

"But the company definitely did not want them back. And very few of them were actually successfully reinstated."

Fewer than half ever went back, the article reports. Three major reasons were given: the complainant found a better job; he waived reinstatement in order to get some backpay in a deal with management; he was afraid of company retaliation if he got his job back.

A fired employe, faced with unpaid bills, naturally "is tempted when the company offers him perhaps several hundred dollars in backpay if he will settle the case and refuse reinstatement," the author points out.

But "the most frequent reason for refusing reinstatement was the fear of company retaliation. . ."

He knows that some jobs "are heavier or dirtier than others and begins to wonder how they will be assigned." So he settles for lost pay and keeps trying to find another job.

What happened to those who were reinstated? Aspin found that two thirds of them "were gone from the company within two years after reinstatement." The most frequent reason given for leaving was "bad company treatment."

The study found that reinstatement was likely to be successful in only 10 to 30 percent of the cases studied. That led to these recommendations by Aspin for improving enforcement of the federal labor law:

- The NLRB should make liberal use of that section of the law which allows it to seek a court injunction and immediate reinstatement of fired workers. Use of this remedy "is extremely rare," the article notes.
- The NLRB should adopt a policy of actively encouraging reinstatement for all fired individuals. A system of follow-up interviews should be used to make sure management is not mistreating them. The company should be told these interviews will take place but should not be told when they will be held.
- The NLRB should send a letter to the worker when he is reinstated, telling him what his rights are and what kind of treatment is forbidden. The letter should name the NLRB officer who should be contacted if the worker has any further trouble or questions.
- Unfair labor practice violations should be well publicized. NLRB regional offices should encourage public reporting of unfair practice cases.
- Companies violating the law should be made to pay triple damages to the reinstated worker. Stiff fines should be imposed on firms that repeatedly and deliberately violate the law "because it costs less money to break the law than to accept the union" chosen by employes.

"As it now stands," Aspin observes, "the law has no penalties for violations and seeks no punishment—it seeks only restitution, such as the backpay and reinstatement provisions."

The study shows that "this policy of conciliation does not work. Most companies were breaking the law . . . because it cost them little or nothing to do it. Sufficient penalties, vigorously enforced, would offer important incentives to these companies to comply with the law."

Political Action Plan Launched in Colorado

Colorado Springs—The Colorado AFL-CIO convention put its major emphasis on political action by creating an additional COPE district in preparation for 1972 elections and authorizing a special two-day meeting of the council's executive board to spell out election-year assignments.

More than 550 delegates and visitors from Colorado and 11 other states heard talks by three Democratic senators, messages from three others and a sound movie which set the tone for the three-day convention—the ninth biennial gathering of the state labor body.

The movie, featuring AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in a Colorado-produced film, detailed the shortcomings of the Nixon economic program — rising unemployment, deepening recession and a freeze that keeps negotiated wage increases in the pockets of employers while putting no restraints on interest rates, profits or dividends.

The convention theme, Our Job Is Cut Out for Us in '72 was carried out in talks by COPE representatives LaMar Gulbransen, Mrs. Margaret Thornburgh, western area women's activities director, and others.

The delegates called for the immediate establishment of a Domestic Peace Production Council to put the unemployed to work and reduce the rate of reportable unemployment to no more than 2.5 percent within the next 12 months. Also they endorsed the setting of an early date for U.S. withdrawal from Southeast Asia.

State AFL-CIO officers were instructed by the convention to seek expansion of AFL-CIO organizational services in mountain and southwestern states, and a "more realistic" approach to upgrading affiliate support at the state and local level.

The delegates proclaimed unanimously "if the present Administration in Washington has proved anything to us, elections to national and state office depend upon people voting, and understanding who and what they are voting for."

Convention business included the re-election of state Pres. Herrick Roth and Sec.-Treas. A. Toffoli; raising the per capita levy from 22 cents per member per month to 30 cents; and enlarging executive board membership from 27 to 30.

The new executive board will meet Oct. 11 and 12 to decide the issues which the state body will seek to put on the 1972 election ballot by initiative, and to set an interim convention date for next April.

Guest speakers included Senators Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), Fred R. Harris (D-Okla.) and Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.).

Includes Child Care Plan:

Anti-Poverty Drive Extended by House

The House voted to continue the government's anti-poverty programs, establish a non-profit legal services corporation for the poor, insulated from politics, and inaugurate a massive new child development program of comprehensive day care for children of working mothers.

A series of narrow votes saved the key child development section of the bill, although Republicans succeeded in imposing a fee schedule for low-income families above the near-poverty level.

The Senate approved a broader program three weeks earlier and a House-Senate conference committee will resolve differences between the two measures.

Labor strongly supported the child development concept and legislative representatives of the AFL-CIO, the Clothing Workers, the Ladies' Garment Workers and other unions with substantial numbers of working mothers actively pushed the bill.

Both the House and Senate versions go far beyond the Administration proposal for custodial-type day care centers to keep watch over the children of welfare mothers who take jobs or are enrolled in job-training programs.

Under the congressional versions, the child care centers would include health services and cultural enrichment programs—and would not be limited to families below the poverty level.

In the Senate bill, children from families with incomes up to the Labor Dept.'s "minimum" urban budget—about $6,900 a year for a family of four—would be eligible for free day care. Families with higher incomes would be accepted at a sliding fee based on ability to pay.

The House version limits free care to families with lower income —$4,320 a year maximum for a family of four. But families with higher incomes would be eligible on a sliding fee scale.

The House was also divided over the mechanism for distributing child care funds. A labor-supported amendment was adopted making direct grants to all cities and counties with population over 10,000—as contrasted to a proposal that would have given the states control of funds for cities of under 100,000.

As for the once highly controversial anti-poverty program, enacted over bitter conservative opposition in 1964, there was near-unanimity that the federal government has a continuing obligation to help its neediest citizens.

The two-year extension bill had won bipartisan 32-3 approval from the House Education & Labor Committee. And Committee Chairman Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) took note of the broad support that has emerged "for legislation born in controversy."

He told the House that the legislation that is being continued rejected "the idea that poverty is man's natural condition. It was a testament to our belief that the United States is a strong compassionate country with the resources and the will to hold open the door of opportunity to all of its citizens."

In other congressional developments:

- The House Civil Service Committee voted quick approval of a bill designed to attract support for a resolution disapproving Pres. Nixon's plan to delay a scheduled pay raise for salaried federal employes from Jan. 1, 1972, until July 1.

The bill, which will be taken up at the same time as the Oct. 6 vote on the resolution of disapproval, specifies that the federal employe raise will not be greater than increases allowed for workers in private industry under whatever wage stabilization controls may be in effect at that time.

- The outlook for establishment of an independent federal agency to represent consumers brightened substantially with approval of a compromise bill by the House Government Operations Committee.

President Rejects Curb On Profits as 'Unfair'

As for curbing interest rates, "you can limit the interest rates, but you can't make the banker loan the money." So it would be nice if interest rates came down but "it is a question of providing some system under which the money that is needed for a growing economy is forthcoming."

A lone union official on the Detroit panel noted that the wage freeze is estimated to have cost American workers more than $500 million in wage increases already agreed to in collective bargaining.

"Because of this freeze," he noted, "this huge amount of money was retained by the companies. Also, many thousands of individuals have had their wages frozen at a time when they are already behind other wage earners, many in the same industry. How will these inequities be resolved?" he asked.

Nixon conceded that "there are inequities," adding.

"These inequities must be equally shared—equally shared during the period of the freeze."

But he conceded that a more flexible policy would be necessary in "Phase 2" of the stabilization program because if the inequities were allowed to "fester" the "massive public support for the freeze would tend to erode."

Back in Washington, Commerce Sec. Maurice H. Stans took a gloves-off approach to critics of the Administration's economic policy, accusing them of "bringing it into the political arena."

Profits are too low, Stans complained, "and would have to go up considerably before we would have to control excess profits."

He denied that the Administration's economic policies are based on a "trickle-down" theory or that its tax proposals would be a "bonanza for business." But if new jobs are going to be created, he argued, business profits must improve.

As for critics of the Administration program, Stans commented: "I don't believe that political prevarication or partisan political obstruction are in the mood of the country."

Despite the multisyllabic put-down, the criticism continued to mount.

The Committee for National Health Insurance took a dim view of a Cost of Living Council ruling permitting insurance companies to increase certain health insurance premiums.

Rubber Workers Pres. Peter Bommarito charged that the council's rulings denying scheduled wage progressions and additional vacation benefits were "discriminatory and grossly inequitable."

And the executive board of the Glass Bottle Blowers declared that AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany "speaks for our members and all working men and women when he points out that the Nixon doctrine throws an extra burden on the shoulders of the working man."

Census Polling Public Attitude To 'Game Plan'

hold is out of work or is "self-employed in own business, profession, practice or farm" or if he is "working without pay in family business or farm."

Earlier in Question No. 7, the interviewee is asked:

"Do you think the freeze is equally fair to all groups in the country?"

"Which groups are benefitting from it?"

"Which groups are not benefitting from the freeze?"

The survey will be conducted to give a nationwide sampling. Half of the interviews are to be conducted by phone and the other half by an interviewer who visits the household.

The bureau spokesman said the telephone samplings were reliable because those to be interviewed have been surveyed before for consumer buying trends.

The same spokesman said it was not the first time the Census Bureau has conducted opinion polls as opposed to gathering factual material —which the bureau usually does— on population, income or employment.

He cited a survey on Medicare in which those interviewed were asked "attitudinal" questions such as "Are you treated fairly by your doctor?"

He said the questions to be asked are sometimes submitted to the bureau or formulated by bureau profesionals for approval of the agency requesting the survey—in this case, the Cost of Living Council.

Treasury Covers Bank For $39 Million Error

It doesn't cost, it pays to make a $39 million bookkeeping error—if you happen to be a big bank dealing with the U.S. government.

That's what the First National City Bank of New York discovered after two of its branches last spring paid the U.S. Treasury for the same government security, priced at $38.8 million.

When the bank discovered its error two and one-half months later, it asked for and received an immediate refund of the duplicate payment.

But, according to an Associated Press account, "the bank also asked for, and got, an additional $38.8 million to use free of charge for two and one-half months so it could make up for what it could have earned on private loans during the time the money was missing."

Even though the error was the bank's fault, the Treasury promptly obliged and handed over the money.

As it turned out, the bank ended up with a substantial profit from its mistake. About the time it received the free use of $38.8 million in government funds, it joined with other major banks in raising its prime interest rate. So it earned more profit than if it hadn't made the error.

House Banking Committee Chairman Wright Patman (D-Tex.) doesn't see why the Treasury should use public funds to compensate a bank for its own mistake. He said First National City, the nation's second largest bank, should return to the government its proceeds from the use of the money.

But a Treasury Dept. official didn't agree. He termed the arrangement "a normal transaction."

Meany Urges President to Select 'Outstanding' Candiates for Court

The AFL-CIO urged Pres. Nixon to fill the two vacancies on the Supreme Court with "men or women of outstanding professional qualifications."

Federation Pres. George Meany served notice that labor will urge the Senate to reject any nominee who falls short of the standards the nation expects for its highest court.

Nixon, he stressed, has no mandate from the electorate "to stack the court with reactionary non-entities."

The resignation and subsequent death of Justice Hugo L. Black and the resignation of Justice John M. Harlan gives the President the opportunity to make his third and fourth appointments to the nine-member court.

His decisions, Meany noted, "will influence the quality and direction of that great institution for decades to come."

It took three tries before the President found a nominee the Senate would accept in filling the last vacancy. His first two candidates were rejected—one after conflict of interest charges were not answered to the satisfaction of the Senate, and the second after allegations of judicial incompetence and racial bias.

Meany urged the President "to preserve a reasonable balance of views on the court."

During the 1950s and 1960s, he noted, "the Supreme Court was a major force for progress. It insisted on fair and equal treatment for all Americans, regardless of race, and its one-man, one-vote decisions contributed importantly to the full realization of democratic ideals. The court's members, including those appointed by Pres. Eisenhower, enjoyed a high reputation for professional excellence."

Supreme Court justices, Meany said, should not be chosen "solely because of racial, religious or geographical considerations or their sex, or rejected for those reasons."

If the President's nominees don't meet the standards of professional qualifications, Meany declared, the AFL-CIO "will again urge the Senate to exercise its equal, constitutional responsibility to see to it that this great branch of the government is not degraded."

Congress Backs 6-Month Federal Pay Boost Delay

Nixon Sets Boards On Pay, Prices

A tripartite pay board and a public-member price commission will be the key features of the post-freeze stabilization program after Nov. 13, Pres. Nixon announced in a nationwide broadcast.

The objective of the program will be to reduce the rate of inflation to 2 to 3 percent by the end of 1972, the White House said.

The pay and price boards "will seek voluntary cooperation from business and labor, but they will be backed by the authority of law to make their decisions stick," the President said.

The pay board will be composed of five members each from labor, management and the public; the price commission will be made up of seven public members.

In a background paper on the post-freeze program, the Administration said that the Cost of Living Council, set up under the original freeze order and headed by Treasury Sec. John Connally, will not hear appeals on specific cases from either the pay or price boards.

An Administration spokesman at a briefing for reporters said both boards would be operating within the general framework of the program and its goals. The role of the council was described as that of coordinator. It will strive for an overall sense of consistency in the program and supervise it.

There were interpretations, however, that the Cost of Living Council would have the power to approve or disapprove standards established by the Pay Board or Price Commission.

The President said that he would ask Congress to extend for one year the Economic Stabilization Act under which he acted on the original wage-price freeze and which is the basis for the post-freeze program. Administration spokesmen said, however, that there would be no overall time limit on the program.

The President said he would ask Congress for standby controls over interest rates and dividends. The post-freeze program calls for the creation of a Committee on Interest & Dividends headed by Federal Reserve Board Chairman Arthur Burns and working under the Cost of Living Council to seek voluntary restraint on interest rates and dividend payments.

The post-freeze program calls also for a Committee on the Health Services Industry and a Committee on State & Local Government Cooperation to handle special problems in these areas. The Productivity Commission will be expanded ECONOMIC DICTATORSHIP charges were leveled at Pres. Nixon by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as he addressed the 9th Constitutional Convention of the Industrial Union Dept. Meany lashed out strongly at Nixon's action nullifying negotiated pay increases during the 90-day wage freeze.

Both Houses Fail To Overturn Order

Both the House and Senate refused to overturn Pres. Nixon's proposed six-month delay in pay increases for some 1.3 million salaried federal workers.

Labor had urged rejection of what AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany termed the "outrageous" Administration plan which "unfairly singles out for special penalty" the federal employes.

The government workers are due a 6 percent pay increase next Jan. 1 based on attaining comparability with private employment, but a delay to next July 1 was part of the Administration's wage freeze announced Aug. 15.

The last chance to overturn the delay failed 51-32 in the Senate. The House had voted 207-174 to sustain the Nixon plan a few days earlier.

The Senate vote came only a few hours before the expiration of the 30-day time limit within which either house could reverse the President's action by a simple majority vote. It was also only a few hours before Nixon was to announce plans for the post-freeze period.

An attempt was made in the Senate to salvage part of the pay increase on Jan. 1 by reducing it from 6 percent to what is allowed in private industry under Phase 2 of the freeze.

That action came in the Senate on an amendment to the military procurement bill. It passed by a vote of 60 to 27, but the failure of the Senate to overturn the delay left the amendment at the mercy of the conference committee. The House had previously passed the military procurement bill with no such provision.

Nixon also has blocked wage increases for more than 650,000 blue-collar workers of the federal government, whose pay is keyed to area prevailing rates in private industry.

Court Halts West Coast Dock Strike

The Nixon Administration invoked the Taft-Hartley Act to break strikes of West Coast longshoremen and Chicago grain handlers, but called for a voluntary resumption of negotiations between striking Atlantic and Gulf Coast dockworkers and their employers.

White House aides said Pres. Nixon ordered the Justice Dept. to seek 80-day injunctions from federal courts in the three-month-old strike of 15,000 members of the unaffiliated Longshoremen & Warehousemen against the Pacific Maritime Association, and in the strike by 225 members of ILA Local 418 who have been picketing nine Chicago grain elevators since Sept. 1.

A federal judge in San Francisco, heeding a Justice Dept. claim of "irreparable harm," granted a temporary restraining order and set a hearing for Oct. 8 on a permanent order. In Chicago, the Administration got a 10-day temporary back-to-work order.

ILWU representatives denied the West Coast strike "imperils the national health and safety." It said its members are now handling commercial, military, defense and Pakistani relief cargo and that alter-

Anti-Unionism Charged:

IUD Delegates Score Administration Bias

By Tom Castor

A sharp and overwhelming reaction to what was branded the anti-labor bias of the Nixon Administration marked the 9th Constitutional Convention of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. in Washington.

More than 500 delegates heard IUD Pres. I. W. Abel denounce Nixon for packing the National Labor Relations Board in favor of employers. And the convention itself expressed apprehension that the President might load the Supreme Court with "reactionary mediocrities."

Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.), one of the authors of the Occupational Safety & Health Act, spelled out the Administration's sins of omission in failing to enforce fully the provisions of that law.

Abel, who was elected unanimously to another two-year term as IUD head, said Nixon's appointments and "planned attacks on the effectiveness of the labor movement are the wages of political defeat."

"They remind us once more of the overriding importance of effective political action as full partner to the importance of collective bargaining," he said in his keynote address.

"What our members have gone through during the last 33 months should be spur enough to political success in 1972."

Abel noted that Nixon has made two appointments to the five-member Labor Board, including its present chairman, Edward B. Miller, who has sided with the employer in 70 out of 73 cases. When the President fills a current vacancy on the board, he will have a majority, Abel noted.

With two Nixon appointees on the Supreme Court now, and two current vacancies, "there is a possi-

HEW Urged Not to Boost Medicare Cost

Medicare beneficiaries will be paying 13 percent more in deductibles and coinsurance for hospital care beginning next Jan. 1.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called the increase "tragic" and immediately urged Sec. Elliot L. Richardson of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to rescind it.

The increase means the elderly will be paying the first $68 of hospital bills. Meany pointed out that most of the elderly cannot afford the increase. "For many the choice will be between food or health care," he told Richardson in a letter.

"The elderly—the nation's most

House Votes Business Tax Windfall, Labor Assails 'Raid on Treasury'

The House passed and sent to the Senate a package of tax changes that would give business a multi-billion dollar windfall.

It includes a 7 percent investment tax credit, which would mean that the government will pick up the tab for part of the cost of all equipment purchased by a company, even if the purchase does not involve any job-creating expansion.

And it would write into law most of the tax depreciation rules the Administration put into effect this year—a move that labor had strongly criticized.

The AFL-CIO had urged rejection of the bill, terming the tax proposals "a giant raid on the federal treasury that would transfer billions of dollars in public funds into the private treasuries of big business."

In a letter to all congressmen, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said that the tax windfall for business would come at the expense of the poor through delays in welfare reforms, government employes through elimination of 100,000 jobs and a 10-month freeze on wage increases, and state and local governments through delays in long-promised federal aid for public investment needs.

The legislation drawn up by the House Ways & Means Committee won approval on a voice vote. Remarkably, for an issue of this nature, not a single House member asked for a roll call on the vote. As is its custom on tax bills, the House considered the legislation under a no-amendment rule.

The House bill modifies somewhat the proposals originally urged by Nixon.

But two days before the House

Maine Labor Asks Expanded Craft Training

Bangor, Me.—The Maine AFL-CIO has begun an effort to get more vocational schools to meet the training needs of the construction industry, Pres. Benjamin J. Dorsky reported at the convention of the state central body.

Dorsky said he and officers of the Building Trades Council have discussed with state officials the purchase of a closed Oblate Fathers seminary in Bucksport as a school for trade training, and the enlargement of other schools in the state system.

The State AFL-CIO succeeded in getting state legislators to raise the Maine minimum wage from $1.60 an hour to $1.80, and to key it to the federal minimums during the last session, Dorsky noted. Maine minimums will raise in the future when the federal minimums are increased, he said.

Convention sessions were attended by 148 delegates from local unions with 16,000 members. The delegates elected Dorsky for his eighth consecutive term by acclamation.

They chose Thurman Millett of the Papermakers & Paperworkers, East Millinocket, as vice president in a four-way contest to fill a vacancy. Vice Pres. Kenneth Snowden of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers was not a candidate for re-election. The terms are for four years.

Dorsky has been president of the AFL-CIO and the predecessor state AFL since 1937. He is a member of the Stage Employes. The term of Sec. Harold S. Noddin does not expire until 1973.

The convention voted to establish an executive committee consisting of the three top officers and four other members, named by the 33-person executive board. It voted also to give the executive board direction over the State Labor News.

The delegates adopted resolutions calling on the New England Governors' Council to promote more summer cruises along the Maine coast line, asking withdrawal of U.S. troops from Southeast Asia by next Jan. 1, and opposing the Nixon freeze on wages and some prices as inequitable.

JAILED IN PEORIA for disobeying a no-strike injunction that was later set aside, staff representative Harold Benedict of the State, County & Municipal Employes didn't go alone. Two daughters and 225 fellow unionists walked with him from the Labor Temple to the County Jail, singing and carrying signs deploring his 60-day sentence. Gov. Ogilvie (R) refused clemency.

Cable Systems Promise New Horizons for TV

The vast potential of cable television is just now being recognized even though such systems have been operating in many parts of the country for 20 years.

Nearly 6 million American homes are plugged into the many community antenna television systems today, and this number should jump five-fold by the end of the decade, writes Lee White in the September issue of the AFL-CIO's Federationist magazine.

While CATV was virtually ignored until a few years ago, "suddenly it's realized that cable TV can radically change the way Americans communicate with one another," White says.

It is clear that CATV's potential is only starting to show its impact, the article points out, as Congress, the White House and the Federal Communications Commission are getting into the act.

By 1980—provided the FCC permits the rapid growth that is possible—the number of CATV systems could double to 5,000 and be serving an estimated 30 million homes, White predicts.

Instead of the handful of channels available on the regular broadcast television VHF and UHF bands, White says that cable systems offer almost limitless possibilities.

"Imagine a television set with 40 or more channels showing ghost-free pictures. Diversity and choice . . . to the viewing public as a dozen channels offer entertainment. Others provide complete coverage of city council and school board meetings, debates on issues like pollution and air traffic, lectures. . . ."

White, who handles public relations for the Communications Workers, further notes that two-way cables could sample public opinion, read electric meters, display shopping catalogs and take orders.

Trade unions, broadcasters, educators and manufacturers are paying close attention to the growth of CATV, he reports.

"Of crucial importance at the outset are contractual arrangements that will protect against the re-use of material without compensation."

Actors and musicians are seeking protections in these areas as cable operators begin to originate more programming. And the wages and working conditions of technical workers are of major concern to their unions, White adds.

Cable television got its start in small communities that suffered from poor reception of regular TV broadcasts.

At first, over-the-air broadcasters virtually ignored the CATV systems, White recalls. "But the name of the game changed fast in the 1960s when some cable operators found ready markets and willing subscribers even in towns where reception was good."

When the FCC recognized that UHF stations were vulnerable to cable competition, the commission abandoned its earlier decision to let CATV develop without regulation.

In 1966, the FCC assumed jurisdiction over all CATV and ruled the nation's 100 largest cities off limits to cable systems. About 90 percent of the nation's population lives in those 100 cities, and yet, the contributions that cable TV can bring to these areas is disallowed, White points out.

But it appears that many who opposed CATV have abandoned their hostility, White notes, "and that the time may be fast approaching when it will have a full opportunity to live up to its promise."

Broadcast Employes Elect Lynch President

Toronto—Edward M. Lynch was elected president of the Broadcast Employe & Technicians at NABET's sixth triennial constitutional convention over incumbent Timothy J. O'Sullivan.

Lynch, who has been on the union's staff since 1952 as a regional director and network contract coordinator, received 4,620 votes. O'Sullivan garnered 4,040 votes.

The convention also elected Duane Corder of NABET Local 41 in Chicago as secretary-treasurer to succeed Arthur Hjorth, who retired after 20 years. Corder was elected with 5,752 votes over John Donley of Local 31, Washington, who received 2,908 votes.

Incumbent Vice Pres. James Harvey, Local 31, was re-elected to a new three-year term over Arthur Kent, Local 11, New York. Canadian Affairs Vice Pres. Ronald Pambrun was re-elected unanimously when Jean Benoit of Montreal withdrew from the race.

O'Sullivan, who had been a NABET organizer in Canada and regional director in California before he was elected president in 1968, will temporarily serve as assistant to Pres. Lynch. Lynch, 51, started his three-year term the day he was elected.

The 78 delegates also unanimously elected Jiacomo Papa as the Canadian secretary-treasurer, an office that previously was appointive.

A move to establish two separate national executive boards—one for U.S. units and another for the Canadians—was rejected by a vote of 4,103 to 3,659. NABET currently operates with a single executive council that represents the union's jurisdiction of network, independent and Canadian units. About 30 percent of NABET's membership is in Canada.

After two days of voting on recommendations of the union's constitution committee, the convention reached an impasse. But a final resolution that provides for a constitutional study committee which will make recommendations to the 1974 convention was approved on a vote of 5,759 to 2,901.

The committee will be formed by Lynch on the recommendations of all NABET locals.

At ATU Convention:

Transit Services Pressed for Cities

Las Vegas—Measures designed to improve mass transit service in the big cities of America won the endorsement of Transit Union delegates at ATU's 41st convention.

Some 450 delegates representing 125,000 union members in the United States and Canada approved ATU's sponsorship of such programs as no-fare bus and train service on publicly owned lines, reserved bus lanes on highways in rush hours, dial-a-bus feeder lines and more frequent cross-town service.

Union officers have long urged special measures to relieve traffic jams and one-rider-per-car congestion. They gave delegates a report asking their backing for no-fare, publicly owned mass transit systems, use of computer systems to assign buses to locations where they are most needed, and other means of moving more people rapidly.

"Mass transit is a service vital to maintaining a viable urban community," the report pointed out. It should be supported like all other municipal services—libraries, schools, parks, police and fire service, streets and roads, the report said.

A no-fare transit system deserves government aid as much as auto transportation, airlines, shipping, railroads and farming, the convention agreed.

Assistant Prof. Dan Roos of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology said MIT has developed a system under which riders dial for service when they need it. MIT has applied for federal funds for a demonstration program of such service in Rochester, N.Y., Roos said.

The delegates voted new two-year terms for Pres. John M. Elliott, Executive Vice Pres. Edward W. Oliver and Sec.-Treas. James J. Hill. Nine members of the executive board and nine vice presidents also were returned to office.

The convention amended the rules to add a new vice president to the rolls—Bruce Foster, president of Cleveland Local 268. Foster is the union's first Negro vice president.

In other changes, the delegates ratified a formula for financial aid to divisions that arbitrate new or renewed contracts, established a trust fund for retired officers and union employes, and enacted more safeguards against dual unionism "or other disloyal acts" of members.

The convention voted support for the Kennedy-Griffiths health security program. It gave conditional support for the release by Congress of subway funds for the District of Columbia, and called on Congress to reopen Arlington National Cemetery to all charter and sight-seeing bus services.

The non-union Landmark Mobile Tours have been given the exclusive right by the Army to provide service, a report stated.

Convention speakers included AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, Federation General Counsel J. Albert Woll, COPE Director Al Barkan, Winfield Homer of the Labor Bureau of the Middle West, Morris Sacharoff, urban transit specialist for the Labor Dept., and Sec.-Treas. Edward P. Murphy of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

Aerospace Firms Hit On Bargaining Delay

Los Angeles—The Machinists and the Auto Workers at a joint meeting here served notice on the Big Four of the aerospace industry that they cannot indefinitely use the Nixon wage freeze as an excuse to deny contract justice to 90,000 union employes.

Delegates from IAM and UAW local unions in the United States and Canada announced that, as soon as Phase II of the Nixon freeze starts, they will immediately set strike deadlines at Boeing, Douglas, Lockheed and North American Rockwell plants.

An earlier deadline previously was set at the Vertol helicopter plant of Douglas at Malton, Ont. The UAW accused management of aping the U.S. freeze psychology, and set noon Oct. 13 as the deadline for negotiating a new contract.

Three hundred delegates to the joint meeting reported that negotiations in aerospace have been "frozen on dead center" since Aug. 15, when Pres. Nixon halted all wage increases for at least 90 days.

Their joint statement charged that the "flagrant inequities of the Nixon freeze, which is rigid for wage earners but lenient, and largely unenforced and unenforceable for employers, inspired aerospace managements to contrive a freeze of their own" to put the collective bargaining process "on ice."

Despite the fact that the Nixon action was not designed to halt all collective bargaining until Nov. 13, "the evidence is plain that aerospace management has not engaged in serious bargaining," the statement said. It charged that the companies have refused to negotiate meaningfully "even on non-economic issues."

The conferees called on management of the Big Four firms to "come out from their hiding place behind the Nixon freeze with a resolve to resume negotiations in good faith" both as to economic and non-economic issues.

Union negotiations with Lockheed were suspended for weeks while the company lobbied for a Congressional appropriation to stay in business. Talks had just been resumed and continued past a July 23 expiration date when the freeze order broke. Contracts with Boeing, Douglas and North American Rockwell reached their expiration dates in September.

Expiring after Phase I of the freeze are union agreements with United Aircraft Corp. in Connecticut—Nov. 30—and the McDonnell division of McDonnell Douglas in St. Louis—next Jan. 30.

The UAW and the IAM reminded all managements in the industry that the two unions signed agreements last Mar. 12 binding themselves to "strengthen our cooperative relationship . . . to assure maximum strength" at the negotiating table.

IAM Pres. Floyd Smith and UAW Pres. Leonard Woodcock told the aerospace rally that their unions will not accept any wage and price formula that "puts the burden of economic stabilization on the backs of the working man."

Anti-Unionism Charged:

IUD Delegates Score Administration Bias

bility that, before he leaves office next year, Nixon will have named a majority of the court and leave us a legacy of doubt and conservatism for many, many years to come."

Delegates gave wholehearted support to a resolution declaring that the IUD would fight any "unworthy or inferior" nominee to the high court.

It expressed grave concern that impending nominations may "betray Pres. Nixon's insensitive lack of understanding of the national need for a Supreme Court of outstanding wisdom and devotion to the best traditions of our democratic society."

The resolution called on the President to appoint justices who would "preserve the independence, integrity and stature of the Supreme Court and continue the tradition of professional excellence."

Other resolutions adopted by the convention included measures calling for:

- Federal legislation to provide criminal penalties for employers "who knowingly and willfully hire illegal immigrants thus robbing legal immigrants and American citizens of employment opportunities at decent wages."
- Reform of the American prison system with fair treatment of prisoners and decent pay and work standards for prison personnel.
- An equitable post-freeze economic program. The resolution demanded that "all monies that have been withheld from workers . . . be paid at once, retroactive to the appropriate effective date."

"We will not allow ourselves to be made pawns of a lopsided system which curbs workers' wages, but does nothing to effectively curb prices, profits, interest rates and other unfrozen incomes," the resolution stated.

Abel also was critical of Congress for its failure to enact an insurance program for workers' pensions, terming it a "national scandal."

He said between 30 and 50 percent of the 30 million workers now covered by private pension plans "will never see a nickel of benefits" and that every year about 30,000 workers "lose out on pensions simply because their employers go broke."

"We are engaged in a real struggle in Congress to eliminate this terrible uncertainty which hangs over every private pension plan in the country," he said.

"If Congress can insure bank deposits and if Congress can insure Wall Street brokerage firms, it sure can insure the pensions of the workers of America."

Williams told delegates that although the Occupational Safety & Health Act covers 4 million workplaces, the Labor Dept. has asked for only enough funds to place 550 compliance officers in the field by June 30, 1972.

"With one inspector for every 7,200 establishments, you can see a lot of inspection is never going to get done," he said.

The Senator noted that pro-labor forces in Congress did manage to secure 200 more inspectors, but that "even this modest increase may be wiped out because of the government hiring cutbacks which are part of the President's so-called 'new prosperity' program."

He characterized the Nixon Administration as one that has "little sympathy for the concept of workers' rights and workers' participation, which is embodied in the act."

"And it is an Administration which seems singularly determined to turn over most of the program to the states, whose past inadequacies provided the chief reason for passage of this Act," he said.

Williams said the time is not far off when the Senate Labor committee will have to begin conducting oversight hearings to determine just how this law is being implemented.

"I can't think of many better purposes for spending money than safeguarding the safety and health of those who produce the nation's wealth. And the day we get an Administration that sees things the same way, I believe the fullest realization of the Act's goals will be within our grasp."

Three leaders of international unions and the president of an unaffiliated teachers' organization denounced the wage-price freeze as discriminatory. Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.) addressed the convention banquet on environmental problems.

Other speakers included Senators Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.) and Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), plus economist Robert Nathan and Bayard Rustin, director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

Abel, who also heads the Steelworkers, reported to the convention that IUD assets currently total $3,992,596 as compared with $2,650,000 in 1969.

And he presented a charter to the IUD's newest affiliate, the Molders—one of the oldest national unions in the country. The Molders became the 61st AFL-CIO union to affiliate with the department.

LOST WAGES AND JOBS were the subject of a Capitol Hill protest sponsored by the AFL-CIO's Industrial Union Dept. It attracted more than 4,000 trade unionists who came from across the country to voice their opposition to the freeze on wages and lax trade laws which allow a flood of cheap imports, and the loss of thousands of jobs. The rally preceded the IUD's convention.

4,000 at Rally Call on Congress To 'Save Our Jobs' from Imports

By Mike Bosch

More than 4,000 union members raised the curtain on the Industrial Union Dept.'s convention at a "Save Our Jobs" rally designed to build congressional support for legislation to reform the nation's foreign trade laws.

IUD Pres. I. W. Abel said "the American worker is drowning in a flood of imports produced by exploited labor for private greed, and the accompanying danger is that this drowning worker may take the American standard of living down with him."

"The time has come to stop talking and start acting," Abel asserted. "It's time for some recognition of the realities of international trade and action to deal with those realities."

In the afternoon the unionists fanned out on Capitol Hill to buttonhole their congressmen, acquaint them with the problems facing workers as the job market shrinks and urging their support for the Hartke-Burke bill.

Busload after busload emptied onto the Capitol grounds and the halls of congressional office buildings were soon filled with determined unionists demanding that something be done about the import crisis.

Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Macihne Workers, chairman of the rally, brought cheers with a stinging denunciation of the Nixon Administration as he accused it of doing nothing to "save our dying industries and bring back the jobs our nation and its cheap-labor-hunting corporate giants have shipped out."

Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky pointed out that labor is not asking that international trade be ended, "but," he cautioned, "it must be regulated."

Pres. Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers declared that although the apparel and textile unions had been hurt, "others have been hit harder. We, therefore, insist upon the need for broad legislation and we intend to give full support to the proposal of the AFL-CIO to protect American jobs."

Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.), one of the principal sponsors of the labor-backed trade reform bill, was given a standing ovation when he shouted, "I know why you're here—and I know why I'm here—you're here because you're fed up—and so am I."

Hartke challenged Nixon to "join us, put your stamp of approval on this bill and you can take credit for the whole thing."

Rep. James A. Burke (D-Mass.), chief House sponsor of the legislation, urged the delegates to "visit every congressman on the Hill and tell them what is happening across America."

The morning session was closed out with a crash course on foreign trade problems by Economist Stanley H. Ruttenberg who explained the main provisions of the Hartke-Burke bill. They include:

- Repeal of tax incentives that encourage firms to establish production facilities abroad.
- Creation of a three-member commission to regulate U.S. foreign trade. The new agency would replace the Tariff Commission and take over the trade functions of the agencies.
- Authority for the commission to set quotas except on items not produced in the United States and those already covered by existing quotas or voluntary agreements.
- Updating of the 1921 Anti-Dumping Act
- Authority for the President to ban or regulate the flow of capital overseas if he determined the transaction harmful to U.S. employment.
- Removal of incentives for U.S. manufacturers to ship components to Mexico for assembly.
- A requirement that goods sold in the U.S. containing foreign-made components would have to be so labeled.

West Coast, Chicago Dock Strikers Ordered Back Under Taft-Hartley

native ports remain open in Vancouver and Ensenada.

No back-to-work order was sought against 60,000 ILA members in the East and Gulf port walkouts, which started Oct. 1, because "constructive negotiations are still possible," the White House said. The President will assign a high-level mediator to seek a settlement in New York.

The ILA had offered to continue working under terms of the old agreement until the wage-price freeze is ended. It proposed that a new contract be negotoiated as soon as Phase II of the freeze goes into effect. The employers refused, the union said.

ILA Pres. Thomas W. Gleason told newsmen that a T-H order would benefit the strikers because it would require employers to maintain the status quo and "they want to change the status quo" by rewriting a guaranteed work year provided in expired contracts.

Gleason declared: "Maybe this will force those guys hiding in the castle"—the shipping magnates—"to come out and start negotiating a contract."

Negotiators for the union and the Committee of North Atlantic Shipping Associations began contract talks Aug. 18. The talks broke down when the employers refused to renew the contract clause that guarantees 2,080 hours of pay annually in New York and other North Atlantic ports.

It was the Administration's first use of the Taft-Hartley injunction process, although it has used injunctions under the Railway Labor Act to force railroad men back to work.

The West Coast strike had halted all coastal and salt water cargo shipping since July 1. Nixon himself urged the negotiators in a face-to-face meeting in Portland, Ore., to resolve their dispute over contract terms by collective bargaining. When negotiations broke off he appointed a five-member board to investigate and report back.

The board, headed by Stanford University Law Prof. J. Keith Mann, told Nixon the West Coast dispute was "an uncommonly difficult" one. It said progress has been made but "there is no conclusive way of determining how close this dispute is to settlement."

Nixon sought a court injunction although the board reported "fear has been expressed that, while negotiations will hopefully continue, heightened government actions at this point will inhibit the parties in resolving their differences."

The same board said the Chicago dispute has shut down shipments of soybeans and corn from all but one Chicago elevator. "There is little chance of settlement," the panel said.

Concerning the Atlantic and Gulf Coast strikes, the board reported that "the parties have not engaged in productive bargaining."

The New York Daily News reported Oct. 4 that Chairman Vincent McDonnell of the State Mediation Board blamed the shipping association for causing the longshore walkout in the East.

McDonnell was quoted as saying management was "out of order" in insisting that it give less to its employes in the future during a time when the union is forbidden, by Presidential order, to seek improvements.

The state's "top labor peacemaker" also criticized the Nixon Administration's hesitation in imposing a Taft-Hartley injunction as being partial to management.

McDonnell said "I am astounded by the President's failure to act on the one occasion that it is not to the benefit of the shippers, when on every other occasion a longshoreman's strike was swiftly met with an injunction."

Meanwhile in Washington, Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson urged the unaffiliated Mine Workers and bituminous coal operators to settle a strike that started Oct 1. in the mines over wages and working conditions.

The main issue in the West Coast strike is said to be jurisdiction over loading and unloading container cargoes at freight stations near the docks. Other issues are wages, pensions, and guaranteed income to slow down automation that destroys jobs.

The disagreement on the East and Gulf coasts is over the shippers' refusal to renew the guaranteed income clause, and over extension of the clause to other ports. Wages also are an issue.

Wait 'til Next Year

FOR FOOTBALL FANS who may have been too engrossed with the early progress of their teams and missed the details and intricacies of Pres. Nixon's new economic program, a knowledgeable analysis has come to hand.

In a speech to the Amalgamated Transit Union convention recently, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland summed it up for those who take their economic news in the sports pages:

"In Mr. Nixon, we have a President who is notoriously addicted to football jargon. It is fair and fitting then to note that if any professional quarterback were to lose as many yards behind the line of scrimmage as he has in the last 2½ years, he would be benched and waived out of the league. . . . Last month . . . with his back against the goal posts he changed the rules of the game. . . ."

First down, '72 to go.

One 'System' for All

IN HIS ADDRESS to the joint session of the Congress last month the President said we should not undermine "the system" that produces America's wealth. He said we shouldn't malign the system because it has produced more abundance than any other system; because the "system" helps the poor, feeds the hungry and makes it possible to clean up our environment.

The "system," of course, is not helping the poor. There are almost 15 million Americans subsisting on welfare. More than 25 million are living in poverty in the midst of the abundance the President talked about. More families were officially classified as impoverished last year than in 1969.

The system is not feeding the hungry. There are estimated to be some 10 million chronically hungry people in America. In fact, the Nixon Administration is even cutting back the school lunch program and thousands of low-income children will stop enjoying their first nutritious noon meals.

The system is not cleaning up the environment. Many rivers and streams are open sewers.

Yes, the system has been working for some, but it has not been working for the poor, the hungry, the jobless, those who forego medical treatment because they cannot afford it, the cities, the schools. We are not maligning the system when we cite its shortcomings. We are simply saying that the system should work not only for some, or the majority; it should work for all.

—IUD Pres. I. W. Abel to the department's convention Oct. 5, 1971, in Washington.

Anti-Unionism by the Can

IT IS BEWILDERING sometimes how so many local newspaper editors reach the same anti-labor opinion on national issues. The answer, of course, is that they have no opinion but, instead, buy the opinions of others.

Some editors purchase "canned" editorials from a national syndicate, such as the Newspaper Enterprise Association (NEA), and publish them in their papers as their own opinions. A one-day check of local editorials received at AFL-CIO headquarters revealed that the same anti-labor editorial appeared in 142 different papers. They were identical, word-for-word.

Maybe editorials need some "truth-in-labeling" as to the source of the opinions they express.

A Word Edgewise:

Nixon's Chance to Fill Court Points Up Realities of Politics

By John P. Roche

THE NEWS that Pres. Nixon is to appoint two new justices to the Supreme Court (and that two more liberal judges are ailing) brings out a certain amount of bitterness in me. Not towards the President; it's not his fault that the opportunity has arisen to fill the court with conservatives. And I hardly expect him to deal with the liberals any more generously than we would deal with conservatives if roles were reversed.

I am completely opposed to the oppression, suppression or repression of conservatives. If I were President, I wouldn't appoint one as dogcatcher. Politically I ask no quarter, and give none either—that's the name of the game.

No, the object of my fury is that group of Democratic intellectuals and related New Politics types, who told us back in 1968 that it didn't make any difference whether Nixon or Humphrey was elected, that they were both from the same bag.

Some of course went even further: leaving candidate Nixon to his own devices, they disrupted Humphrey's meetings and in general conveyed to the American people that the Democratic Party was a permanent, floating bar brawl.

Their fundamental problem was (and is, since they are revving up for 1972 shenanigans) that they confuse politics with a children's game. It is rather as though big real estate operators took "Monopoly" as their model: when you lose a game, the money is redistributed among the players and a new one begins. Nobody is hurt. They live in a world where words and actions have no consequences, where nothing is played for keeps.

Politics, however, is played for keeps. Not, thank God, in the undemocratic fashion favored by most countries, but rather in the sense that you have to live with the results of your actions, even if later on you change your mind.

When, for example, David Halberstam and Neil Sheehan, who in 1963-64 made me sound like a pacifist on Vietnam, later decided that our intervention in Southeast Asia was immoral, obscene, etc., the blackboard was not automatically erased. The war was still there.

Another example of this strange notion that the movement of history is like the production of a film—where, if you don't like the last reel, or the Bad Man outdraws the Sheriff, you simply cut and start over—is the constant howl from the New Left that Israel demonstrate its sincerity by evacuating the Arab territories occupied after the 1967 war.

Leaving aside the curious question of why the burden of proving "sincerity" always seems to rest on Israel, let us suppose that Jerusalem, to indicate good-will, evacuates the Bar-Lev line along the Suez, and a week later the Egyptians cross the canal and move their whole Soviet air-defense system into Sinai.

WHAT WILL the intellectual critics say about this? A few honest ones might say, "Sorry about that." But predictably the bulk would argue that Israel had not adequately proved its sincerity, that what is needed is a coalition government in Jerusalem with Al Fatah representatives in the cabinet, etc, etc.

Fortunately the Israelis are obsessed with reality —as Dr. Johnson observed, "when a man knows he is to be hanged in a fortnight, it concentrates his mind wonderfully"—and are under no illusion that in history unhappy endings can be rewritten.

Now, as Pres. Nixon cheerily packs the Supreme Court with conservatives, perhaps locking it up for the next generation, one can predict that little will be heard from the "Nixon-Humphrey? What difference does it make?" sector. Most of these people probably don't realize the importance of the Supreme Court.

Indeed, Supreme Court justices are notoriously hard to dislodge and firm in their sense of ideological duty. One recalls Chief Justice William Howard Taft, desperately ill in 1929 but hanging on, afraid (as he wrote his brother) that the President would appoint some "bolshevik" to the court. The President, of course, was Herbert Hoover.

One must bear in mind that if the Nixon Court matches the actuarial standards of Justices Black and Douglas, it may be with us as we enter the 21st Century. "Judicial Power" unfortunately is not a game where if you lose, you start over on a fresh board.

Newspaper Opinion Shifts:

Editors Have Second Thoughts, Question Fairness of Freeze

By Allen Zack

WHILE MOST newspaper editorials written immediately after the fact were critical of the AFL-CIO's opposition to Pres. Nixon's new economic policies, a noticeable shift in editorial opinion is now taking place.

The virtually unanimous editorial support the President enjoyed as soon as the wage-price freeze was announced has been replaced by pointed questioning and demands for fair, equitable policies.

In a personal column to readers, the editor of the Philadelphia Daily News wrote:

"If Pres. Nixon doesn't do unto business as he has done unto labor he better make application to his old law firm for post-1972 employment.

"Tough as the freeze is, I'm for it. But I'm not for it in its present form. Business is free to get extra profit while the hands of labor are securely bound. Do the Republicans never learn?

"Let the President sock it to business like he did to the people in South Philly, Port Richmond, West Philly and Roxborough."

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch called for some changes in the tax package proposed by Nixon. "What Congress ought to do," the editorial suggested, "is turn around the priorities in the Administration program to provide more benefits for the poor and lower middle class."

It continued: "It could insist that Mr. Nixon cut more fat out of the defense budget rather than reducing welfare services. Senate Majority Leader Mansfield has said Congress will seek a better balance between the proposed tax relief for business and that for individuals; it should."

The Detroit Free Press commented:

"Some of the President's program is open to question. While we in Detroit and Michigan can easily hail the proposed repeal of the auto excise tax it is difficult to see how each additional 100,000 autos sold will mean 25,000 additional jobs.

"And it is also questionable whether the 10 percent investment tax credit will produce new jobs in such a direct ratio as the President envisions."

Nixon's Labor Day message "was wrapped in too many shop-worn phrases" to suit the Atlanta Journal. "It had too much back-patting with too little challenge on ways to achieve such a worthy goal as increasing job satisfaction," the Journal editorial continued.

"There was too little emphasis on the need for job retraining and public and private investment in better schools, hospitals, new housing, public transportation, pollution abatement and a multitude of community social services."

The Journal noted that AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's Labor Day address "recognized the need for such action and the obvious room for agreement if the White House would talk more about public needs and services and less about management techniques."

The editorial stated that the AFL-CIO's "criticism that the freeze favored business and monied interests over workers in several areas—not the least of which were unrestricted potentials for profit and uncontrolled interest rates—has begun to sink home with more than a few people."

The Nashville Tennessean, in an editorial titled "Mr. Nixon at the Pass: New, Vague Promises," found little of substance in Nixon's address to a joint session of Congress.

"With respect to new jobs," the paper stated, "Democrats remember only too well that Mr. Nixon promised in 1968 and 1969 to create six million new jobs in his first term. So far in that term, the Administration's policies have resulted in 5.1 million persons being unemployed."

THE INVESTMENT TAX credit also came in for criticism from the Grand Rapids, Mich., Press, which said it is "unlikely" the tax credit will have "any appreciable effect" as a construction stimulus. The Press continued:

"Most manufacturers already have all of the plant and equipment they need to expand operations. And AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany wasn't beating a straw man when he observed that if industry did avail itself of the tax credit break to any extent, it probably would be to install more automated equipment which would displace workers."

The Star of Anniston, Ala., looked at the Nixon tax package and asked a question on behalf of the unemployed: "Is that all there is?"

It criticized the "routinely Republican . . . 'trickle down' rationale," calling it "spotty and slow-moving in effectiveness."

"With a little aggressive imagination, the President might have spread the good news and the jobs; for a starter, federally guaranteed, low-cost loans prying loose inactive reserves to spur local-initiative projects." This, the paper said, would result in "trickle up jobs."

The Paducah, Ky., Sun-Democrat found the logic in labor's demand for controls on profits and interest rates "compelling." "Why should profits and lenders' charges be exempted when every other interest is called upon to make sacrifices in the interest of controlling inflation?"

The Redding, Calif., Record-Searchlight reached a similar conclusion:

"It's pretty hard to disagree with the idea that if there's to be sacrifice for the common good, everyone should share in the sacrifice. It may be good economics to give business a tax break at the same time that wages are frozen, but it doesn't make justice and equity."

Lopsided Policy Scored:

Little Relief for Jobless Expected In New Economic 'Game Plan'

ADMINISTRATION CLAIMS that its new economic plan will bolster the badly-sagging job market were strongly contested by AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger.

"We fail to see" real "job-creation in the tax bonanzas for business" proposed by Pres. Nixon, Goldfinger declared. Even taking the President's promise of 500,000 new jobs "at face value," he noted, there would be little impact on total unemployment, which now tops 5 million and continues to rise.

Appearing on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Goldfinger said it would take up to 2 million new jobs in the next year "just to keep unemployment where it is now," and a million more than that to make "significant improvement" in employment.

But, he said, that kind of help won't come from the President's "pro-business, trickle-down policy in which billions of dollars in tax bonanzas go to big business," and the "great mass of people get just the crumbs."

He charged that the President's overall program is "a lopsided package of 19th Century economics" that has "failed every time it's been tried and cannot work this time either."

Goldfinger said that "despite Mr. Nixon's sudden reversal of policy and declaration of a second game plan, we are still in a serious economic situation." He pointed out that current reports show that "the major economic indicators are heading down again," while the cost of living, wholesale prices and applications for unemployment insurance continue to rise.

ON THE REPORTED SHAKE-UP in the Bureau of Labor Statistics, Goldfinger said it would be "a real tragedy . . . to bring in political types" to make the economic figures square more with what the President is saying.

Both labor and business rely on the basic integrity of BLS statistics on the operations of the economic system, he stressed, and Administration moves to "politicalize these figures" will "shake the confidence of the American people . . . and make the United States the laughing-stock of the world."

By Press Associates, Inc.

IF THE STUDY OF ECONOMICS is the "dismal" science as has been frequently proclaimed, surely the study of the very "statistics" that play so large a role in that pursuit must be even more "dismal."

Yet, that is far from the truth as is being illustrated in the current flap over the program of the Nixon Administration to "reorganize" the collection and interpretation of statistics gathered by the Departments of Labor, Commerce and Health, Education & Welfare.

Under the plan, these statistics would be treated in two separate ways—analysis-read interpretation—and data collecting for the benefit of the analysts. Obviously the analysts are going to be in the driver's seat when the moment of truth arrives—that is the interpretation of the numbers for the country, which includes the general public, Congress and a vast array of public agencies and private groups dependent upon them.

On the basis of the Nixon proposal a new group—the analysts—would be interposed between the final product and the men who do the chore of gathering it. Obviously, the identity of these men is of vital concern to the country. And on the basis of what staff changes are now in the wind, the new group will be made up of strictly Nixon men.

This is in startling contrast to the stubborn efforts of American economists over the last century to keep the gathering and interpretation of national statistics on the highest, career level. This has been notably true of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics which was founded in 1884.

It is this staff of professional analysts, developed over the years under more than one administration and schooled in the absolute goal of maintaining the highest professional standards in unbiased and nonpolitical analysis that is now to be dumped in favor of Nixon appointees.

Commissioner of Labor Statistics Geoffrey H. Moore, on publication in the press of what was in the works, issued a lengthy statement insisting that the bureau's "high standards of objectivity and impartiality in the bureau's analysis of its data" will be maintained.

Nevertheless, he confirmed that outside economists will be called in by the Administration to head the "new Office of Data Analysis" for economic and social research, and for the new office of current employment analysis. The old heads of these departments, thus, are being replaced by Nixon men.

The hard fact is that the history of what the Administration already has done to the dissemination and interpretation of federal statistics is far from reassuring. Last February, the Dept. of Labor abruptly cancelled the traditional briefing of the press by bureau analysts because the BLS spokesman did not quite see the politically heartwarming improvement in the unemployment statistics that the Administration did.

EVER SINCE, the press has been briefed by Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson who repeatedly has seen in the BLS statistics complete proof of the success of the Nixon "Game Plan Number 1" at the very time that it was clearly failing and "Game Plan Number 2" was in the works.

Moreover, it is highly unfortunate that the Administration did not see fit to inform its Labor Research Advisory Committee about the reorganization plans that it had in mind. This committee consists of the research directors of some 30 unions and the AFL-CIO.

The last meeting of the committee was in May. It was not told about the upcoming reorganization proposals. It has not yet been officially apprised of the plan. When it next meets in November, the reorganization will have been put into effect. Under these circumstances, its November meeting will represent an exercise in futility.

Keeping politics out of government statistical agencies has been a century-old struggle. It is obvious that the struggle still goes on.

THE BADLY-SAGGING job market will get little help from the President's new economic game plan, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger, center, warned on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by William Eaton, left, of the Chicago Daily News and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual radio network.

PRES. NIXON CAN'T BE TRUSTED to administer broad economic powers with "balance, equity and fairness," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany tells the House Banking Committee as he calls on Congress to reassert control over the economy. With Meany is AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger.

Bids Congress Reassert Control:

Meany Asks 'No Blank Check' For Nixon on Economic Policy

The AFL-CIO called on Congress to "reassert control over the economy" and pull back the "blank check" it gave Pres. Nixon because "he has proved unworthy of that trust."

Federation Pres. George Meany told the House Banking Committee that labor has "no confidence" that the Nixon Administration can be "trusted" to use broad stand-by economic powers "with balance, equity and fairness."

Meany led the list of trade union leaders who testified before the committee in opposition to the President's heavy-handed economic measures.

And in an address to the 9th constitutional convention of the AFL-CIO's Industrial Union Dept., the federation president compared Nixon to former Argentine dictator Juan Peron for unilaterally cancelling out previously won wage increases during the freeze period.

"What difference is there between Juan Peron standing at the balcony and saying that he is giving millions of workers a raise as of that minute out of the pocket of the employer without consulting the employer?" Meany asked.

"What difference is there between that and the action of Pres. Nixon in taking hundreds of millions of dollars out of the pockets of the workers and giving it to the employer?"

He reiterated labor's belief that the President does not have the power to negate legal contracts, nor limit the right to strike and told IUD delegates, "we will not be patsies for the failure of Economic Game Plan No. 1."

He denounced Administration propaganda about an era of "new prosperity" as "new baloney," and asked:

"What the hell was wrong with the old prosperity? What was wrong with the prosperity that we had in January 1969 when Mr. Nixon took office?"

And appearing on the nationally televised David Frost show, Meany charged that the new economic game plan was hastily conceived during a weekend meeting just prior to Aug. 15 at Camp David, the presidential retreat in Maryland.

"There were no Cabinet members up there, outside of the Secretary of the Treasury," Meany pointed out. "The Secretary of Labor wasn't up there. He wasn't even consulted."

The Administration's record to date on economic stabilization has been marked by "unkept promises, disastrous policies, sudden flip-flops and utterly lop-sided programs," Meany charged before the House Committee. He was accompanied by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller and Research Director Nat Goldfinger.

Meany reminded the committee that earlier this year Nixon had told Congress flatly: "I do not intend to impose wage and price controls."

And Treasury Sec. John B. Connally, testifying before the Banking Committee in support of the stand-by economic stabilization legislation the Administration had previously opposed, declared: "We do not contemplate any circumstances —short of an all-out national emergency—in which the President would establish general wage-price controls without a further specific mandate from Congress."

Yet, Meany noted, the President's freeze order of Aug. 15 was announced "without consultation with Congress, advance notice, reasoned justification or even an explanation."

Was it a sudden national emergency? Meany asked. Or, he suggested, "was it a political emergency—one created by the polls which showed a continued sharp drop in confidence, as a result of the Administration's 'game plan' and policy failures?"

Not only wasn't there the promised request for "a further specific mandate from Congress," Meany noted. There wasn't even advance warning to Congress "although there are stories that advance indications of the Administration's action were given to the oil industry."

Adopting a favorite phrase of the President, Meany told the committee: "Let me make the position of the AFL-CIO crystal clear."

He cited the federation's repeated statements that labor is prepared to cooperate with stabilization controls the President decides are necessary "provided such controls are evenhanded and across-the-board. But we are opposed to any and all attempts at one-sided curbs on workers' wages, without effective curbs on prices, profits, interest rates and other incomes."

But Nixon's latest "game plan" doesn't meet that test, Meany stressed.

It strictly freezes wages and salaries, nullifies wage increases due under legal contracts, bars cost-of-living wage adjustments and productivity increases, he noted.

"So employers are pocketing tens of millions of dollars that are legitimately due their employes and these are just additional profits to the employer, whose prices already reflect the wage increases that are due, which the President now says must not be paid to workers."

While wages are strictly frozen, Meany noted, there is only partial control of prices, and no legal curbs on interest rates, profits or dividends.

"Partnership income, like that enjoyed by Mr. Nixon's former law partners, is not frozen," Meany said. "Nor is the income of land speculators, or those who play the stock and bond market, or those who live on virtually tax-free incomes."

Meany asked the committee, which drafted the economic stabilization legislation: "Was this the intent of Congress in adopting the Stabilization Act—to nullify collective bargaining agreements, to penalize workers, to provide a windfall for employers?"

Meat Cutters

Meat Cutters Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman told the House panel that the President's economic policies are cheating workers out of badly needed wage increases, destroying the sancity of contracts, distorting the national economy and adding large numbers of workers to the already large roster of "alienated groups."

Gorman said in his 54 years as a union officer he had rarely seen "so much widespread anger among workers and their families."

"They feel used and taken. They are beginning not to believe their government any more," he said.

Gorman said members of his union are losing $300,000 a week in negotiated wage increases and that the money is going in the pockets of industry owners whose profits in the first nine months of 1971 were $77 million as compared with $40 million last year.

"This bonanza for industry, this corporate windfall, fits neatly into the Administration's topsy-turvy world where workers earn too much money and corporations make too little profits and where socialism for the rich is the order of the day."

Teachers

Teachers Pres. David Selden told the committee that Nixon had voided teaching contracts "agreed upon two months before the freeze. Most collective bargaining agreements in education are signed before school recesses in June and become effective in the fall. The Cost of Living Council also froze increments."

Selden said the wage loss amounts to as much as $19 million in New York City and said "education has been a depressed industry in the United States for many years. At a time when quality education is needed more than ever before, we cannot afford to freeze the status quo."

He asked Congress to open hearings on an economic stabilization bill that will provide equity for those injured by the President's action and asked that teachers be exempted from any further controls.

Government Employes

Government Employes Pres. John F. Griner said the President's postponement of a comparability raise from Jan. 1 to July 1 for federal white-collar employes amounts to a "special tax."

"The President calls this a pay deferral. This is one word that could be used—the other is 'special tax.' In fact, by not paying these federal employes their proper salaries, under the comparability law, the federal government is imposing a special tax on them and calling that tax by another name."

Griner emphasized that the congressionally authorized Jan. 1 raise for salaried federal workers actually was based on a wage survey of private enterprise last spring, and that their pay rates still would lag behind those of private industry even if they receive the increase as scheduled.

"Postponement of the pay increase to July 1 will only increase the disparity between the pay they receive in the federal service and that which they would receive in private industry," Griner said. "To ask these dedicated employes to carry this burden for this additional six months would be asking those who could least afford it to be the sacrificial lambs for the President's new economic program."

AFSCME

Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes echoed Griner's remarks in relation to the wage-lag in public employment, and he noted the unique bargaining situation of public employe unions, asking for separate treatment for public workers in any Phase II plan.

"The wage differences in public employment are so wide among regions of the nation, among states within regions and among locations within states that truly there is no wage pattern in the public sector," Wurf said.

"When one adds to this the wide range of differences within public governmental units . . . one sees that the establishment of salary guides on a national basis in the public sector is hazardous at best, if not an impossibility."

President Sets Boards To Review Pay, Prices

to include agriculture and other groups. A Service & Compliance Administration will be established to work with and through the Internal Revenue Service and its net of regional and local offices to support administration of the program.

On profits, the President told the nation that while it would be the "politically popular position" to be against profits, he believed that "higher profits in the American economy would be good for every person in America." Exorbitant profits, he said, could be held down by a price commission policy for business to pass along cost savings by cutting prices "rather than tax such profits."

He termed the wage-price freeze "remarkably successful" and said he would broaden his estimate that 1972 would be a "very good year," to say that "it can be a great year for America and the world."

Administration spokesmen at the briefing said that the members of the key boards would be named in a matter of days and hopefully would go into operation promptly to provide some of the criteria, standards and answers to take effect when the freeze ends.

Among these, they indicated, was the question of wage increases coming due under union contracts during the freeze period and deferred increases coming up in the next few months and negotiated a year or more earlier.

While the new post-freeze stabilization program covers everyone and everything, according to the spokesmen, there would be three basic areas. One, including economic units deemed of "critical importance for the control of inflation," will be required to notify the pay and price boards before any changes in prices or wage rates. A second sector will be required to operate within the general criteria and report on changes made. A third group will not be required to either notify or report, but will be subjected to general administrative checks.

A Rent Board within the Price Commission, representing landlords, tenants and others, will provide advice on standards and procedures.

The tripartite pay board will formulate standards of permissible employe compensation (including wages, salaries and all fringe benefits), and the price commission will develop standards of permissible prices.

If either board is unable to develop the continuing standards in time to take effect at the end of the freeze, the Cost of Living Council may propose interim standards.

House Vote Approves Business Tax Windfall

vote, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany made it clear that the modifications the Ways & Means Committee made in the Administration tax proposals don't come near to meeting labor's objections.

Testifying before the House Banking Committee, Meany reiterated that the AFL-CIO is "still opposed to the accelerated depreciation write-offs and also to the investment tax credit." (Story this Page.)

The bill also includes:

- Repeal of the 7 percent excise tax on automobiles, retroactive to Aug. 16, and repeal of the 10 percent excise tax on small trucks under 10,000 pounds, retroactive to Sept. 23.
- Earlier effective dates for scheduled increases in the personal income tax exemption, rising to $675 this year and $750 in 1972, instead of the previously-scheduled 1973 date.

The effect would be to reduce taxes for a family of four with an income of $10,000 a year by about 16 cents a day or $57 a year.

The House bill also went beyond the Administration tax plan to liberalize the tax deduction allowed low-income families so as to remove poverty-level families from the tax rolls.

- A modified version of the Administration's proposal to allow companies to defer indefinitely taxes on profits from exports sold through special subsidiaries. The House bill would limit the tax loss of the government to about one-third the amount of the Administration plan.

CONVENTION

The Georgia State AFL-CIO has rescheduled its 1971 convention for Nov. 10-12 in Atlanta. The convention was originally scheduled for Oct. 20-22.

By Allied Industrial Workers:

Wage Freeze Hit As Political Move

St. Louis—Pres. Nixon's economic policy came under repeated attacks by speakers at the 18th convention of the Allied Industrial Workers.

AIW Pres. Gilbert Jewell, in urging the more than 540 delegates and alternates to greater political action in the 1972 elections, called the President's wage-price freeze actions politically motivated.

He said Nixon "finally faced up to the economic facts of life because he realized that the 1972 election was fast approaching and he had to do something to get elected."

But Jewell predicted that Nixon's efforts would fail to keep him in office.

The people, Jewell said, are not going to forget the "terrible price" that workers, farmers, consumers and small businessmen have had to pay because of the Administration's "economic nonsense and political indifference."

Jewell, who was elected to his first four-year term as president at the convention, also criticized Nixon's policy of appointing management-oriented persons to the National Labor Relations Board.

Also speaking on the opening day of the convention, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland hit the Nixon economic actions as bringing "more burdens for workers and consumers . . . and more concessions for the corporate rich."

He said the Nixon economic remedies are misplaced, particularly in the tax windfall the President proposes to give to business in the belief it will stimulate the economy.

What is needed, Kirkland said, is to stimulate the demands for consumer goods. But, that can't be done, he added, until "the people who need things have the money to buy them."

"So America's first need is jobs," he declared.

He criticized the Nixon Administration for continually misleading the public by insisting that economic times were good in the months leading up to the wage-price freeze action. He charged the Administration with treating the "people with a contempt unmatched in American history."

In his Aug. 15 action, Kirkland said, "Mr. Nixon was admitting that his earlier statements were lies, and that his game plan had been wrong and bad for the economy."

Sen. Thomas Eagleton (D-Mo.) told the AIW delegates that Phase II of Nixon's economic policy must be "fair" or the people won't support it. He said that managing the economy is at best "a ticklish business" and that any workable plan must provide for equal sacrifices and not just sacrifices by workers.

He sharply discredited Nixon's "trickle down" economic theories which, he said, claim that the best way to help working people is by giving money to the rich so that they can employ more people.

Eagleton added:

"A number of economists have indicated that the best way to stimulate business is to go straight to the heart of the problem—to give jobs to people who are out of work."

Also addressing the convention in its first two days were Del Garst, region 15 director of the AFL-CIO in St. Louis, and Walter Campbell, secretary-treasurer of the Michigan State AFL-CIO and former director of the AIW.

Jewell, 64, was unanimously elected by AIW delegates, who represent nearly 100,000 members in the United States. He had been named president of the international union by its executive board in June 1970 after the retirement of Carl W. Griepentrog. Before that, Jewell had been the AIW secretary-treasurer for 13 years. He first joined the union in 1935 in Kansas City, Mo., where he was active in organizing the Fisher Body assembly plant.

Dominick D'Ambrosio of Milwaukee was elected secretary-treasurer of the union for a four-year term. He, too, had been appointed to the position in June 1970.

Activities Schedule For Studies Center

The AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center has seven institutes scheduled for the remainder of October and November. They are:

Arbitration Institute, Oct. 12-16.

Effective Reading for union staff of the Washington area, Oct. 12 to Nov. 11.

Communications, Oct. 18-22.

Staff Development Program, Oct. 26-Nov. 19.

Labor Law (at the University of California, Berkeley), Nov. 15-19.

Institute for Building Trades Business Agents, Nov. 29-Dec. 3.

Negotiated Fringe Benefits and Federal Social Programs, Nov. 29-Dec. 3.

Iowa Delegates Assail President's Program

Davenport, Ia.—More than 300 delegates set the mood for the Iowa AFL-CIO's 16th convention by unanimously thundering their approval of two resolutions condemning Pres. Nixon's wage freeze.

One measure, submitted by the Iowa State Council of Machinists, said, "Many contracts were settled before the freeze and although the companies have raised their prices, the worker cannot receive his or her wage increase and fringe benefits, although many of these were settled after a strike.

"This kind of action just robs from the worker and puts the worker's increases into the coffers of companies."

And the Iowa State Building & Construction Trades Council followed with another resolution calling for congressional enactment of a confiscatory tax on employer windfall gains made during the freeze on wages, or as an alternative, the distribution of these windfall profits to charities and community service organizations.

Delegates also dissected the nation's health care system, found it to be in critical condition, and called for immediate favorable action by Congress on the National Health Security bill.

"Unequal distribution of medical resources is becoming an ever more serious problem denying adequate access to health services to those in rural areas and in the inner city," the resolution said.

"Quality health care is a right and should be made available to all residents of the United States."

Other measures adopted by the convention called for:

- Support for the national AFL-CIO tax reform program and improvement of the Tax Reform Act of 1969.
- Opposition to the ten-hour day, four-day workweek because it would lose for labor the benefits won after considerable struggle to obtain the eight-hour working day and upset most existing collective bargaining contracts.
- Adoption of a "no-fault" auto insurance plan that would guarantee a non-cancellable policy to a driver as long as he held a driver's license and paid his premiums, eliminate the "fault" system requiring proof only in extreme cases, and provide that accident victims be reimbursed immediately for medical expenses and lost wages up to 85 percent of normal salary or $1,000 a month, whichever is lower.

Delegates also called for strong enforcement of federal job safety regulations and adoption of strict industrial safety rules by the state.

On foreign trade and imports, the convention said voluntary trade restrictions ". . . have proven utterly ineffective . . ." and urged the government to support a "realistic" foreign trade policy.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Hugh D. Clark was elected by acclamation for the third successive time, and James J. Wengert was re-elected by acclamation as secretary-treasurer, a post he has held since 1966. A nine-member state executive council was also elected.

Connecticut Labor Asks Equity in State Taxes

New Haven—Connecticut labor reaffirmed its support for a progressive state income tax and its opposition to a high sales tax.

The issue has been a controversial one—in the state and at the State AFL-CIO convention.

The last legislature first enacted a graduated income tax, although not the bill the state's unions had urged. But before it took effect, some legislators had a change of heart and the measure was repealed. In its place, the legislature voted to raise the state's sales tax rate to 6.5 percent—the highest in the nation.

In his keynote speech to the State AFL-CIO convention, Pres. John J. Driscoll proposed that the next legislature be urged "to repeal the sales tax and substitute a graduated income tax which will truly be based on ability to pay."

Delegates backed this position by a solid 213-124 vote.

The convention also voted to finance an expansion of the state federation's COPE program, raising the per capita payment by 2 cents a month with the increase earmarked for COPE.

It also expressed vigorous opposition to the inequities in Pres. Nixon's new economic program, called for enactment by Congress of the labor-supported Health Security program, and urged "realistic" restrictions on imports from low-wage areas.

Top officers were re-elected to two-year terms, including Driscoll, Sec.-Treas. Joseph C. Bober, Executive Vice Pres. Leonard B. Kershner and Executive Sec. George Froehlich.

The convention also saw the emergence of the Connecticut Young Unionists Action League, a movement launched with the strong support of the state central body. A group of young delegates met during the convention with national AFL-CIO COPE Director Al Barkan to discuss a program to expand the YUAL.

In addition to Barkan and state and local officials, convention speakers included two noted economists—Yale Prof. James Tobin, a former member of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, and Prof. David Pinsky of the University of Connecticut's labor education center.

The state's labor leaders urged formation of a coalition of unions and other public interest groups to lobby for progressive programs in the next legislature.

Driscoll told the convention that such a coalition should be organized to work for common goals, including:

- Adequate state aid to the cities.
- An equitable tax program, including a truly progressive income tax.
- State aid for construction of housing, and equal opportunity for housing.
- No-fault automobile insurance.
- Unemployment compensation benefits for workers on strike.
- A job-development program to put the unemployed to work.

Labor Presses Political Drive In Tennessee

Nashville—Seven hundred delegates voted the Tennessee State AFL-CIO a mandate for legislative and political action—and the increased funds to carry it out.

The convention labeled election of a liberal legislature in 1972 a top priority goal. And it called for a firm commitment by legislators to reject the recommendations of a business-dominated and financed advisory commission set up by the state's Republican governor.

The commission's proposals include incorporation of the state Dept. of Labor into a "super-department" embracing present state agencies dealing with agriculture, banking and insurance, as well as labor. The commission also proposed elimination of the Tennessee prevailing wage law and dropping of some safety functions.

Convention delegates voted to raise the State AFL-CIO per capita tax from 18 to 23 cents per month—with the entire increase allocated to the special projects fund, including COPE, education and public relations programs. This will raise the special funds allocation from 8 to 13 cents.

Pres. Matthew Lynch and Sec.-Treas. Lee Case were re-elected to two-year terms, as was First Vice Pres. H. T. Powell. Mrs. Geneva Smith, Clothing Workers delegate from Knoxville, was elected second vice president to succeed Charles Robinson, who did not seek re-election.

Delegates applauded a sharp attack on the Nixon Administration's new economic policy by Stanton Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and local central bodies and a former president of the Tennessee AFL-CIO.

Resolutions adopted included expressions of support and cooperation for the AFL-CIO regional Appalachian Council and the Human Resources Development Institute. The convention also called for a state ban on the importation of professional strikebreakers.

A special resolution strongly supported AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's criticisms of the inequities of the wage-price freeze which places most of the burden on workers.

Barbers President DePaola Resigns

Indianapolis—Joseph N. DePaola, president of the Barbers since Jan. 1, 1964, resigned his office Oct. 1 and was succeeded on an interim basis by Sec.-Treas. Roy C. Emerson in accord with the union's constitution.

The constitution also provides that the union's executive board shall meet within five days to nominate a successor. Local unions have another 60 days to make nominations, after which a secret ballot election would be conducted over a 30-day period.

The U.S. District Court here has been asked by four union members to order the board to call a special nominating convention. The court has not acted on the petition.

DePaola, 64, pleaded guilty Oct. 4 in federal district court, Chicago, to one count of a 36-count indictment charging him with accepting illegal fees for approving loans from the union pension fund. Sentencing was set for Nov. 16. DePaola announced his resignation in a letter to union officers, locals and guilds.

Nixon Order Stands:

Federal Pay Delay Upheld by Congress

Sen. Frank E. Moss (D-Utah), one of the leaders of the attempt, termed the amendment "an idle gesture" unless the Nixon proposal was overthrown.

In a letter to all senators before the vote, Meany had urged the Senate "to begin to inject fairness and equity into Pres. Nixon's economic policies" by stopping him from singling out one group of workers for a freeze on their wages well beyond the Nov. 13 end of the general wage freeze.

Meany said in the letter that the 6 percent pay raise had been "promised—and earned" only to bring federal employes' pay up to the level private employers were paying before Aug. 15.

"The spirit and letter of the comparability law demand that the federal government keep faith with its employes," Meany said. "It is absolutely unfair for Mr. Nixon to propose taking this money due federal workers and use it to further enrich corporations through an undeserved tax cut."

In other congressional developments:

- The Senate rebuked the Nixon Administration by instructing the Dept. of Agriculture to restore funds for school lunches for the needy.

By a vote of 75-5, the Senate increased the federal payment for free or reduced-price lunches to 46 cents, an increase of 11 cents over what the Agriculture Dept. had fixed in August. The Agriculture Dept. had said 35 cents per lunch was all of the money available for the program.

After the Senate action, the Agriculture Dept. issued new rules incorporating the instructions from the Senate, but also tightened eligibility requirements. The action could cut off as many as 500,000 children from the lunch program through changed definitions of the poverty level. It also raised the possibility of still further action by the Senate.

In refuting the department's earlier argument that not enough money was available for the program, senators pointed out that the program for the current school year had received the full $615 million requested by the Agriculture Dept. The Senate instructed the department to borrow the extra money from its fund derived from import duties on farm products.

That fund now has about $300 million in "carryover" money not earmarked for other uses. The amount needed to insure a full school lunch program—estimated between $100 million and $200 million—will be restored by later appropriations, the Senate ruled. A similar measure has been introduced in the House.

- The House Education Committee approved a plan for direct federal aid to financially-strained public and private colleges. The program would be the first time such aid has been extended directly to the nation's colleges. It passed the committee after a key 21-16 vote beat back Republican attempts to tie the program to the number of federally-aided students attending a school. GOP committee members pledged a floor fight on the issue.

The program, which would have to be funded through several appropriations bills, would also extend the Teacher Corps for four years, expand and extend existing federal student loan programs, create a special corporation to buy student loans from private lenders, and prohibit discrimination by sex in admitting students or in hiring or promoting faculty members.

- A bill to limit political campaign spending emerged from the House Commerce Committee, but only after a bitter 23-20 vote along party lines that presages a further battle on the House floor.

The Democratic majority pushed through a bill which would limit television and radio spending to 5 cents per vote cast in the previous election, with another 5 cents per vote allowed on other media. The GOP version keeps the 10-cent limit, but would let the candidate allot any portion he wanted to TV.

In a presidential campaign, the difference in TV spending would be a limit of $6.9 million under the Democrats' plan and $13.8 million under the GOP program. In 1968, Hubert Humphrey's campaign spent about $6.9 million on TV while Nixon's spent over $12 million.

Still another bill on campaign spending was approved by a separate House committee, leaving it uncertain how the two will be reconciled.

Two months ago, the Senate passed a bill which would limit a presidential campaign to $13.9 million for broadcast and print media, but with no limit on the overall campaign cost. No more than $8.3 million of that $13.9 million could be spent for radio and television advertising under the Senate bill.

Litton Shipyard Agrees to Bargain

Pascagoula, Miss.—Management of Litton Industries signed an agreement with the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. to reopen its West Bank shipyard here and start negotiating contract terms for 3,500 members whom it locked out Sept. 2.

Management had shut down the yard, one of the largest automated shipyards in the nation, after a series of protest strikes. It has now agreed to recognize the Metal Trades Dept. as the exclusive representative of West Bank employes, MTD Pres. Paul J. Burnsky said. The department had previously been recognized for yard employes on the East Bank of the Pascagoula River.

WAGE FREEZE PROTEST by 5,000 members of Drug-Hospital Employes Local 1199 in New York City reaffirmed support for the AFL-CIO's position against the freeze. About 8,000 members of the 50,000-member local will lose a total of $120,000 a week during the freeze period. The protest was held at the city's Federal Plaza.

Funding of Group Practice Plans Backed as Key to Health Security

A comprehensive national health program will grow out of strong group practice plans that are financed by public funds, organized labor told Congress.

Health legislation currently before the Senate contains a number of positive features, but it must be improved to stimulate the development of effective Health Maintenance Organizations, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said at a Senate Labor subcommittee hearing.

"We believe prepaid group practice plans or HMOs will be the backbone of any future delivery system," Biemiller declared. "It will be part of the tooling-up process for National Health Security."

But he warned that the success of non-profit group practice plans depends on adequate funding.

While welcoming steps already taken by the Administration to launch a number of HMOs, Biemiller said that funds requested by the Administration are inadequate to launch a large scale development of HMOs.

He also expressed concern that two of the bills before the subcommittee would authorize the use of public funds for developing profit-making health enterprises, a concept that labor adamantly opposes.

"Our experience with profit-making nursing homes has demonstrated that it is much too easy to make profits by not maintaining quality standards. We are opposed to exploiting human misery for private gain."

One of the health proposals would provide federal subsidies for the operation of private corporations for 20 years, Biemiller pointed out.

The Administration's HMO bill, introduced by Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) and 20 co-sponsors, carries the provision for subsidizing profit-making health organizations.

Another bill introduced by Javits, which does not contain that provision, comes closest to meeting organized labor's standards. Biemiller said it is the best of the four bills before the subcommittee, although it, too, needs improvements.

The ideal HMO development bill, Biemiller advised, should provide funds for feasibility studies and federal grants for initial planning and development.

Grants and subsidized loans also must be made available for the construction of new faciilties and improvements in existing structures, he said.

Other features suggested by Biemiller include provisions for grants and loans to cover operating costs of HMOs for up to the first five years; financing of new health care programs; fellowships and scholarships for training administrators; funds for training medical and paramedical personnel, and government evaluation programs.

Biemiller noted that labor has long supported the improvement of the nation's health care systems through the development of group practice prepayment plans.

Labor's experience has proved, he stressed, that HMOs can provide better quality medical care at a lower cost than the fragmented fee-for-service system.

"The whole HMO concept contemplates a single capitation payment to cover preventive care, physician services, hospitalization, skilled nursing home care and home health and other health services," Biemiller pointed out.

But he stressed again that adequate funds must be provided and urged the subcommittee to give HMO development a high budgetary priority for future appropriations.

LABOR'S POSITION on health legislation for development of prepaid group practice plans is discussed prior to a Senate Labor subcommittee hearing. From left are AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller, Social Security Director Bert Seidman and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

Boggs Takes Post In Safety Agency

Maywood Boggs, former president of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., has been named special assistant to the head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

Boggs will report to Assistant Labor Sec. George C. Guenther, who oversees all OSHA operations. Boggs is expected to specialize in liaison between organized labor and the occupational safety agency.

Prior to serving as head of the Metal Trades Dept., Boggs was a vice president of the Boilermakers and held the post of national legislative representative.

vulnerable victims of inflation—deserve far more consideration than this. They deserve reasonable protection against ever-mounting medical costs. They deserve government action that will protect them, not the purveyors of medical care whose prices are not adequately frozen."

Meany found "little satisfaction" in Richardson's statement that hospital and medical costs will be subject to controls in Phase 2. He noted these controls would occur after Medicare beneficiaries "had been penalized 13 percent."

Stating there is "no justification" for the increase, Meany "strongly" urged Richardson to rescind it and "to hold the line on Medicare costs the beneficiaries are required to pay."

Labor Will Join Pay Board As Nixon Pledges 'No Veto'

A SPECIAL, EXPANDED MEETING of the AFL-CIO Executive Council discussed the problems posed by the Administration's post-freeze program and the need for a united labor position. Joining the discussions were (from left) Teamsters Pres. Frank Fitzsimmons and Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock, invited by Federation Pres. George Meany. Presidents of some of the other 14 unions invited are in the background.

Council Approves Role for Unions

By Saul Miller

Organized labor will serve on Pres. Nixon's tripartite Pay Board after receiving personal assurances from the President that the board will be completely autonomous and that its decision on standards or cases cannot be vetoed by the Cost of Living Council.

The issue, which had been in dispute since the President's Oct. 7 speech outlining the Administration's post-freeze program and machinery, was resolved after top Administration leaders delivered to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany Oct. 12 a memorandum initialed by Pres. Nixon that said in part:

"The Cost of Living Council will not approve, disapprove or serve as an appeal level for case decisions made by the Pay Board and Price Commission and it will not approve, revise, veto or revoke specific standards or criteria developed by the Pay Board and Price Commission."

After a morning of discussion at a special meeting of the federation's Executive Council in Washington, attended by Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock and Teamsters Pres. Frank Fitzsimmons and presidents of 14 AFL-CIO unions with special problems, the council unanimously adopted the following statement:

"In light of the personal assurances we have received this morning from the President of the United States, that the Pay Board will be completely autonomous and that the Cost of Living Council will not have veto power over its decisions, either as to standards or cases, it is the decision of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, that:

"1. We will help try to make the President's mechanism to control the cost of living work.

"2. We will serve on the Pay Board.

"3. We will establish our own watchdog units to monitor prices.

"4. We will continue to oppose the President's tax measures in the Congress.

"5. We will continue our fight for full employment which is the key answer to America's problems."

Meany was joined at a press conference after the meeting by Woodcock and Fitzsimmons who said they were in complete

Strikers Gain La-Z-Boy Pact, Cancel Boycott

New York — The Furniture Workers won new and improved contracts from the La-Z-Boy Chair Co. and called off the strike and nationwide boycott action that helped bring the company to terms.

Union members at Monroe, Mich., who walked out Aug. 2 for an acceptable contract, have ratified a new agreement and gone back to work. La-Z-Boy employes at Florence, S.C., on strike since Aug. 3, were holding a ratification meeting as the AFL-CIO News went to press. Newly unionized workers at Neosho, Mo., also returned to their jobs when the com-

Watchdog Units Set To Monitor Prices

The AFL-CIO will help "insure that there is no price-gouging in America," by setting up watchdog units to monitor prices across the nation, Federation Pres. George Meany announced.

In letters to the 739 city central bodies and 51 state bodies (including Puerto Rico), Meany noted that labor had agreed to "help try to make the President's mechanism to control the cost of living work" and would serve on the Pay Board.

"But we are going to do more," he said. "One major contribution we can make is to insure that there is no price-gouging in America."

He noted the Administration "has no plans for effective machinery to control prices." Meany continued:

"The President is going to depend on the voluntary cooperation of the business community, he says. We feel that this is not good enough. We know that unless they are watched and watched carefully, some will either raise prices or reduce quality or quantity or all three."

In the "absence of adequate compliance machinery," he said, the AFL-CIO Executive Council had authorized the establishment of "our own watchdog units to monitor prices."

He called on all state and local central bodies to take "immediate action to develop and activate appropriate machinery to:

"1. Provide all available information on price and rent controls to members, affiliates and all other unions.

"2. To follow through on all complaints, grievances and violations with appropriate authorities.

"3. To report on developments, including all violations, to the national office.

"I specifically urge that immediate steps be taken by these watch-

Little Change Shown In Bleak Job Situation

By Tom Castor

The unemployment picture continued "virtually unchanged" during September, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported, as the jobless rate edged down from 6.1 percent to 6 percent—a change government economists consider too small to be statistically reliable.

Although employment rose 325,000, it did so only after seasonal adjustment, and even at that, most of the increase was attributed to a rise in part-time employment for adult women.

This factor was reflected in another indicator, average weekly earnings, which dropped 27 cents to a weekly gross of $128.76 because of shorter workweeks and a decline in hourly wages.

Long-term unemployment continued unabated with the average duration of joblessness rising from 11.5 to 12 weeks and with 567,000 persons unemployed 27 weeks or more, on a seasonally adjusted basis.

The number of those unemployed

Senate Urged to Block Nixon's Tax Giveaway

The AFL-CIO looked to the Senate to block a multi-billion dollar giveaway to the nation's richest corporations.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller charged that the House-passed tax bill reflects, "with minor exceptions," the "shocking" proposal of Pres. Nixon to redistribute the nation's tax resources "in favor of the rich and at the expense of the public interest."

The money that would be given away to business in new tax cuts and loopholes is urgently needed for government programs to generate "a healthy, balanced economic recovery," Biemiller said.

Biemiller, accompanied by AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger, testified before the Senate Finance Committee as hearings opened on the tax legislation the House passed by voice vote just a week before. (Excerpts, Page 4.)

He called on the senators "to recognize that this tax bill is rigged overwhelmingly in favor of big business—and against workers, taxpayers and the public interest. And to recognize that public investment and tax justice are precisely what America needs in order to strengthen the economy and provide millions of much-needed jobs."

It's up to the Senate, Biemiller urged, to "reject the myopic and regressive view that what's good for America is only what's good for the wealthy."

Testifying in detail on the House-passed bill, Biemiller said:

- The proposed tax reductions for low and middle income groups should be retained. But the revenue

U.S. AND CANADIAN participants in a bi-national trade union conference on collective bargaining in the federal service continue to talk shop during a coffee break. From left: John A. McCart, director of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council; AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis; M. O. Federal Workers Trail Canadians On Collective Bargaining Rights

By David L. Perlman

Detroit—The United States is an underdeveloped country when it comes to collective bargaining rights for federal employes.

Representatives of U.S. and Canadian unions of government employes reached that inescapable conclusion during a three-day conference here under the auspices of the AFL-CIO and the Canadian Labor Congress.

Hosts for the conference were the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. and Government Employes Council. Three years ago, the first such bi-national conference had been held on the Canadian side of the border.

Attending this second conference were more than 100 union officers and staff experts from the two nations. They explored the special problems of union-management relations that arise when management is the federal government.

They listened to each other and questioned each other at formal meetings, broke into smaller panels for more intensive discussion, and continued to talk shop during coffee breaks and over breakfast, lunch and dinner tables.

And they found the grass very much greener for unions of federal workers north of the border.

Under Canada's Public Service Staff Relations Act—a new experiment at the time of the last conference—Canadian unions have moved much closer to the pattern of private industry bargaining than American unions have achieved under presidential executive orders. In fact, the scope of Canadian union rights and bargaining exceeds even the pattern of the semi-autonomous U.S. Postal Service, which has been the model to which public sector unions in the United States aspire.

Here are some of the things the U.S. delegates discovered about their North American neighbor:

- Canadian unions, nearly all affiliated with the CLC, bargain for close to 99 percent of federal workers. In the United States, unions represent about half of non-postal federal employes.
- Union membership in the Canadian public service is nearly universal. Non-members pay a service charge equal to union dues under an agency shop formula that is written into all union contracts. In the United States, even when federal employes have voted overwhelmingly for union representation, dues-paying membership is closer to 50 percent of the bargaining unit.
- The scope of federal service collective bargaining is much broader in Canada. In the United States, government salaries and wages are pegged to private industry averages—except of course when Pres. Nixon acts to cancel or defer scheduled pay raises.

In Canada, all pay scales are negotiated. Surveys of private industry rates are furnished to both sides as a matter of information, but do not limit the final settlement. Likewise, Canadians can bargain on hours of work and other areas largely excluded from negotiations in the United States.

- Canadian unions have a choice, before going into negotiations, of two methods of resolving any impasse that might develop at the bargaining table. They may choose binding arbitration if negotiations are deadlocked. Or they may elect, instead, a two-step procedure of conciliation followed by the right to strike. U.S. unions are, of course, prohibited by law from striking.
- Grievances arising out of contract interpretation are generally subject to arbitration in both nations. Unions in the U.S. pay half the cost of arbitration. In Canada, the current practice of the independent Public Service Staff Relations Board is not to charge either side.

It's not all sugar and spice across the border, as Canadian participants were quick to point out.

Not all forms of grievances are subject to outside arbitration; some may be appealed only to the Canadian equivalent of the Civil Service Commission.
